CYCLOPÆDIA OF AMERICAN BIOGRAPHY.

SUNDERLAND

SUNDERLAND, Le Roy, author, b. in Exeter, R. I., 18 May, 1802; d. in Quincy, Mass., 15 May, 1885. He was apprenticed to a shoemaker at East Greenwich, R. I., was converted to Methodism, became a preacher at Walpole, Mass., in 1823, and was soon known as an orator of great power. He was prominent in the temperance and anti-slavery movements, presided at the meeting in New York city in October, 1834, when the first Methodist anti-slavery society was organized, and in December wrote the "Appeal" to Methodists against slavery, which was signed by ministers of the church in New England. He was appointed a delegate to the first anti-slavery convention in the west, at Cincinnati, in 1841, and to the World's convention in 1843, in London. His preaching was attended by strange phenomena. Under his first sermon the entire audience was "struck down by the power of God," as it was then called; and ever afterward when he preached with reference to the awakening of sinners such manifestations appeared to a greater or less extent. His study of such phenomena had doubtless a determinative effect in his subsequent denial of Christianity, which he opposed during forty years preceding his death. He edited "The Watchman" in New York in 1836-'43; "The Magnet" in 1842-'3; "The Spirit World," at Boston, in 1850-'2; and was a large contributor to various religious periodicals. He published "Biblical Institutes" (New York, 1834); "Appeal on the Subject of Slavery" (Boston, 1834); "History of the United States" (New York, 1834); "History of South America" (1834); "Testimony of God against Slavery" (Boston, 1834); "Anti-Slavery Manual" (New York, 1837); "Mormonism Exposed" (1842); "Pathetism, with Practical Instructions" (1843); "Book of Health" (1847); "Pathetism: Man considered in Respect to his Soul, Mind, Spirit" (1847); "Pathetism: Statement of its Philosophy, and its Discovery Defended" (1850); "Book of Psychology" (1852); "Theory of Nutrition and Philosophy of Healing without Medicine"; "Book of Human Nature" (1853); and "The Trance, and how Introduced" (Boston, 1860).

SUNDERLAND, Thomas, jurist, b. in Terre Haute, Ind., in 1821; d. in New York city, 9 Oct., 1886. He studied law early in life, and went to California during the gold excitement of 1849. After securing a large fortune, he engaged in the practice of his profession, and became chief justice of the supreme court of California. He resided in Nevada for some time, and was urged ineffectually to become Democratic candidate for U. S. senator from that state. He served for many years in the California legislature, and was an active member of the Scientific society of San Francisco.

SUPLÉE, Thomas Danly (su-play), educator, b. in Philadelphia, 17 April, 1846. He was graduated at Princeton in 1870, and studied at Union and Princeton theological seminaries and at the Protestant Episcopal divinity-school in Philadelphia. He became professor of Latin in Shattuck school, Faribault, Minn., in 1876, vice-rector of St. Augustine college, Benicia, Cal., in 1877, head-master of Trinity school, Tivoli-on-Hudson, N. Y., in 1879, head-master of Harcourt place school, Gambier, Ohio, in 1882, and rector of Courtlandt place school, Lakewood, N. J., in 1885, which post he still holds. He has published "Frank Muller, or Labor and its Fruits" (Philadelphia, 1869); "Pebbles from the Fountain of Castalia," poems (1870); "Riverside: a Romance" (Princeton, 1871); "Plain Talks" (Trenton, 1872); "Life of Ephraim Dod Saunders, D. D., Founder of the Presbyterian Hospital in Philadelphia" (Philadelphia, 1873); and has edited "Trench on the Study of Words" (New York, 1878); "Life of Theodore Bland Pryor, First Mathematical Fellow of Princeton College" (San Francisco, 1879); and "Hand-Book of Civil Government under the Constitution of the United States" (Philadelphia, 1883). Mr. Suplée is preparing a life of Richard Realf (q. v.), and editing his poems.

SUTCLIFFE, Thomas, British soldier. He rose to be a colonel in the army, and was for some time governor of the island of Juan Fernandez. He published "Sixteen Years in Chili and Peru, 1822-'39" (London, 1841), and "Crusonia, or the History of the Island of Juan Fernandez" (1843).

SUTHERLAND, Alexander, Canadian clergyman, b. in Guelph, Ont., 17 Sept., 1833. He was the son of a Scottish farmer, but, his father dying, he received few educational advantages. He learned the printing trade, but, uniting with the Methodist church, studied for the ministry, and was licensed as a preacher in 1859. He was afterward stationed at Niagara, but in 1861 removed to Thorold, and till 1874 was settled at Drummondville, Hamilton, Yorkville, Toronto, and Montreal. He was secretary of the conference in 1870-'1, delegate to the general conference of the Methodist Episcopal church at Brooklyn, N. Y., and in 1874, when the union of the Methodist churches in Canada was consummated, he was appointed secretary and treasurer of Methodist missions. In connection with this office it has been his duty to visit the greater part of the Dominion, and he has won everywhere a reputation for eloquence. In 1879 he made a vigorous effort to clear the church missions department of a debt of $75,000, which resulted in the collection of $116,000. He was secretary to the conference again in 1878, and in 1879 received the degree of D. D. from Victoria college. He has published "A Summer in Prairie Land" (Toronto, 1882).

SUTHERLAND, Joel B., jurist, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., in 1791; d. there, 15 Nov., 1861. He was graduated as a physician at the University of Pennsylvania in 1812, served in the war with Great Britain in 1813, and subsequently was a member of the Pennsylvania legislature. He was a member of congress in 1827-'37, chairman of the committee on commerce in 1835-'7, and judge of the court of common pleas in Philadelphia. He published "Manual of Legislative Practice and Order of Business in Deliberative Bodies" (Philadelphia, 1830), and "A Congressional Manual" (1839).

SUTLIFFE, Albert, poet, b. in Meriden, Conn., about 1830. After teaching in a private school in Kentucky, he removed in 1855 to Minnesota, where he has since resided. He first became known as a writer of verse for the "National Era," Washington, D. C., and in 1854 was a contributor to the "Genius of the West," at Cincinnati. He published a volume of poems (Boston, 1859).

SUTRO, Adolph Heinrich Joseph, mining engineer, b. in Aix-la-Chapelle, Rhenish Prussia, 29 April, 1830. He was educated in his native place. His father was a cloth-manufacturer, and Adolph learned the details of the business and travelled for the factory, but the elder Sutro died before the son was old enough to continue the business, and the family, consisting of seven sons and four daughters, came to New York in 1850. During the voyage Adolph had learned of the gold fever in California, and, soon after establishing the family in Baltimore, he set out for the Pacific coast. Having studied mineralogy in the best polytechnic schools in Germany, he was much better prepared for mining operations than the majority who at that time were flocking to the gold-fields. He visited Nevada in 1860, and, after a careful inspection of the mining region there, he planned the now famous Sutro tunnel through the heart of the mountain where lay the Comstock lode. Having interested capitalists in the project, he obtained a charter from the Nevada legislature on 4 Feb., 1865, and the authorization of congress on 25 July, 1866. The mining companies agreed to pay a toll of $2 for each ton of ore, from the time when the tunnel should reach and benefit their mines. The work was begun on 19 Oct., 1869. It proceeded as rapidly as its character would permit, and before the close of 1871 four vertical shafts were opened along the line of the tunnel, one of which was 552 feet deep. The distance from the mouth of the tunnel to the Savage mine, where, at a depth of 1,650 feet from the surface, it formed the first connection with the Comstock lode, is 20,000 feet. Lateral tunnels connect it with the mines on either side of the main bore. In 1879 the great tunnel was finished, and its projector became a millionaire many times over. Some of the mines at the level of the tunnel were flooded with water to the depth of one hundred feet or more, and had long been abandoned; others were unworkable on account of the heat and noxious gases. The tunnel with its shafts effectually ventilated them, and within a few days they were rid of the accumulated water, which had a temperature in some mines of 160°

Fahrenheit. Mr. Sutro has devoted a part of his fortune to the collection of a fine library and art gallery in San Francisco. In 1887 he presented that city with a copy of Frédéric A. Bartholdi's statue of "Liberty enlightening the World."

SUTTER, John Augustus, pioneer, b. in Kandern, Baden, 15 Feb., 1803; d. in Washington, D. C., 17 June, 1880. He was of Swiss parentage, and his family name was originally Suter. He was graduated at the military college at Berne in 1823, entered the French service as an officer of the Swiss guard, and served in 1823-'4 through the Spanish campaign. In 1834 he emigrated to this country and settled in St. Louis. Afterward he carried on at Santa Fé a profitable trade with Indians and trappers, whose accounts of California induced him in 1838 to cross the Rocky mountains. He first went to Oregon, descended Columbia river to Fort Vancouver, and thence sailed to the Sandwich islands, where he purchased a vessel and went to Sitka, Alaska. After disposing of his cargo to advantage there, he sailed along the Pacific coast, and on 2 July, 1839, was stranded in the Bay of Yerba Buena (now San Francisco). Penetrating into the interior amid great difficulties, he founded in the same year the earliest white settlement on the site of Sacramento, received a considerable grant of land from the Mexican government, and in 1841 built a fort, calling it New Helvetia, which was afterward the first settlement that was reached by overland emigrants to California. The Mexican government appointed him governor of the northern frontier country, but, as he favored the annexation of California to the United States, the Mexicans regarded him with suspicion. When Capt. Charles Wilkes's exploring expedition reached San Francisco, Sutter gave him aid and information, and he extended a similar welcome to John C. Frémont and his party. When California was ceded to the United States in February, 1848, Sutter was the owner of a large tract of land, many thousands of cattle, and other property, but the discovery of gold on his estate near Coloma, El Dorado co., at the same time (see MARSHALL, JAMES WILSON), proved his financial ruin. His laborers deserted him, his lands were overrun by gold-diggers, and the claim he had filed for thirty-three square leagues, which had been allowed by the commissioners, was decided against him on appeal to the supreme court. Despoiled of his property and reduced to want, he was granted by the California legislature a pension of $250 a month. In 1864 his homestead was burned, and in 1873 he removed to Litiz, Lancaster co., Pa. After California had been annexed to this country Sutter was elected first alcalde of his district, and a delegate to the convention to form a state constitution, and he was also an Indian commissioner. The illustration shows the mill on Sutter's property, near which gold was first discovered.

SUYDAM, James Augustus (si'-dam), artist, b. in New York, 27 March, 1819; d. in North Conway, N. H., 15 Sept., 1865. His first instructor was Miner K. Kellogg, with whom he travelled through Greece and Turkey. Later, after his return to the United States, he studied also with Asher B. Durand and John F. Kensett. He was elected an honorary member of the National academy in 1858, and an academician in 1861. When the building of the academy was projected he took an active part in its construction. He held office in the academy until his death, and bequeathed to it the "Suydam Collection" of pictures, besides a large sum of money. He was quite successful in his coast views. Among his works are "View on Long Island" and "Hook Mountain on the Hudson" (1863).

SUYDAM, John Howard, clergyman, b. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 1 Oct., 1832. He was graduated at Rutgers in 1854, and at the Theological seminary of the Reformed church in New Brunswick, N. J., in 1857, and was ordained by the classis of Poughkeepsie. He was settled as pastor at Fishkill in 1857-'62, and in Philadelphia, Pa., in 1862-'9, and since 1869 has been in Jersey City. He has been president of the board of superintendents of the New Brunswick theological seminary and of the general synod of the Reformed church. He received the degree of D. D. from Rutgers in 1882. In addition to sermons, he has published "The Cruger Family" (Philadelphia, 1864); "Cruel Jim" (1870); and "The Wreckmaster" (1871).

SWEENEY, Thomas William, soldier, b. in Cork, Ireland, 25 Dec., 1820. He came to the United States in 1832, and at an early age was apprenticed to the printing business. When a young man he joined the Baxter blues, a military organization in New York city, and in 1846, at the beginning of the war with Mexico, he became 2d lieutenant in Ward B. Burnett's 1st New York volunteers. He participated in the campaign under Gen. Winfield Scott from the siege of Vera Cruz to the storming of Churubusco, where he received wounds that necessitated the amputation of his right arm. On his return to New York city he was given a reception ball at Castle Garden by the printers of the city, and he received the brevet of captain from the governor of the state and a silver medal from the city of New York. He was given the commission of 2d lieutenant in the 2d U. S. infantry, and served in California, in charge of Fort Yuma, and elsewhere in the west, being engaged in frequent actions with hostile Indians. While stationed at Fort Yuma, the command under Maj. Samuel P. Heintzelman was compelled to fall back on San Diego for want of supplies, and Sweeney was ordered to remain with ten men. The Indians besieged his camp from 5 June until 6 Dec., 1851, but he was finally extricated by a government exploring expedition under Capt. Lorenzo Sitgreaves. After other duties at various posts he was promoted captain, 19 Jan., 1861. Soon after the beginning of the civil war he was ordered to St. Louis and given command of the arsenal, which contained immense quantities of munitions of war of all kinds, sufficient fully to arm and equip 60,000 men, together with over forty tons of powder. Capt. Sweeney had but forty unassigned recruits under him, while in St. Louis there were nearly 3,000 hostile minute-men, fully equipped. Advances were made to induce him to surrender the arsenal; but the reply, that if a serious attempt should be made to capture the arsenal he would blow it to atoms, prevented any action on the part of the Confederate sympathizers. He was second in command of the Union troops at the surrender of the state forces at Camp Jackson, and conducted the final negotiations, in consequence of Gen. Nathaniel Lyon's having been disabled. Subsequently he was instrumental in the organization of the Missouri three-months' volunteers, and he was appointed brigadier-general on 20 May, 1861. In the campaign that followed he took an active part with Gen. Lyon, and was severely wounded at the battle of Wilson's Creek, and later he was acting assistant adjutant-general under Gen. John C. Frémont. He then accepted the command of the 52d Illinois volunteers, and was attached to the army under Gen. Grant, participating in the capture of Fort Donelson, after which he took 6,000 prisoners to Alton, Ill. At a critical moment toward the close of the first day of the battle of Shiloh a gap existed between the right flank of Sweeney's brigade and Gen. William T. Sherman's left. The defence of this position, which was the key of the situation, was intrusted to him by Sherman, who has since said: "I attach more importance to that event than to any of the hundred achievements which I have since heard saved the day." His commission of brigadier-general of volunteers dates from 29 Nov., 1862, and thereafter he commanded a division of the 16th army corps and was engaged in protecting the Memphis and Charleston railroad. He was promoted major of the 16th infantry, 20 Oct., 1863, and in the Atlanta campaign had the 2d division of the 16th corps in the Army of the Tennessee. At Snake Creek gap his command took possession of the gap twenty-four hours in advance of the cavalry, and held it in spite of every effort of the enemy. He took part in the battle of Resaca and forced a passage across Oostenaulla river at Lay's Ferry, where he fought a successful battle, which action resulted in Gen. Joseph E. Johnston's retreat southward. He also participated in the battles of Dallas and Kenesaw Mountain, and at the battle before Atlanta on 22 July, 1864, his division drove the enemy back with great slaughter, capturing four battle-flags and 900 prisoners. Subsequently he had command of the post of Nashville until July, 1865, and he was mustered out of volunteer service on 24 Aug. of that year. He participated in the Fenian invasion of Canada in 1866, and was present at the battle of Limestone Ridge. During this period he was out of the National service, but was reinstated by the president soon afterward and given posts in the southern states. Gen. Sweeney was presented with a sword by the city of Brooklyn for services rendered in the civil war. He was retired on 11 May, 1870, with the rank of brigadier-general.

SWEET, Alexander Edwin, editor, b. in St. John, New Brunswick, 28 March, 1841. His father, James, removed to San Antonio, Tex., in 1849, and was afterward mayor of that town. He also served in the Confederate army as a lieutenant-colonel. The son was sent to school in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., and in 1859 went to Europe and entered the Polytechnic institute, in Karlsruhe. Returning to Texas in 1863, he served in the Confederate army in the 33d Texas cavalry. After the war he studied law, was admitted to the bar, and practised in San Antonio for several years. In 1879 he became editor of the San Antonio "Express," and, still practising law, became city attorney. Afterward he was editor of the San Antonio "Herald," and a contributor of humorous paragraphs to the Galveston "News." In May, 1881, he removed to Austin, Texas, and formed there a partnership for the publication of a weekly journal entitled "Texas Siftings," which was removed to New York in 1884. With J. Amory Knox he has published "On a Mexican Mustang through Texas from the Gulf to the Rio Grande" (Hartford, 1883).

SWEET, Benjamin Jeffrey, soldier, b. in Kirkland, Oneida co., N. Y., 24 April, 1832; d. in Washington, D. C., 1 Jan., 1874. His father was a clergyman in poor health, and at nine years of age the boy was set at work in a cotton-mill. When he was sixteen his father removed to Stockbridge, Wis., and settled upon a piece of wild forest land, where the son spent a year in clearing a homestead for the family. At the age of seventeen he entered Appleton college, but remained only a year, and then returned home, where he alternately taught and worked on his father's farm. His spare hours he devoted to the study of the law. Before he was twenty-seven he was elected to the senate of Wisconsin, but at the opening of the civil war he was commissioned major of the 6th Wisconsin regiment. Soon afterward he resigned and raised two fresh regiments, the 21st and 22d Wisconsin, of the first of which he became colonel. In the battle of Perryville, where it formed a part of one corps that during all of one day sustained an attack from the whole of Bragg's army, it lost 300 in killed and wounded. Col. Sweet had been for several days confined to an ambulance by malarial fever, but when the battle began he mounted his horse and took command of his regiment. During the battle he received a wound that was supposed to be mortal. His life was saved by the careful tending of his wife, but his health was permanently shattered. He was given a colonelcy in the Veteran reserve corps, and stationed at Gallatin, Tenn., building a fort there in the winter of 1862-'3. In May, 1864, he was ordered to take command of the prison at Camp Douglas, Chicago, where about 10,000 Confederate soldiers were confined. In June he discovered that an outbreak had been planned for the 4th of July which should liberate and arm the prisoners, and result in the sacking and burning of Chicago. He quickly strengthened his defences and re-enforced his garrison, and the attempt was thus rendered hopeless. Early in November, Col. Sweet received positive information that the post was to be attacked on election night, only three days following; 5,000 armed men under competent leaders were then in Chicago, ready for the assault on the camp, and muskets were there in abundance to arm the 9,000 prisoners. Chicago was to be burned, and its flames were to be the signal for a general uprising of 500,000 well-armed men throughout the western country. Every available soldier had been sent to the front by the government, and Sweet had in the garrison but 796 men, most of whom were unfit for active duty. Moreover, it was too late to receive re-enforcements. His only hope of safety lay in the speedy arrest of the Confederate leaders who were then in Chicago. In this emergency he called to his aid one of his prisoners, a Texas ranger named John T. Shanks, who was well acquainted with the Confederate officers, and engaged him to ferret them out. To gain him confidence with the Confederates, he allowed Shanks to escape from the prison, and made great efforts for his recapture. Col. Sweet thought he could trust the man; but he had him constantly shadowed by detectives pledged to take his life in case of his treachery. Shanks did his work so well that within thirty-six hours the leaders of the intended assault were in irons, and a large quantity of contraband arms was in the possession of the government. When Chicago awoke to the danger it had escaped, its citizens collected at a mass-meeting and publicly thanked Col. Sweet for the service he had rendered. For it also the government promoted him to the rank of brigadier-general of volunteers. When he was mustered out of service at the close of the war he resumed the practice of his profession in Wisconsin, but in 1869 he was appointed U. S. pension-agent at Chicago. He held this position till April, 1870, when he was made supervisor of internal revenue for Illinois. This office he held till January, 1872, when he was called to Washington to be 1st deputy commissioner of internal revenue.

SWEET, Elnathan, civil engineer, b. in Cheshire, Mass., 20 Nov., 1837. He was graduated in the scientific course at Union college in 1859, and became a civil engineer, making a specialty of constructing bridges and other engineering work by contract. In 1876-'80 he was division engineer of New York state canals, and he was elected state engineer in 1883, which office he held for four years from 1 Jan., 1884. Mr. Sweet's principal contribution to engineering science consists in the determination of the laws that govern the propulsion of vessels in narrow channels, an account of which he published in 1880 in the "Transactions" of the American society of civil engineers, of which organization he was elected a member in 1878. His writings include annual reports that he issued from Albany during the years he held office, and various technical papers.

SWEET, Homer De Lois, engineer, b. in Pompey, Onondaga co., N. Y., 24 Jan., 1826. He worked on his father's farm, attended the district schools, and, becoming a civil engineer, built the reservoir of the Syracuse water company at Onondaga hill in 1862-'4, and in 1865 designed and superintended the erection of the large stone bridge in Syracuse. For three years he was employed on "French's Map of New York State," for which he surveyed Onondaga county, and he also made a map of the "great wilderness" in northern New York in 1867. From 1864 till 1873 he was secretary of the New York state sheep breeders' and wool growers' association, and secretary of the Onondaga historical association for more than twenty years. At an early age he contributed songs, poems, and later essays on art, agriculture, and engineering to newspapers under the pen-name of "Parmenus Smartweed." He has also published "Twilight Hours in the Adirondacks" (Syracuse, 1870), and has now (1888) ready for the press "The Philosophy of English Versification."—His brother, John Edson, inventor, b. in Pompey, Onondaga co., N. Y., 21 Oct., 1832, was educated in a district school, and in 1873-'9 was professor of practical mechanics at Cornell university. He was a founder of the American society of mechanical engineers, of which he was president in 1883-'4. He is believed to be the first to suggest the use of pipe-lines for transporting oil from the oil-wells, and is the inventor of the straight-line high-speed engine, and one of the first to construct a composing-machine to form a matrix for casting stereotype-plates directly without the use of movable type. He is a contributor to the London "Engineering" and "American Machinist."

SWEETSER, Henry Edward, journalist, b. in New York city, 19 Feb., 1837; d. there, 17 Feb., 1870. After graduation at Yale in 1858 he devoted himself to mercantile pursuits, and then became a reporter for the New York "Times." In 1860 he was made night editor of the "World," and in 1863 he founded, with his brother, Charles H. Sweetser, the "Round Table," from which he withdrew in 1866, and, after a short visit to Europe, returned to New York and engaged in editorial work until his death.—His brother, Charles Humphreys, journalist, b. in Athol, Mass., 25 Aug., 1841; d. in Palatka, Fla., 1 Jan., 1871, after graduation at Amherst in 1862 engaged in journalistic work, aided in founding the "Round Table," and became connected with the New York "Evening Gazette." He was an originator of the "Evening Mail" in 1867, and the "City" in 1869. After the failure of the latter enterprise he removed to Minnesota, and subsequently to Chicago, where he became literary editor of the "Times," but, owing to impaired health, he went to Florida. He published "Songs of Amherst" (Amherst, 1860); "History of Amherst College" (1860); and "Tourist's and Invalid's Guide to the Northwest" (New York, 1867).

William Walker in Nicaragua. He studied at Beloit and Columbian colleges, and travelled in Europe and the East. He is the author of "Artist Biographies" (15 vols., Boston, 1877-'8); "Europe for $2.00 a Day" (Boston, 1875); "Summer Days Down East" (Portland, 1883); several guide-books to the White mountains, and Osgood's (now Cassell's) "Pocket Guide to Europe" (Boston, 1883).

SWEETSER, William, physician, b. in Boston, Mass., 8 Sept., 1797; d. in New York city, 14 Oct., 1875. From 1825 till 1832 he was professor of medicine in the University of Vermont, and from 1845 till 1861 he held the same chair in Bowdoin. He also lectured in Jefferson medical college, Philadelphia, and in the medical schools of Castleton, Vt., and was professor of medicine in Hobart college, Geneva, from 1848 till 1855. SWENEY, John Robson, musician, b. in West Chester, Pa., 31 Dec., 1837. He received a common-school education, and gave early evidences of musical talent. He was leader of a band during the civil war, and upon the cessation of hostilities resumed instruction in music at his native place, shortly thereafter essaying his first attempt at the composition of Sunday-school music. His songs were first brought before the public by his teaching them to the Sunday-school under his leadership. The local reputation that he thus acquired enabled him to find a publisher to issue them in pamphlet-form. A demand for his music was created almost immediately, and each year increased his hold upon public favor. In 1874 the degree of M. B. was conferred upon him by the Pennsylvania military academy, where he has been professor of vocal and instrumental music for eighteen years. In 1884 he received the degree of Mus. D. His Sunday-school songs are used not only everywhere in the United States, but in the missions in China, Japan, India, and Africa, and his name as a composer of this kind of music is widely known. He now (1888) has charge of the music in Bethany Presbyterian church, Philadelphia. His publications are "Gems of Praise" (Philadelphia, 1877); "The Garner" (1878); "Joy to the World" (Cincinnati, 1878); "The Quiver" (Philadelphia, 1880); "The Wells of Salvation" (1881); "Anthems and Voluntaries" (1881); "Songs of Redeeming Love" (2 vols., 1882-'7); "Songs of Triumph" (1882); "Our Sabbath Home" (1884); "Melodious Sonnets" (1885); "Songs of Joy and Gladness" (Boston, 1885); "Joyful Wing" (Philadelphia, 1886); "Infant Praises" (1887); "Banner Anthem Book" (1887); "Glad Hallelujahs" (1887); and "Showers of Blessing" (1888).

The son received his classical and theological training in the Augustana institutions at Rock Island, Ill., being graduated at the collegiate department in 1877 and at the seminary in 1879. In the same year he was ordained to the ministry, and at once assumed charge of the Bethany Lutheran congregation, Lindsborg, Kan. He was the founder of Bethany college and normal institute in that town in 1880, and is its president. He was English secretary of the general council in 1886, secretary of the synodical council of Swedish Augustana synod in 1886-'7, and a member of the board of home missions for Kansas in 1884-'7. He has been editor of "Ungdoms Vaennen" in Chicago, Ill., for six years; of "Framat," Lindsborg, Kan., which he founded in 1885; "Korsbaneret," an annual (Rock Island, Ill., 1880-'6); and "Sondagsskolboken," a Sunday-school book (Chicago, 1885). From 1842 until his death he was one of the physicians to the New York hospital, and delivered courses of lectures there on diseases of the chest and kidneys. In 1853 he was appointed professor of the theory and practice of medicine in the University of the city of New York. Several years before his death he gave particular study to Bright's disease. About 1840 he became associated with Dr. John Watson as editor of the "New York Journal of Medicine." His lectures were published in the New York "Lancet," and afterward appeared in book-form, under the title "Treatise on Diseases of the Chest" (New York, 1852).

He read law in Portland, enlisted as a soldier in the Mexican war, and at its close in 1848 settled in Bloomington, Ill. He travelled the circuit in fourteen counties, and was an intimate friend of Abraham Lincoln and David Davis. In 1865 he removed to Chicago. In 1852-'61 he took an active part in politics, canvassing the state several times, and in 1858, at the special request of Mr. Lincoln, was a candidate for the legislature on the Republican ticket, and was elected by a large majority. This is the only official place he ever held. When Mr. Lincoln became president Mr. Swett was employed in the trial of government cases, one of the most noted of which was that for the acquisition of the California quicksilver-mines in 1863. In the course of his practice Mr. Swett defended twenty men indicted for murder, securing the acquittal of nineteen, and a light punishment for the other one. He was also retained in criminal cases in nearly every part of the country, though his professional work was mainly devoted to civil suits. His success was attributed to his careful personal attention to details and his eloquence as an advocate. He rendered much gratuitous service to workingmen, servants, and other poor clients. He delivered the oration at the unveiling of the statue of Abraham Lincoln in Chicago, Ill., 22 Oct., 1887, and at the Chicago Republican convention in June, 1888, in an eloquent speech, proposed Walter Q. Gresham, of Illinois, as a candidate for the presidency.

He contributed valuable articles to the scientific journals. See Charles B. Stuart's "Lives and Works of Civil and Military Engineers of America" (New York, 1871).—His brother, William Henry, engineer, b. in Taunton, Mass., 6 Nov., 1800; d. in New York city, 7 April, 1879, was graduated at the U. SWIFT, Lewis, astronomer, b. in Clarkson, N. Y., 29 Feb., 1820. He was educated at Clarkson academy, where he completed his course in 1838, and then turned his attention to farm work. His father died in 1846, and, thrown upon his own resources, he studied magnetism and electricity, and for four years lectured on these subjects in Canada and the western states. He returned to farming in 1850, but soon began again to lecture on the wonders of the microscopic world, which he illustrated by means of a calcium light. All of his apparatus was constructed by himself and parts of it were of his own invention. In 1854 he established a hardware-store in Cortland county, N. Y., which in 1872 he moved to Rochester, where he has since resided. Meanwhile, he became interested in astronomy, and, building his own telescope, he began to make observations. His first work was in 1858, on Donati's comet, and his first astronomical paper was on this subject. For years he eagerly scanned the heavens for new comets, and in 1862 the great comet of that year was discovered by him. In 1869 he observed at Mattoon, Ill., a total solar eclipse, and, making particular study of the protuberances and corona, secured some valuable results. Two years later he found another comet, but it had been seen earlier in Europe. Three times since he has caught brief glimpses of comets that no other observer has ever seen. After his removal to Rochester he discovered comets in 1877-'9, for which he thrice received the comet prize, a gold medal valued at sixty dollars, from the Imperial academy of sciences in Vienna. Hulbert H. Warner of Rochester, knowing under what disadvantages Dr. Swift was laboring in pursuing his astronomical studies, offered to build for his use an observatory, provided the people of the city would raise a sum sufficient to get him a refractor of sixteen-inch aperture. Nearly $12,000 were contributed, and the telescope is doing service in the great dome of the observatory, which, together with the attached residence for the family of the director, cost, exclusive of the instrument, nearly $100,000. In 1880 Dr. Swift found a comet with a period of five and a half years, and in 1881 he discovered two others. For the former he received a special prize of $500 from Mr. Warner, which is the largest sum ever awarded for the discovery of any heavenly body, and for the latter in 1882 he received the Lalande prize of 540 francs from the French academy of sciences. Besides the foregoing, he independently discovered Winnecke's comet in 1871, Coggia's in 1874, and the Brooks-Swift comet in 1883, there being in the latter case a difference of fifteen minutes in favor of William R. Brooks. In 1878 he observed the total eclipse of the sun at Denver, Col., and he saw at that time what he thinks were two intra-mercurial planets. His report of this discovery excited great interest and much controversy on both continents. Since he assumed in 1882 the directorship of the Warner observatory, he has found about 700 new nebulae, which entitles him to third place as discoverer of these bodies, the two Herschels alone exceeding him. The degree of Ph. D. was conferred on him by the University of Rochester in 1879. He has invented a horse hay-rake (1842); an oxyhydrogen microscope (1858); an improvement in the construction of domes (1881); and an automatic right-ascension circle (1887). Dr. Swift has been elected a fellow of the Royal astronomical society of Great Britain, and he is a member of various societies in this country. His writings have been confined to cyclopædia articles and papers that have appeared in various astronomical journals or as popular articles in the press.

SWIFT, Robert, conchologist, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., in 1799; d. in St. Thomas, W. I., 6 May, 1872. He went to South America, but in 1831 established himself as a merchant at St. Thomas, W. I. In 1866 he retired to Philadelphia, but he returned to St. Thomas the following year. His collection of shells, said to be the finest in the West Indies, was arranged in Denmark, and presented to the Smithsonian institution at Washington, D. C. The collection was valued at $30,000. He was a man of fine culture and great fondness for scientific pursuits, and was in constant correspondence with the ablest conchologists in this country in regard to his favorite study.

SWIFT, Samuel, jurist, b. in Amenia, N. Y., 3 Aug., 1782; d. in Middlebury, Vt., in 1875. He was graduated at Dartmouth in 1800, and was a tutor in Middlebury college from 1800 till 1802. He studied and practised law, was secretary of state of Vermont, judge of probate of Addison county from 1819 till 1841, and a judge of the county court in 1855-'7. Middlebury gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1860. During 1812-'13 he edited a political paper. He published "History of the Town of Middlebury" (Middlebury, 1859); "Statistical and Historical Account of the County of Addison, Vermont" (1859); and addresses.

SWIFT, Zephaniah, jurist, b. in Wareham, Mass., in February, 1759; d. in Warren, Ohio, 27 Sept., 1823. He was graduated at Yale in 1778, studied law, was admitted to the bar, and began practice at Windham, Conn. He was elected to congress, serving from 2 Dec., 1793, till 3 March, 1797, and was appointed in 1800 secretary to Oliver Ellsworth, minister to France. In 1801 he was appointed a judge of the state supreme court, and he was its chief justice in 1806-'19. He was a member of the Hartford convention of New England Federalists, sat in the state house of representatives, and was a member of a commission to revise the laws of Connecticut. He published "Oration on Domestic Slavery" (Hartford, 1791); "System of the Laws of Connecticut" (2 vols., Windham, 1795-'6); "Digest of the Laws of Evidence in Civil and Criminal Cases, and a Treatise on Bills of Exchange and Promissory Notes" (Hartford, 1810); and "Digest of the Laws of Connecticut" (2 vols., New Haven, 1822-'3).—His daughter, MARY A., published about 1833 "First Lessons on Natural Philosophy," which was a popular text-book for many years, and was translated into Karen (1846) and into Burmese (1848).

SWINBURNE, John, physician, b. in Deer River, Lewis co., N. Y., 30 May, 1820; d. in Albany, N. Y., 28 March, 1889. He was graduated at Albany medical college, and practised there. In 1861 he was appointed chief medical officer on the staff of Gen. John F. Rathbone, and placed in charge of the depot for recruits at Albany. In May, 1862, he was appointed by Gov. Edwin D. Morgan auxiliary volunteer surgeon at the front with the rank of medical superintendent, and was reappointed by

Gov. Horatio Seymour on 13 June. He was subsequently made a surgeon in the U. S. service, and assigned to duty at Savage's station. He was taken prisoner, 29 June, 1862, and offered his liberty by his captors, but preferred to remain with his patients. He was appointed by Gov. Seymour in 1864 health officer of the port of New York, reappointed by Gov. Reuben E. Fenton in 1866, and held the post six years. He was surgeon-in-chief of the American ambulance corps in Paris during the siege of that city by the German army in 1870-'1. In 1882 he was elected mayor of Albany, and in 1884 he was chosen to congress and served for one term. He was surgeon-in-chief to the Child's hospital and Homœopathic hospital at Albany, and was a frequent contributor to the medical journals and reviews. See "A Typical American, or Incidents in the Life of Dr. John Swinburne" (Albany, 1888).—His son, Louis Judson, author, b. in Albany, N. Y., 24 Aug., 1855; d. in Colorado Springs, Col., 9 Dec., 1887, went abroad with his family in 1870, and resided in Paris during the siege, his observations during that period being embodied in his "Paris Sketches" (Albany, 1875). He was graduated at Yale in 1879, and afterward resided almost entirely in Denver and at Colorado Springs in consequence of delicate health. He contributed to magazines, and had in press at his death a volume of essays entitled "English Romanticism."

SWING, David, clergyman, b. in Cincinnati, Ohio, 23 Aug., 1830. His father died in 1832, and his boyhood was mostly spent upon a farm. He was graduated at Miami university, Oxford, Ohio, in 1852, and soon began the study of theology, but before a year elapsed he was made professor of languages at Miami, where he remained twelve years, preaching occasionally in addition to his regular duties. In 1866 he accepted a call to become pastor of the 4th Presbyterian church in Chicago. In the great fire of 1871 his church edifice and the homes of most of his parishioners were swept away, but arrangements were at once made for him to preach in Standard hall and McVicker's theatre till a new building could be erected for his congregation. This was done in 1874. His audiences were large and appreciative, and his sermons and essays appeared nearly every week in the public press; but his doctrines were regarded by many as heterodox, and Prof. Francis L. Patton preferred the charge of heresy against Prof. Swing in twenty-eight specifications before the Chicago presbytery, 15 April, 1874. A trial of several weeks' duration was held, and resulted in an acquittal, but Prof. Swing withdrew from the Presbyterian church, and his congregation has since been independent. McVicker's theatre proving too small, Central music hall, the largest in the city, was built in 1878, where Prof. Swing has since continued to preach to large audiences.

SWINTON, John, journalist, b. in Salton, Haddingtonshire, Scotland, 12 Dec., 1830. He received his early education from his uncle, the Rev. Robert Currie, emigrated in 1843 to Canada, and afterward to the United States, with his family, learned the printer's trade in Montreal, and practised it for some time in New York city. He then received a course of classical instruction at Williston seminary, Mass., and afterward travelled extensively through the United States. Feeling an abhorrence for slavery, he left Columbia, S. C., where he resided at the time, in order to take an active part in the free-state contest in Kansas. He returned to New York city in 1857, and began the study of medicine. While thus engaged he contributed articles to the "Times," afterward accepted an editorial place on that paper, and soon became managing editor. During the absences of Henry J. Raymond he had the sole control, and wrote a large number of the leading articles. He resigned the post of managing editor at the close of the war, on account of impaired health, but continued his connection with the journal as an editorial writer till the death of Mr. Raymond. Subsequently he was managing editor of the New York "Sun." He became a leader in the movement for labor-reforms, and in 1883 severed his connection with the "Sun" in order to expound his political and social views in a weekly journal that he called "John Swinton's Paper," which he ceased to publish in 1887. Besides other pamphlets, he has published "New Issue: the Chinese-American Question" (New York, 1870), and also a "Eulogy on Henry J. Raymond" (1870); "John Swinton's Travels" (1880); and an "Oration on John Brown" (1881). —His brother, William, author, b. in Salton, Scotland, 23 April, 1833, was educated at Knox college, Toronto, and at Amherst, with the intention of becoming a Presbyterian minister, and in 1853 began to preach, but adopted the profession of teaching. He was professor of ancient and modern languages at the Edgeworth female seminary, Greensborough, N. C., in 1853-4, and afterward went to New York city to take a professorship in Mt. Washington collegiate institute. While in the south he contributed to "Putnam's Monthly" some critical and philosophical articles, and a series of etymological studies that were afterward published under the title of "Rambles among Words: their Poetry and Wisdom" (New York, 1859; London, 1861). Having previously contributed articles to the New York "Times," he was taken on the staff of that journal in 1858, and in 1862 went to the seat of war as a correspondent. He was equipped for this work by close study of military art, and he discussed tactical movements with such freedom that in 1864 Gen. Ambrose E. Burnside, whom he had criticised in his letters, procured an order for his exclusion from the camps of the army. He also, at a later date, incurred the displeasure of Gen. Grant. In 1867 he travelled through the southern states and collected material for a history of the war from the military and civil leaders of the Confederacy. Returning to the office of the "Times," he resumed the work of literary criticism, in which province he had gained a reputation before he became a war-correspondent. Before abandoning journalism, he published in newspaper articles and in a pamphlet an exposure of the machinations of railroad financiers to procure subsidies. In 1869 he became professor of belles-lettres in the University of California, where he remained for five years. Subsequently he made Brooklyn, N. Y., his residence, devoting himself to the composition of educational works, most of which were widely adopted in public and private schools. For a series of these, which cover most of the studies pursued in schools, he received a gold medal at the Paris exposition of 1867 "for educational works of remarkable originality and value." His principal military works are "The 'Times's' Review of McClellan: his Military Career Reviewed and Exposed" (1864); "Campaigns of the Army of the Potomac: a Critical History of Operations in Virginia, Maryland, and Pennsylvania" (1866; revised ed., 1886); "The Twelve Decisive Battles of the War: a History of the Eastern and Western Campaigns in Relation to the Actions that Decided their Issue" (1867); and "History of the New York Seventh Regiment during the War of the Rebellion" (Boston, 1870).

SWISSELM, Jane Grey, b. near Pittsburg, Pa., 6 Sept., 1815; d. in Swissvale, Pa., 22 July, 1884. When she was eight years of age her father, James Cannon, died, leaving a family in straitened circumstances. The daughter worked at manual labor and teaching till she was twenty-one, when she married James Swisshelm, who several years afterward obtained a divorce on the ground of desertion. Two years later she removed with her husband to Louisville, Ky. In this city she became an outspoken opponent of slavery, and her first written attack upon the system appeared in the Louisville "Journal" in 1842. She also wrote articles favoring abolition and woman's rights in the "Spirit of Liberty," of Pittsburg, for about four years. In 1848 she established the Pittsburg "Saturday Visitor," a strong abolition and woman's rights paper, which, in 1856, was merged with the weekly edition of the Pittsburg "Journal." In 1857 she went to St. Cloud, Minn., and established the St. Cloud "Visitor." Her bold utterances caused a mob to destroy her office and its contents, and to throw her printing-press into the river. But she soon began to publish the St. Cloud "Democrat." When Abraham Lincoln was nominated for the presidency, she spoke and wrote in his behalf and for the principles of which he was the representative. When the civil war began and nurses were wanted at the front, she was one of the first to respond. After the battle of the Wilderness she had charge of 182 badly wounded men at Fredericksburg for five days, without surgeon or assistant, and saved them all. She was a prolific writer for newspapers and magazines, and published "Letters to Country Girls" (New York, 1853), and an autobiography entitled "Half of a Century" (1881).

SWORD, James Brade, painter, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 11 Oct., 1839. His early life was spent in China, and he subsequently travelled extensively in the United States, sketching, and also in the service of the government surveys. During 1861-'2 he studied under Christian Schussele at the Pennsylvania academy. He has been president of the Philadelphia society of artists since 1878, and director of the art club since 1887. His works include "Quail Shooting," "Peep into Lake George," "Trenton Falls," "Silver-Thread Falls," "Mystery of the Sea," and "Something in the Wind."

SWORDS, Robert Smith, author, b. in New York city, 12 July, 1816; d. in Newark, N. J., 15 Jan., 1881. He was graduated at Columbia in 1834, and after studying law for three years with Daniel Lord was admitted to the bar. Soon after this he formed a partnership with Sylvester Ward which lasted ten years, when he retired from the practice of his profession, in the mean time serving during several years as judge-advocate for the city of New York. In 1849 he settled on Passaic river, opposite Belleville, N. J., and while living there was for twelve years a magistrate for Union township. Although an earnest Democrat and an opponent of the administration of President Lincoln, he placed his services at the disposal of the government, in August, 1862, was commissioned lieutenant-colonel of the 13th New Jersey volunteers, and was with his regiment in the battles of Antietam and South Mountain, being wounded in the former engagement. He resigned in 1863 and removed to Newark, N. J., where he afterward resided. For many years he was secretary of the Board of trade of Newark, and he was corresponding secretary of the New Jersey state agricultural society, treasurer of the New Jersey society for the prevention of cruelty to animals, and treasurer of the Board of proprietors of East New Jersey. In 1867 he became treasurer of the New Jersey historical society, to whose "Proceedings" he contributed a "Memoir of the Life and Character of John Rutherford" (1872); "The Bones of Columbus" (1879); "The Cathedral Church of San Domingo" (1879); and other similar papers.

SWORDS, Thomas, soldier, b. in New York city, 1 Nov., 1806; d. there, 20 March, 1886. He was a grandson of Capt. Thomas Swords, a British officer, who died in New York in 1780, and his father was the senior member of the publishing-house of T. and J. Swords, of New York city. The son was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1829, assigned to the 4th infantry, and served in various parts of the southern states for four years, when he was appointed 1st lieutenant in the 1st dragoons. He was promoted captain, 3 March, 1837, and during nearly the whole of the succeeding twelve years was engaged on frontier duty, serving with Gen. Henry Leavenworth against the Indians in the southwest, and with Gen. Stephen Kearny in the conquest of New Mexico and California, and raised the first American flag over Santa Fé. When Gen. Kearny's force reached San Diego on the Pacific coast in January, 1847, Swords, who was the quartermaster, went to the Sandwich islands and obtained clothing and supplies for the soldiers. He became captain and assistant quartermaster, 7 July, 1838, major, 21 April, 1846, and lieutenant-colonel and deputy quartermaster-general, 3 Aug., 1861. He was chief quartermaster of the Army of the West in 1846-'7, was engaged at San Pasqual, Cal., 6 Dec., 1846, and at Vera Cruz, and was brevetted lieutenant-colonel, 30 May, 1848, for meritorious services in the enemy's country. He was chief quartermaster of the Departments of the Cumberland and the Ohio in 1861-'5, was engaged in the battle of Chickamauga, and brevetted brigadier-general and major-general, U. S. army, 13 March, 1865. He was retired from active service, 22 Feb., 1869.

SYDENHAM, Charles Edward Poulett Thomson, Baron, governor-general of Canada, b. at Waverley Abbey, Surrey, England, 13 Sept., 1799; d. in Kingston, Canada, 19 Sept., 1841. He was the eldest son of a wealthy merchant, who was engaged in trading with Russia. In 1819 he became a clerk in his father's St. Petersburg house, where he was afterward a partner, and subsequently he was a partner in the London firm, and sustained losses in 1825 by investing in Mexican mines. He represented Dover in parliament from 1826 till 1830, when, being elected for that constituency and Manchester, he decided to sit for the latter. In parliament he was an early and resolute advocate of the principles of free-trade. In 1830 he was appointed vice-president of the board of trade and treasurer of the navy, and he became a member of the privy council on 23 Nov. of that year. In July, 1834, he was made president of the board of trade, but he resigned in the following November, with the rest of Lord Melbourne's ministry, and in April, 1835, when Viscount Melbourne formed a new cabinet, he resumed the same portfolio, with a seat in the cabinet, which he held till his appointment as governor-general of Canada in August, 1839. He arrived in Canada on 19 Oct., and soon afterward visited Montreal and other parts of the country, and held sessions of the legislatures of Upper and of Lower Canada. He took energetic measures to suppress the insurrections of Louis J. Papineau and William L. Mackenzie, but sought to remedy the causes of discontent. With diplomatic tact he obtained the acquiescence of both provinces in the legislative union, which was consummated when he took the oath of office on 10 Feb., 1841, as governor of Canada under the act of union that was passed by the British parliament in July, 1840. He also exerted himself to complete public works. He was raised to the peerage, 10 Aug., 1840, by the title of Baron Sydenham of Toronto, as a mark of appreciation of the successful manner in which he had administered the government of Canada. While riding near Kingston, 5 Sept., 1841, he fell from his horse and sustained injuries that, though not in themselves fatal, resulted in death. He was appointed knight grand cross of the Order of the Bath, 19 Aug., 1841. His "Memoirs" were published by his brother, George Poulett Scrope (London, 1843).

SYKES, George, soldier, b. in Dover, Del., 9 Oct., 1822; d. in Brownsville, Tex., 9 Feb., 1880. He was appointed from Maryland to the U. S. military academy, and on his graduation in 1842 was assigned to the 3d infantry, with which he served in the latter part of the Florida war, and then in the west and in Texas. He was promoted 1st lieutenant, 21 Sept., 1846, and during the Mexican war was engaged at Monterey, Vera Cruz, Cerro Gordo (where he was brevetted captain for gallantry), Contreras, Churubusco, and the capture of the city of Mexico. He was commissary of Gen. Twiggs's division in Mexico in 1847-'8, and was then on frontier and garrison duty till the civil war, taking part in skirmishes with the Apaches in 1854, and in the Navajo expedition of 1859, and reaching the rank of captain on 30 Sept., 1855. He became major of the 14th infantry, 14 May, 1861, was at the battle of Bull Run, and then commanded the regular infantry in Washington till March, 1862, and was commissioned brigadier-general of volunteers, 28 Sept., 1861. He took part in the peninsula campaign at the head of the division of regulars in Fitz-John Porter's corps, receiving the brevet of colonel for gallantry at Gaines's Mills, and in the succeeding operations of the Army of the Potomac, becoming major-general of volunteers on 29 Nov., 1862, and commanding the 5th corps after the battle of Chancellorsville. He was at the head of this corps at Gettysburg, and so continued till 20 April, 1864, when he was ordered to Kansas. At the close of the war he received the brevet of brigadier-general, U. S. army, for services at Gettysburg, and major-general for "gallant and meritorious services in the field" during the war. He had reached the regular army rank of lieutenant-colonel on 16 Oct., 1863, and on 12 Jan., 1868, he became colonel of the 20th infantry. From this time till his death he commanded various posts, and after 1877 he was in charge of Fort Brown, Tex. On motion of Senator Burnside, congress appropriated $1,000 for the removal of his remains to the cemetery at West Point, where he now lies buried, and where a fine monument has been erected to his memory by his many friends.

SYKES, James, physician, b. near Dover, Del., 27 March, 1761; d. there, 18 Oct., 1822. His father, James, held several offices in the state during and after the Revolution, and was a delegate to congress in 1777-'8. The son studied at Williams college, and afterward attended medical lectures at Philadelphia. After four years' practice at Cambridge, Md., he returned to Dover, where he became renowned as a surgeon. From 1814 till 1820 he resided in New York. He was often a member of the state senate, over which he presided for nearly fifteen years, and he was acting governor of Delaware in 1801-'2.

SYLVESTER, Herbert Milton, author, b. in Lowell, Mass., 20 Feb., 1849. He was fitted to enter college at Bridgeton academy, Bridgeton, Me., but entered the law-office of William Pitt Fessenden in Portland, and was admitted to the bar in April, 1872, and settled in Boston, Mass. He has the reputation of being a good landscape artist. He has published "Prose Pastorals" (Boston, 1887) and "Homestead Highways" (1888), and is now (1888) engaged upon a novel descriptive of New England country life. He has in press "Purpoock," dealing with the early settlement of Casco bay, a nature-book entitled "Fallow Fields," and a boy's book of adventure.

SYLVESTER, James Joseph, English author, b. in London, England, 3 Sept., 1814. He was graduated at Cambridge, became a professor of natural philosophy at University college, London, and was made a member of the Royal society in 1839. He came to this country and held the chair of mathematics in the University of Virginia in 1841-'2, and was appointed to a similar professorship at the Royal military academy, Woolwich, in 1855. He was professor of mathematics at Johns Hopkins university, Baltimore, in 1876-'83, and in December, 1883, was elected Savilian professor of geometry at Oxford. He is a member of many learned societies both in Europe and this country, received the medal of the Royal society in 1860, and the Copley medal in 1880, and has been the recipient of honorary degrees from various colleges. He was the founder and the first editor of the "American Journal of Mathematics," is the author of a large number of important scientific memoirs, 112 of which, published previous to 1863, are in the Royal society's index of scientific papers. He has given a theory of versification in a volume entitled "Laws of Verse" (London, 1870); has invented the plagograph, an instrument which, in addition to altering the magnitude of an object, possesses the property of rotating its image through any desired angle; the geometrical fan, which has been applied to the construction of a cheap astronomical spectroscope; and other geometrico-mechanical instruments. He has developed a method of transferring circular into rectilinear or parallel motion, based upon the discovery of a French engineer, thereby adding immensely to the resources of the mechanician. In December, 1885, Prof. Sylvester made known his theory of reciprocants, which, it is claimed, more than doubles the resources of algebra.

SYLVESTER, Nathaniel Bartlett, author, b. in Denmark, Lewis co., N. Y., 22 Feb., 1825. Both his grandfathers were soldiers of the Revolution. He received his early education at the Denmark academy, studied law at Lowville, N. Y., and was admitted to the bar at Oswego, N. Y., 5 April, 1852. He founded in 1856 and edited for two years a newspaper at Lowville, N. Y., which is still published there as the "Lewis County Democrat," and in 1866, having been appointed a commissioner of the U. S. circuit court, he removed to Troy, N. Y., where he now (1888) resides. He is the author of "Historical Sketches of Northern New York and the Adirondack Wilderness" (Troy, 1877); "History of Saratoga County, N. Y." (Philadelphia, 1878); "History of Rensselaer County, N. Y." (1879); "History of the Connecticut Valley in Massachusetts" (Troy, 1879); "History of Ulster County, N. Y." (Philadelphia, 1880); "Indian Legends of Saratoga and the Upper Hudson Valley" (1884); and "Historical Narratives of the Upper Hudson, Lake George, and Lake Champlain" (Philadelphia, 1888).

SYLVIE, Édouard (sil-vee), French naturalist, b. in Riom, Auvergne, in 1670; d. in Lyons in 1739. He studied in the College Louis le Grand at Paris, entered the church, and was appointed by the king to a rich abbey in Lyons. Devoting his leisure time to the study of mathematics and natural history, he presented several valuable memoirs to the Academy of sciences, which induced that body to propose him to the king for a mission to South America. Louis XIV. placed a man-of-war at Sylvie's disposal in order to facilitate his work, and from 1701 till 1703 he visited Santo Domingo and several ports of the Caribbean sea, prepared a chart of the Gulf of Mexico, and made valuable observations. In the following year he visited Guiana, Brazil, Montevideo, and Buenos Ayres, landed on Staten island, and made the ascent of its snowy range of mountains. Doubling Cape Horn, he coasted Chili and Peru to Callao, and, penetrating into the interior, explored the Andes. Sylvie afterward returned to the West Indies, and sojourned several months in Santo Domingo, occupied in drawing a map of the French part of the island. His vessel arrived at La Rochelle, 15 Oct., 1710, and Sylvie's valuable collections were presented to the Academy of sciences, which elected him a corresponding member. His works include "Explications de l'herbier et des collections rapportées d'Amérique par l'Abbé Édouard Sylvie" (3 vols., Paris, 1711-'13); "Relation d'un voyage de la mer du Sud aux côtes de la Guiane, du Brésil, de la Terre des États, du Chili et du Pérou, avec une description de la côte septentrionale du détroit de Le Maire" (3 vols., 1714-'16); "Voyage à travers le Golfe du Mexique, suivi d'une description des îles Antilles de l'Amérique, et en particulier de l'île de Saint Domingue" (2 vols., 1720-'1); and "Journal des observations d'un voyage au Pérou et au Chili" (5 vols., 1726-'8).

SYMINGTON, Andrew James, Scottish author, b. in Paisley, Scotland, 27 July, 1825. He was educated at the grammar-school of his native place, began his literary career at an early age, and in 1844 contributed translations of German poetry and original verses to Tait's "Edinburgh Magazine." In 1859 he accompanied President Paul A. Chadbourne, of Williams college, on a visit to Iceland, and gave the results of his journey in "Pen and Pencil Sketches of Farøe and Iceland" (London, 1861). In 1874-'5 Mr. Symington spent a year in this country, and contributed to several American journals. As author of Blackie and Sons' series of "Men of Light and Leading" in 1880, he wrote, among other lives, "William Cullen Bryant, with Selections from his Poems and other Writings," and "William Wordsworth: a Biographical Sketch, with Selections from his Writings in Poetry and Prose" (2 vols., Glasgow, 1881). In 1881 he prepared selections from the speeches of President Garfield for a series of works entitled "Talks with the People by Men of Mark." He has been an extensive traveller, in 1863 was elected a fellow of the Royal society of northern antiquaries, Copenhagen, and in 1882 a corresponding member of the New York genealogical and biographical society. Among other works he has published "Harebell Chimes, or Summer Memories and Musings" (1848); "The Beautiful in Nature, Art, and Life" (1857); "The Reasonableness of Faith" (1870); "Thomas Chalmers: the Man, his Time and Work" (1878); and "Capital Hints to Boys" (1884). Several of Mr. Symington's books have been republished in this country.

SYMMEs, John Cleves, jurist, b. on Long Island, N. Y., 21 July, 1742; d. in Cincinnati, Ohio, 26 Feb., 1814. He was a delegate from Delaware to the Continental congress in 1785 and 1786, a judge of the superior court of New Jersey, and afterward chief justice of the same state. In 1787 he was appointed judge of the Northwest territory. In 1788 he obtained from the government a grant of 1,000,000 acres, bounded south by the Ohio, and west by the Miami, and was the founder of the settlements of North Bend, and Cincinnati thereon. His wife was a daughter of Gov. William Livingston, and his daughter Anna became the wife of William H. Harrison.—His nephew, John Cleves, soldier, b. in New Jersey in 1780; d. in Hamilton, Ohio, 28 May, 1829, entered the army as an ensign in the 1st infantry, 26 March, 1802, was a captain in the war of 1812, and served with credit at the battle of Niagara and in the sortie from Fort Erie. He subsequently resided at Newport, Ky., and devoted himself to philosophical pursuits. In 1818 he promulgated his theory that the earth is a hollow sphere, habitable within, and open at the poles for the admission of light, and containing within it six or seven concentric hollow spheres, also open at the poles. He wrote and spoke on the subject of his singular hypothesis, and petitioned congress in 1822 and 1823 to fit out an expedition to test the truth of his theory. During the winters of 1826-'7 he lectured on it before the students and faculty of Union college; but it was received with general ridicule, and the supposed aperture at the north pole was popularly called "Symmes's hole." He published "Theory of Concentric Spheres" (Cincinnati, 1826). An abstract of Symmes's theory and arguments appeared in the "Atlantic Monthly" for April, 1873. In 1876 Symmes's son, AMERICUS VESPUCCIUS, revived his theory.—Another nephew of the first John Cleves, Peyton Short, poet, b. in Sussex county, N. J., in 1793; d. in Mount Auburn, near Cincinnati, Ohio, 27 July, 1861, went to Ohio in his childhood as a pioneer, became registrar of the land-office at Cincinnati in 1827, and in 1830-'50 was a member of the board of health of that city. He was one of the trustees of the old Cincinnati college, and a supporter of the Western college of teachers which met annually at Cincinnati from 1833 till 1845. He wrote a life of his uncle, not yet published.

SYMMEs, Zechariah, clergyman, b. in Canterbury, England, 5 April, 1599; d. in Charlestown, Mass., 4 Feb., 1671. He came from England in 1634, and was ordained as teacher in the church at Charlestown, Mass., on 22 Dec. of that year, succeeding Thomas James as pastor when the latter was dismissed on 11 March, 1636. During his ministry the Antinomian controversy culminated in the banishment of John Wheelwright and the dismissal of his adherents from the church. See "The Symmes Memorial," containing a sketch of his life and a genealogy, by John Adams Vinton (Boston, 1873).—His grandson, Thomas, clergyman, b. in Bradford, Mass., 1 Feb., 1678; d. 6 Oct., 1725, was graduated at Harvard in 1698, and was minister of Boxford from December, 1702, till 1708, when he succeeded his father, Zechariah, as second minister at Bradford. He possessed a strong mind and much learning, and, besides occasional sermons, published "Joco-Serious Dialogue on Singing" (1723); and "Historical Memoirs of the Fight at Piggwacket, 9 May, 1725," with a sermon on the death of Capt. John Lovewell (1725; republished with notes by Nathaniel Bouton, Concord, N. H., 1861). See an account of his life by Rev. John Brown, to which is appended his advice to his children and to the members of his church (1726).

SYMONDS, William Law, author, b. in Raymond, Cumberland co., Me., in April, 1833; d. in New York city, 18 Jan., 1862. He was graduated at Bowdoin in 1854, studied theology at Cambridge divinity-school for two years, and occupied the pulpit of a Unitarian church in Chicopee, Mass., for several months. He then went to New York city and engaged in literary pursuits, contributing to magazines and newspapers, and producing many hundred cyclopædic articles on philosophical, historical, and biographical subjects. He also took charge temporarily of the Astor library.

SYNGE, Millington Henry, British author, b. in England about 1820. He was a captain of royal engineers, and was employed on the works at Ottawa in 1848. He published "Canada in 1848" (London, 1848); "Great Britain One Empire" (1852); "The Country vs. The Company" (1861); and "The Colony of Rupert's Land" (1863).

SYPPER, Josiah Rhinehart, journalist, b. in Liverpool, Perry co., Pa., 12 April, 1832. He was graduated at Union college in 1858, and, after making a tour of the United States, studied law and was admitted to the bar at Lancaster, Pa., in 1862. While he was travelling he contributed to the Lancaster "Express," and he was its associate editor while studying law. In 1862 he was engaged as war-correspondent of the New York "Tribune," and he was afterward in charge of the correspondence in the Army of the Potomac. In the winter of 1865 he became associate editor of the "Tribune," and in 1870 he established the "Pennsylvania State Journal" at Harrisburg, but at the end of six months he resumed the practice of law in Philadelphia. He has advocated public education and temperance reform, and, in addition to articles for the press and several school-books, has published "History of the Pennsylvania Reserve Corps" (Lancaster, 1865), and "School History of Pennsylvania" (Philadelphia, 1868).

SZABAD, Emeric, author, b. in Hungary about 1822. He was secretary under the Hungarian national government in 1849, was a friend of Louis Kossuth, and gained his first experience as a soldier in his native country. He subsequently served in Italy under Garibaldi, and at the opening of the civil war came to this country and was appointed on the staff of Gen. John C. Frémont. He served through the war, being on the staff of Gen. Daniel E. Sickles at Gettysburg, and afterward on that of Gen. Gouverneur K. Warren. He wrote a series of letters on the United States army and its management for the New York "Tribune," and has published "Hungary, Past and Present" (London, 1854); "State Policy of Modern Europe from the Beginning of the Sixteenth Century to the Present Time" (2 vols., 1857); and "Modern War: its Theory and Practice" (New York, 1863).

SZKOLNY, John, Polish navigator of the 15th century. His name was also variously written Scolve, Skolnus, and Kolno. He was commander of a Danish vessel on which, according to different accounts, he reached the northwestern coast of Greenland, or the coast of Labrador, in 1476.

TABARET, Joseph Henry, Canadian educator, b. in Saint-Marcellin, department of L'Isère, France, 10 April, 1828; d. in Ottawa, 28 Feb., 1886. He studied theology, was ordained a priest at Marseilles, came to Canada as a missionary of the Oblates in 1851, and in 1853 established a school at Ottawa, which, under his superintendence, has developed into the University of Ottawa. He was president of this institution at his death, and had been at its head, both as a school and college, since its foundation, except in 1866-'7, when, as provincial of Oblates of North America, he visited the Oblate missions in Canada and the United States. In 1854 the governor-general nominated him a member of the senate of Toronto university. He was a member of the council of public instruction of Ontario. In 1862 he was made vicar-general of Ottawa, and in 1879 he received the degree of D. D. from the pope. He introduced a comprehensive system of study into Ottawa university.

TABOADA, Antonio (tah-bo'-ah-dah), Argentine soldier, b. in the province of Santiago del Estero, 31 Aug., 1815. He began life as a journalist, and, being persecuted for his liberal tendencies by the dictator Rosas, emigrated to Montevideo. He served later under Gen. Lavalle, took part in the campaign in the province of Entre-Ríos, was captured after the defeat at Quebracho-Herradó, and imprisoned in Buenos Ayres, but escaped in disguise to Chili. Later he returned secretly to his province, where he lived quietly till Rosas's downfall, and in 1852 became its governor. He put down an insurrection at Tucuman, and defeated with a few hundred men a division of 5,000 under Gen. Gutierrez. In 1856 he escorted through the Chacó desert the U. S. exploring expedition under Lieut. Thomas J. Page, and they explored the Salado river as far as Santa Fé, Taboada concluding also in the course of the voyage arrangements with the principal caciques that assured peace along the borders. In 1861 he supported Dr. Derqui and contributed to terminate the strife between the governors of the provinces and the central government. He was elected senator in 1865, and commanded the army in 1867 against the insurgents in the northern provinces, defeating Felipe Varela at Pozo de Vargas. In 1868 he was a candidate for president, but was defeated.

TABOR, Horace Austin Warner, senator, b. in Holland, Orleans co., Vt., 30 Nov., 1830. He received a common-school education, and learned the trade of a stone-cutter in Massachusetts, but in 1855 he removed to Kansas and engaged in farming, and was an active member of the Free-soil party. In 1856 he was a member of the Topeka legislature that was dispersed at the point of the bayonet by order of President Pierce. In 1859 he removed to Colorado, and the following spring he settled in California Gulch (now Leadville). There he worked in the mines until 1865, when he engaged in business, and combined both occupations till May, 1878. During the latter month August Rische and George F. Hook, to whom he had advanced money, discovered what was afterward known as the "Little Pittsburg" mine. By the terms of his agreement, Mr. Tabor was entitled to a one-third interest, which he sold the following year for $1,000,000. This capital he invested in mines, banking stock, and other remunerative property, which greatly increased his wealth. In October, 1878, he was elected the first lieutenant-governor of Colorado, and he held the office until January, 1884. He was chosen U. S. senator to fill the unexpired term of Henry M. Teller, resigned, and served from 2 Feb. till 4 March. Besides the investments mentioned above, Senator Tabor has purchased 175,000 acres of copper lands in Texas, and 4,600,000 acres of grazing lands in southern Colorado, and is interested in irrigating canals and other enterprises that give employment to a large number of laborers. He has also obtained from the republic of Honduras a grant of every alternate section of land for 400 miles bordering on the Patook river. On this tract are immense groves of mahogany, ebony, and similar valuable woods, orchards of bananas and other tropical fruits, together with deposits of gold, silver, and coal. In addition to the section-grant, he has secured a mineral grant of 150 square miles in the interior. Altogether Mr. Tabor is probably one of the largest owners of land in the world.

TAC, Sixtus Le, French missionary, b. in France in 1649; d. in Canada, 6 July, 1699. He belonged to the Recollet Franciscan order, came to Canada on 9 July, 1676, and had charge of Charlesbourg, near Quebec, till 1678. He then went to Three Rivers, where he remained till 13 May, 1683. During this time he kept a register of all baptisms, marriages, etc., in Three Rivers, as well as of those that occurred in settlements that extended over a wide tract of country. This register has often been found useful in connection with local and general Canadian history. In 1684 he was appointed director of the third order of St. Francis and master of novices in the Convent of Notre Dame des Anges near Quebec. In 1689 he took part in founding missions at Placentia and other places in Newfoundland. He complained that the governor of that colony threw every kind of difficulty in his way, and sailed for France the same year to obtain redress, but returned to Canada in 1690 or 1691. He wrote a history of Canada which long remained in manuscript, but it was edited and published by Eugene Reveilland with notes and appendix. The appendix consists of original documents heretofore unpublished, some of which are very valuable. The work is entitled "Histoire de la Nouvelle France, ou Canada, depuis sa découverte (mil cinq cents quatre) jusqu'en l'an mil six cents trente deux" (Paris, 1888).

TACHÉ, Sir Étienne Paschal (tah-shay), Canadian statesman, b. in St. Thomas, Lower Canada, 5 Sept., 1795; d. there, 29 July, 1865. He served during the war of 1812, and afterward studied medicine and practised successfully till 1841, when he entered parliament. He was deputy adjutant-general in 1847-'8, commissioner of public works in 1848-'9, and on 21 April, 1856, was made speaker of the legislative council, which post he resigned in November, 1857. In November, 1858, in recognition of his services he was knighted by the queen at Windsor castle, and was appointed jointly with Sir Allan N. MacNab to the honorary rank of colonel in the British army, and aide-de-camp to the queen. He published "Du développement de la force physique chez l'homme" (Montreal, 1829), "Réflexions sur l'organisation des volontaires" (Quebec, 1863), and "Bataille navale du Lac Champlain en 1814."—His nephew, Joseph Charles, Canadian author, b. in Kamouraska, Quebec, 24 Dec., 1820, studied at the Seminary of Quebec, was graduated as a physician in 1844, and was for some time attached to the Marine hospital at Rimouski. He sat in the legislative assembly from 1847 till 1857, and represented Canada at the Paris exhibition of 1855, and at that of London in 1867. He was a member of the board of prison-inspectors and deputy minister of agriculture and statistics, contributed largely to the Canadian press, and was editor of the "Courrier du Canada" from 1857 till 1859. Mr. Taché was British delegate from Canada at the International sanitary conference of 1881 at Washington, and has been on several important commissions in Canada. He received the degree of D. L. from Laval university in 1883, and the confederation medal in 1886. He has taken an active part in charitable and religious movements in Canada. While Canadian commissioner at the Paris exhibition in 1855, he published "Esquisse sur le Canada," a work that deals with the past and present condition of the country. Its object was to make Canada better known in France, especially as a field of emigration, and in this respect it was very successful. His other works are "Notice historiographique sur la fête célébrée à Québec le 16 juin, 1859, jour du 200^{me} anniversaire de l'arrivée de Mgr. de Laval en Canada" (Quebec, 1859); "L'Canada et l'exposition universelle" (1856); "La pléiade rouge," a political satire (1854); "Le défricheur de langue," a burlesque tragedy in verse; "Ténure seigneuriale en Canada, et projet de commutation, suivi de tableaux relatifs aux fiefs et seigneuries du Bas-Canada" (1854); and "Des provinces de l'Amérique du Nord et d'une union fédérale" (1858). He was one of the founders of the "Soirées Canadiennes," in which he published two purely literary works entitled "Trois légendes de mon pays, ou l'évangile ignoré, l'évangile prêché, l'évangile accepté," and "Forestiers et voyageurs." —Joseph Charles's brother, Alexander Antonine, Canadian R. C. archbishop, b. in Rivière-du-Loup, Canada, 23 July, 1823, was graduated at the College of St. Hyacinth, and studied theology in the Seminary of Montreal. He returned to St. Hyacinth as professor of mathematics, but, after teaching a few months, went to Montreal and became a monk of the Oblate order. He volunteered at once for missionary service among the Indians of the Red river, and, after a journey of sixty-two days, during which he encountered sufferings and privations of every kind, reached St. Boniface on 25 Aug., 1845. He was raised to the priesthood on 12 Oct. following, being the first priest ordained on the banks of the Red river. In July, 1846, he set out for Île-à-la-Crosse, and, after spending a few months at this mission, he went to labor among the Indians that lived around the lakes, several hundred miles to the northwest. On one of his journeys he slept for sixty nights in the open air in winter, and he often travelled thirty or forty leagues with the temperature twenty-five or thirty degrees below zero, in the hope of converting a single Indian. His zeal and talents became known throughout Canada, and, although only twenty-six years old, he was recommended for the post of coadjutor bishop of St. Boniface in 1850. He was summoned to France by the superior of the Oblate Fathers, and consecrated bishop of Arath in partibus in the cathedral of Viviers on 23 Nov., 1851. After a visit to Rome he returned to Canada in February, 1852, and on 10 Sept. reached Île-à-la-Crosse, which he had determined to make the centre of his labors in the northwest. He set about founding new missions, obtained missionaries, male and female, to aid him, and many schools, colleges, convents, and chapels were built. Bishop Taché's efforts were directed also to the establishment of a French-

Canadian population in the northwest, and he has done much to develop and strengthen the feeling of French-Canadian nationality among the inhabitants of the Red river country. He became bishop of St. Boniface, 7 June, 1853. In 1869 he laid the grievances of the Métis before the Canadian government, and endeavored, without success, to persuade the latter not to make any changes in the political situation of the inhabitants of the Red river without consulting them. He then sailed for Italy in order to take part in the council of the Vatican at Rome. Meanwhile the troubles came to a crisis, and the Canadian ministry, alarmed at the attitude of the Métis, and regretting too late that they had not followed his advice, begged him to come to their assistance. He at once returned to Canada, and reached the Red river on 9 March, 1870, empowered, in the name of the imperial and Dominion governments, to offer a full pardon for all political offences committed during the insurrection. St. Boniface was erected into a metropolitan see on 22 Sept., 1871, and Bishop Taché was appointed archbishop. He has written "Vingt années de missions dans le nord-ouest de l'Amérique" (Montreal, 1866), and "Esquisse sur le nord-ouest de l'Amérique" (Montreal, 1869). The latter has been translated into English by Capt. D. R. Cameron, and is considered the most complete work on the resources of the Red river, the nature of its products, and the different races of men and animals that inhabit the country. Archbishop Taché is a contributor to the "Annales de la propagation de la foi," published by the Oblate Fathers in France.

TACÓN, Miguel (tah-cone'), Spanish soldier, b. in Cartagena, Colombia, in 1777; d. in Madrid, Spain, in 1855. He first served in the navy, but in 1806 he entered the army with the commission of lieutenant-colonel. He was appointed in 1809 governor of Popayan. When the Spanish possessions in South America began to rise against the home government, Tacon took the field against the patriots, and, having been defeated in Palacé, 5 April, 1811, he fled to Peru, where he remained until 1819. He was then made brigadier and sent to Spain by the viceroy of Peru to inform the Madrid government of the bad condition of the struggle against the patriot forces. He was appointed governor of Malaga, and in 1834 was made lieutenant-general and appointed governor-general of Cuba. During his administration, from 7 June, 1834, to 23 April, 1838, he did much that was good together with many acts of despotism. He repressed the criminal classes, reformed the morals of the island greatly, and suppressed corruption among public officers and servants of the government. He caused the construction of sewers in Havana, paved the streets of the city, built a great prison, encouraged the construction of a theatre, which was named for him, established several public markets, lighted the streets, and erected many public buildings. But during his administration the slave-trade increased greatly, and more slaves were introduced into Cuba in the four years of his rule than in any other equal period. He afterward returned to Spain, and was appointed senator for Cadiz in 1852, but his failing health did not permit him to accept office.

TAFEL, Johann Friedrich Leonhard, educator, b. in Sulzbach, Würtemberg, Germany, 6 Feb., 1800. He was graduated at Tübingen in 1820, and was professor for many years at the gymnasia of Stuttgart, Ulm, and Schorndorf, introducing the Hamiltonian interlinear method of teaching languages, and editing several periodicals, among which was the "Beobachter," a daily paper devoted to the interests of the Liberal party (1849-'53). He came to this country in 1853, was for three years professor in Urbana university, Ohio, and then removed to St. Louis, Mo. He is the author of several text-books of ancient and modern languages, translated into German the works of Xenophon and Dion Cassius, and select novels of Charles Dickens, William M. Thackeray, and James Fenimore Cooper, and published "Staat und Christenthum" (Tübingen, 1851); "Der Christ und der Atheist" (Philadelphia, 1856); and with his son, Ludwig H. Tafel, a "German-English and English-German Pocket Dictionary" (1870).—His son, Rudolph Leonhard, educator, b. in Ulm, Germany, 24 Nov., 1831, came to the United States in 1847, and in 1860-'1 was teacher of French and German in Washington university, St. Louis, Mo. He held the chair of modern languages and comparative philology there from 1862 till 1868, and since the last-named year has been a Swedenborgian minister in London, England. He has published "Latin Pronunciation and the Latin Alphabet" with his father (New York, 1860); "Investigation into the Laws of English Pronunciation and Orthography" (1862); and "Emanuel Swedenborg as a Philosopher and Man of Science" (Chicago, 1867).

TAFT, Alphonso, jurist, b. in Townshend, Vt., 5 Nov., 1810. He was graduated at Yale in 1833, was tutor there in 1835-'7, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1838, and after 1840 practised in Cincinnati, Ohio, where he won reputation in his profession. He was early a member of the city council, and also for many years of the Union board of high-schools. He was a delegate to the Republican national convention in 1856, and in the same year a candidate for congress, but was defeated by George H. Pendleton. He was judge of the superior court of Cincinnati from 1866 till 1872, when he resigned, to associate himself in practice with two of his sons. In 1875 he was a candidate for the Republican nomination for the governorship, but a dissenting opinion that he had delivered on the question of the Bible in the public schools was the cause of much opposition to him. The opinion that defeated his nomination was unanimously affirmed by the supreme court of Ohio, and is now the law of the state. He became secretary of war, on 8 March, 1876, on the resignation of

Gen. William W. Belknap, and on 22 May following was transferred to the attorney-generalship, serving till the close of President Grant's administration. Judge Taft was appointed U. S. minister to Austria, 26 April, 1882, and in 1884 was transferred to Russia, where he served until 1 Aug., 1885. He has been a trustee of the University of Cincinnati since its foundation, and in 1872-'82 served on the corporation of Yale, which gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1867.

TAFT, Lorado, sculptor, b. in Elmwood, Peoria co., Ill., 29 April, 1860. He was graduated at Illinois state university, Champaign, Ill., in 1879, studied at the École des beaux arts, Paris, during 1880-'3, and afterward with Marius Jean Antoine Mercié and others for two years. He has executed several busts and medallions, a statue of Schuyler Colfax, which was unveiled in Indianapolis in 1888, and reliefs for Michigan regimental monuments on the Gettysburg battle-field. He is engaged on a statue of Gen. Grant for Fort Leavenworth, Kansas. Mr. Taft is instructor in sculpture at the Chicago art institute.

TAGGART, Samuel, clergyman, b. in Londonderry, N. H., 24 March, 1754; d. in Colerain, Mass., 25 April, 1825. His father, James, came from Ireland to this country when he was eleven years old. The son entered the junior class in Dartmouth, where he was graduated in 1774, was licensed to preach in the Presbyterian church in 1776, and on 19 Feb., 1777, was ordained and installed as pastor of a church in Colerain, Mass. In 1802 he performed in western New York a missionary journey of about three months, his manuscript journal of which is still preserved. In 1802 he was elected to congress as a Federalist, and served, by repeated re-election, from 1803 till 1817. His protracted absences from his charge caused dissatisfaction, and in 1818 he resigned his pastorate, though he afterward preached occasionally. When he entered congress, John Randolph of Roanoke, on learning that Mr. Taggart was a clergyman, instantly quoted to him from I. Samuel, xvii., 28: "With whom hast thou left those few sheep in the wilderness?" Mr. Taggart was absent-minded and eccentric, but possessed a very retentive and accurate memory. While he was in college he was reprimanded for inattention by a professor, who had seen him catching flies during a lecture, but in his vindication the boy immediately repeated a great part of what his instructor had said. He published an oration on the death of Washington (1800); a Fourth-of-July oration at Conway (1804); "Scriptural Vindication of the Doctrine of the Final Perseverance of all True Believers" (1801); a "Treatise on the Evidences of Christianity" (1811); an address to his constituents on the subject of impressments (1813); and sermons and speeches.

TAGLIABUE, Giuseppe, instrument-maker, b. near Como, Italy, 10 Aug., 1812; d. in Mount Vernon, N. Y., 7 May, 1878. He was educated at the village school, and was sent to Como to learn cabinet-making. In 1826 he went to London, where he was apprenticed to a firm of meteorological and philosophical instrument-makers. He settled in New York in 1833, and soon acquired the reputation of being one of the most competent instrument-makers in this country. His hydrometer for the proving of whiskey was adopted by the U. S. internal revenue department in preference to all others, and he made instruments for the U. S. coast survey. He made a great variety of hydrometers, including original forms and new adaptations to meet the requirements of the advancement of science and manufacture. Several of the self-record-

TAILFER, Patrick, colonist, lived in the 18th century. He was a physician and emigrated to the new colony of Georgia, but became dissatisfied with the conduct of affairs there, and in September, 1740, left the province and went to Charleston, S. C. Here, with Hugh Anderson, David Douglass, and others, he printed "A True and Historical Narrative of the Colony of Georgia in America from the first Settlement thereof until the Present Period" (Charles-Town, 1741; reprinted, London, 1741). In this he accuses Gen. James Oglethorpe of selfishness, greed, and despotism. Prof. Moses Coit Tyler says: "As a polemic it is one of the most expert pieces of writing to be met with in our early literature. It never blusters or scolds. It is always cool, poised, polite, and merciless." But many authorities call it spiteful and scurrilous, and speak of Tailfer as "chief of a club of malcontents."

TAIT, Arthur Fitzwilliam, painter, b. at Livesey Hall, near Liverpool, England, 5 Aug., 1819. He studied at the Royal institution, Manchester, but is mainly self-taught. In 1850 he came to the United States, where he soon attracted attention by his pictures of animal life. He was elected an associate of the National academy in 1853, and an academicien in 1858. Mr. Tait has studied and sketched much among the Adirondack mountains, and several of his hunting scenes are laid in that region. His pieces include "A Duck and her Young" (1868); "Ruffled Grouse" (1869); "Woodcock Shooting," "Snowed in," and "Halt on the Carry" (1871); "Racquette Lake" (1873); "There's a Good Time coming" (1876); "The Portage"; "Jack in Office" (1885); "Thoroughbreds" and "Startled" (1887); and "A Mother's Solicitude" (1888). His "Quail and Young" (1856) is in the Corcoran gallery at Washington. Many of his works have been lithographed or engraved.

TAIT, Charles, senator, b. in Louisa county, Va., in 1768; d. in Wilcox county, Ala., 7 Oct., 1835. He removed at an early age to Georgia, was associated with William H. Crawford in the management of Richmond academy, and then, having been admitted to the bar, practised law with success. He was judge of the western circuit of Georgia from 1803 till 1809, and in the latter year was chosen to the U. S. senate as a Democrat in place of John Milledge, who had resigned. He served from 28 Dec., 1809, till 3 March, 1819, when he removed to Wilcox county, Ala., having been appointed a judge of the U. S. district court for that state. He resigned this office in 1826. Judge Tait was an able supporter of the administrations of Madison and Monroe.

TAIT, John Robinson, artist, b. in Cincinnati, Ohio, 14 Jan., 1834. He was graduated at Bethany college, Va., in 1852, after which he went to Europe, remaining for three years. At this time he devoted himself mainly to literature, sketching and painting as an amateur. He published "Dolce Far Niente" (Philadelphia, 1859), and "European Life, Legend, and Landscape" (1860). In 1859 he went abroad again, and studied at Düsseldorf under August Weber and Andreas Achenbach until about 1871. He received the first-class medals at the Cincinnati industrial exhibition in 1871 and 1872. In 1873 he made a third visit to Europe, working for several years in the Tyrol and in Munich, under Adolf Lier and Hermann Baisch. In 1871 he returned to the United States, and since 1876 he has resided in Baltimore. As a member of the committee of the second Cincinnati exposition, he designed the art hall. His works include "Siebengebirge" (1865); "Lake of Wallenstadt" and "Meyringen" (1866); "Lake of Four Cantons" (1866), in the Cincinnati art museum; "Norwegian Waterfall" (1869); "Solitude" (1871); "A Rainy Day" (1874); "Under the Willows"; "Vesper Hour" and "Tyrolean Cottage," both exhibited at the salon (1876); and "Noon" (1877). His "Crossing the Brook" and "Landscape and Cattle" were at the Centennial exhibition, Philadelphia. He has contributed to magazines, and has written a comedy in German, "Ein aufrichtiger Heirathsgesuch."

TALAMANTES, Melchor (tah-lah-man'-tays), Peruvian geographer, b. in Lima about 1750; d. in Vera Cruz, Mexico, in 1809. He studied theology in the University of San Marcos, Lima, and, after receiving the degree of D. D., entered the military religious order of Merced, in which he soon rose to the rank of superior of his province. His favorite study was geography, in which he soon became an acknowledged authority, and on his way to Spain in 1806 he stopped in Mexico, to study documents regarding the colonization of the northern provinces. He was commissioned by the viceroy, Iturrigaray, to determine the boundary of the viceroyalty with the former French possession of Louisiana, and between the latter and Florida. While occupied in this work, he was implicated in Iturrigaray's plans of secession, and on the latter's deposition, 15 Sept., 1808, Talamantes was arrested and transported to Vera Cruz, where he died of yellow fever. His manuscript, "Apuntamientos para deslindar los justos límites de las posesiones Españolas de la América septentrional con las Francesas," came into the possession of his collaborator, José Pichardo, who used the notes and completed the work.

TALAVERA Y GARCES, Mariano (tah-lah-vay-rah), Venezuelan R. C. bishop, b. in Coro, 22 Dec., 1777; d. in Caracas, 23 Dec., 1861. In 1791 he was sent to the University of Caracas, where he studied theology, received the degree of D. D., and was ordained in 1797. In 1806 he became secretary of the bishop of Merida, who sent him as vicar to Barinas, and in 1808 he was appointed rector of the seminary of Merida. When the war for independence opened in 1810, he took part in it, and was elected a member of the supreme junta of Merida, but in 1812, when the armies of the republic were defeated, he was forced to emigrate to New Granada. In 1815 he was imprisoned by the Spanish authorities, but pardoned and retired to Coro, whence, after the liberation of New Granada, he went to Bogota, and in 1822 Gen. Santander appointed him dean of the cathedral. In 1826 he was elected to congress for Coro, and in 1828 confirmed by the pope as bishop of Tricala and vicar of Guayana. From 1830 till 1832 he was exiled, having refused to take the unconditional oath to support the constitution. In 1842 he resigned the bishopric and was appointed councillor of state, which place he also resigned, after the attack on congress of 24 Jan., 1848, and retired to private life. He was considered the greatest pulpit orator of Colombia, and one of the most learned men in the church of South America.

TALBOT, Ethelbert, P. E. bishop, b. in Fayette, Mo., 9 Oct., 1848. His early education was received in the schools of his native town. He was graduated at Dartmouth in 1870, and at the General theological seminary, New York, in 1873, was ordered deacon in the Church of the Transfiguration, New York, 29 June, 1873, and ordained priest in St. Mary's church, Fayette, Mo., 4 Nov., 1873, both by Bishop Robertson. He was at once made rector of St. James's church, Macon, Mo., which post he held until his election to the episcopate. He opened a parish school in Macon in September, 1875, which afterward became St. James's military academy, a diocesan school for boys. He twice represented the diocese of Missouri in general convention, and was rural dean and a member of the standing committee of the diocese. He was consecrated, 27 May, 1887, missionary bishop of Wyoming and Idaho. He received the degree of LL. D. from the University of Missouri in 1887, that of S. T. D. from the General theological seminary, New York city, in 1887, and that of D. D. from Dartmouth in 1888.

TALBOT, Isham, senator, b. in Bedford county, Va., in 1773; d. near Frankfort, Ky., 25 Sept., 1837. He removed with his father to Kentucky in his youth, and settled near Harrodsburg, where he obtained his early education. He studied law with George Nicholas, and began to practise in Versailles, Woodford co., but soon removed to Frankfort, where he advanced to the front rank of his profession. He was chosen to the state senate in 1812, and served there till 1815, when he was elected to the U. S. senate to fill the unexpired term of Jesse Bledsoe, resigned. He retained his seat from 2 Feb., 1815, till 3 March, 1819, and was chosen again on the resignation of William Logan, serving from 27 Nov., 1820, till 4 March, 1825.

TALBOT, John, colonial Anglican bishop, b. in Wymondham, England, in 1645; d. in Burlington, N. J., 29 Nov., 1727. He was graduated at Cambridge in 1663, became a fellow of Peter house in 1664, held the rectory of Freetherne in the diocese of Gloucester, and in 1702 became chaplain of the ship "Centurion," which brought to this country Keith and Gordon, the first missionaries of the Society for propagating the gospel in foreign parts. He was appointed a missionary of that society in September of the same year, and was associated with Keith as long as the latter remained in this country. He continued to labor zealously for twenty years, being in charge of St. Mary's, Burlington, N. J., from 1703, and its rector after 1709, during all which period he had been importunate to have a bishop appointed for America. Despairing of this, he went to England and was induced to receive consecration clandestinely from Dr. Ralph Taylor and Robert Welton, non-juring bishops, and returned to this country in 1722. For two years he was unmolested, but at the end of that period, being exposed, he was discharged from the service of the society, and ordered by the governor to "surcease officiating," because he refused to take the oath of allegiance or use the prayers for the royal family. Affixed to his widow's will in the registrar's office in Philadelphia was discovered, in September, 1875, his episcopal seal, a mitre, with flowing ribbons, and beneath it, in large script letters, ingeniously wrought into a monogram, the full name—John Talbot. An enlarged photograph of this seal (see illustration) was copied in brass, placed on a mural tablet with a suitable inscription, and unveiled with religious ceremonies by the Rev. George Morgan Hills, D. D., in old St. Mary's church, Burlington, N. J., on the 151st anniversary of Talbot's death.

TALBOT, John Gunnell, naval officer, b. in Danville, Ky., 16 Aug., 1844; d. near Kilihiikai, Sandwich islands, 19 Dec., 1870. He entered the navy as a midshipman, 15 April, 1862, and was graduated at the naval academy, 2 June, 1866. He was promoted to ensign, 12 March, 1868, to master, 26 March, 1869, and to lieutenant, 21 March, 1870. Lieut. Talbot was the executive officer of the "Saginaw" when she was wrecked on Ocean island, French Frigate shoals, on 29 Oct., 1870. There was a heavy surf, and the vessel was a total loss. All the officers and crew, numbering ninety, escaped without loss of life, but the surf prevented them from saving sufficient provisions, so that it was necessary to put them on quarter rations. The strictest discipline was maintained, and fish and the eggs of sea-birds contributed to their supplies. The captain's gig was fitted out to send to Honolulu, the nearest port, 1,200 miles distant, for relief, since the island is in such an unfrequented part of the ocean that there was no hope of rescue by a passing vessel. Lieut. Talbot and four men—Peter Francis, James Muir, John Andrew, and William Halford—volunteered to go in the boat. They left the island at noon on 18 Nov., and sighted Kauai, the most northwesterly of the Sandwich islands, on 16 Dec., but, owing to unfavorable winds and bad weather, they did not reach the shore until the morning of the 19th. They were all so exhausted by the prolonged privations and sufferings that Lieut. Talbot and two of the crew were drowned in the surf. James Muir became insane after he had been assisted to the shore by the sole survivor, and he died while the latter, William Halford, went to get assistance from the natives. Halford met some missionaries, and sailed to Honolulu, where he communicated with the American minister, who promptly sent a chartered steamer to the relief of the shipwrecked crew. Talbot's ability in handling and navigating his boat has been greatly admired. A tablet has been placed in the chapel of the naval academy to commemorate his heroic service.

TALBOT, Joseph Cruikshank, P. E. bishop, b. in Alexandria, Va., 5 Sept., 1816; d. in Indianapolis, Ind., 15 Jan., 1883. He was of Quaker parentage and was educated at Pierpont academy, Alexandria. In 1835 he removed to Louisville, Ky., where he engaged in business for several years. His religious convictions then became so changed that he abandoned Quakerism and united with the Protestant Episcopal church, being baptized in 1837. In 1841 he became a candidate for holy orders, studying under the direction of the bishop. He was made deacon in Christ church, Louisville, 5 Sept., 1846, by Bishop Smith, and ordained priest in St. John's church, Louisville, 6 Sept., 1848, by the same bishop. During his diaconate he organized St. John's church, and upon his ordination to the priesthood he became its rector. After a service of seven years he removed, in 1853, to Indiana, and became rector of Christ church, Indianapolis, which post he held until he was elected to the episcopate. The honorary degree of D. D. was conferred upon him by the Western university of Pennsylvania at Allegheny City in 1854, and that of LL. D. by the University of Cambridge, England, in 1867. In 1859 he was elected by the house of bishops missionary bishop of the northwest, a newly organized jurisdiction, covering nearly 900,000 square miles. He was consecrated to that office in Christ church, Indianapolis, 15 Feb., 1860. In 1865 he was elected assistant bishop of Indiana, and was translated to that diocese in October of that year. Upon the death of Bishop Upfold in 1872 he became bishop of Indiana. His writings include sermons, addresses to the convention, pastoral letters, and a few articles in periodicals.

Jose Talbot

TALBOT, Silas, naval officer, b. in Dighton, Bristol co., Mass., in 1751; d. in New York city, 30 June, 1813. As a boy he served in coasting vessels, and during the excitement before the Revolutionary war he raised a small company. When the news of the battle of Lexington reached Rhode Island he was commissioned by that state as a captain, and joined the patriot army in the siege of Boston. After the British army had evacuated the town, he accompanied the expedition to Rhode Island, after which he joined the army under General Washington in 1776. He then planned an attack by fire-ship on the British fleet in New York harbor. For this purpose he went up Hudson river above Fort Washington, where he waited three days for a favorable opportunity to drift down with the fire-ship, which was filled with combustibles and besmeared with turpentine. Talbot and his crew succeeded in setting fire to the British ship "Asia," and all escaped to the Jersey shore, though he was severely burned. The "Asia" was saved from destruction by the assistance of the other vessels. On 10 Oct., 1777, the Continental congress gave him a vote of thanks, and he was promoted to the rank of major. He was wounded in the hip during an engagement with the British vessels in Delaware river below Philadelphia, and in the following year participated in the operations against the British at Newport. On 27 Oct., 1778, he fitted out a small sloop and captured the British blockading schooner "Pigot," with eight guns and forty-five men, off Newport, R. I., for which he received the thanks of congress and was promoted to lieutenant-colonel. Subsequently he planned similar operations against British vessels on the coast, and was associated with Gen. Lafayette in one of these hazardous attacks. Congress passed a resolution promoting him to the grade of captain in the navy, 17 Sept., 1779, and issued specific orders for him to arm a naval force to protect the coast of Long Island sound, and to keep open the communications for supplies for Gen. Horatio Gates's army. He fitted out his former prize, the "Pigot," and the sloop "Argo," and sailed in command, under orders from Gen. Gates, in May, 1779, from Providence, R. I. Soon after clearing the coast he captured the British schooner "Lively" and two British privateers, which he took to Boston. On 5 Aug. he captured a schooner of four guns, and on 7 Aug. he had a desperate fight with the brig "King George," twelve guns, which he won by boarding. On 24 Aug. he captured the sloop "Adventure," and the next day the brig "Eliot." He subsequently captured the British ship "Dragon" after a severe fight, in which his speaking-trumpet was pierced by bullets and the skirts of his coat were shot off. Congress again recognized his brilliant services, and urged that he be placed in command of a naval vessel; but none such was available, and, as the owners of the "Argo" claimed their ship, he took command of the private armed ship "George Washington," in which he was captured by a British fleet when he was becalmed. He was confined in the prison-ship at New York, and also in the "Old Sugar-house" prison in New York city. In November, 1780, he was put on board the "Yarmouth," where he was kept in the hold, unable to stand upright. In this vessel, subjected to great cruelties, he made a winter voyage of seven weeks to England. Here he made three attempts to escape, and after each attempt was confined for forty days in a dungeon on half rations. Benjamin Franklin and John Jay effected his exchange for a British officer in France, and he landed at Cherbourg in December, 1781. He sailed from France in a French brig which was captured by the British privateer "Jupiter" when fifteen days out; but the British captain transferred him to an English brig on her way from Lisbon to New York. Owing to litigation connected with one of his prizes, he removed to Philadelphia, and soon afterward he went to New York, where he bought an estate northwest of Albany and engaged in agricultural pursuits. He served as a representative of this district in congress in 1793-4. He was commissioned captain in the navy, 11 May, 1798, and took command of one of the squadrons in the West Indies during the war with France. He commanded the "Constitution" as his flag-ship, and from her planned the expedition of the "Sally," manned by men from the "Constitution," under Lieut. Isaac Hull, to cut out the French privateer "Sandwich," at Port Platte, Santo Domingo. After the war with France he had a dispute with Com. Truxton in regard to seniority, which he settled by resigning his commission, 21 Sept., 1801. It is said that he was wounded thirteen times, and carried five bullets in his body. He was buried in Trinity churchyard, New York city. See a "Historical Sketch" of his life (New York, 1803), and "Life of Silas Talbot," by Henry T. Tuckerman (1850).

TALBOT, Thomas, governor of Massachusetts, b. in Cambridge, Washington co., N. Y., 7 Sept., 1818; d. in Lowell, Mass., 6 Oct., 1886. He was a lineal descendant of John Talbot, first Earl of Shrewsbury. His grandfather came to this country from Ireland in 1807. He was left an orphan at the age of six, and in 1825 went to Northampton, Mass., with his mother, where after 1830 he worked in a woollen-factory. In 1835 he entered the broad-cloth-factory of his brother Charles, in Williamsburg, and in 1838 became an overseer. In that year and 1839 he attended school during the winter terms. In 1840 he entered into partnership with his brother, in Billerica, Mass., where he afterward resided. The business rapidly increased, and the brothers accumulated a fortune. Mr. Talbot was for many years in the Massachusetts legislature, sat in the governor's council in 1864-'9, and in 1872 was chosen lieutenant-governor, as a Republican. On the election of Gov. William B. Washburne to the U. S. senate in 1873 he became governor. He vetoed the bill to repeal the prohibitory law, and approved that to enact the ten-hour law, thus arousing prejudices that deprived him of his election in 1874, but in 1878 he was chosen, by a majority of 15,000, over Benjamin F. Butler and Josiah G. Abbott, candidates of the two wings of the Democratic party, and served till 1880. Gov. Talbot did much to promote the interests of the town of Billerica, and gave liberally to churches of all denominations, building a fine edifice for the Baptist society.

TALCOTT, John, colonist, b. in Braintree, Essex co., England, about 1600; d. in Hartford, Conn., in March, 1660. He came to this country with the Rev. Thomas Hooker's company in the "Lyon," which arrived in Boston on 16 Sept., 1632, was admitted a freeman by the general court in Boston on 6 Nov., 1632, and in 1634 was a representative in that body for Newtown. He owned four houses in the "west end" of the town, which he sold to Nicholas Danforth on 1 May, 1636, to remove with Mr. Hooker's colony to Connecticut. His was the first house that was erected in Hartford. He was active in all the affairs of the town, was one of the committee that was appointed on 1 May, 1637, to consider the propriety of a war with the Pequot Indians, and was a chief magistrate of the colony until his death. His name is inscribed on the monument that has been erected by the citizens of Hartford to perpetuate the memory of the colonists of Connecticut.—His son, John, soldier, b. in Braintree, England, about 1630; d. in Hartford, Conn., 23 July, 1688, came to Boston with his father, and removed with him to Hartford. He was made ensign of colonial troops in 1650, and became captain in 1660, was elected a deputy, or assistant magistrate, of the colony of Connecticut before it was joined to New Haven, and was made treasurer to succeed his father, holding this office from 1660 till 1676. He was one of the patentees named in the charter granted to Connecticut on 20 April, 1662, by Charles I., and the document was intrusted to him with Hezekiah Wyllis and John Allyn for safe-keeping. At the opening of the Indian war of 1676 he was appointed to the command of the army with the rank of major, and in June of that year went into the field at the head of the "standing army" of Connecticut accompanied by 200 Mohicans and Pequots. He scoured the country as far as the falls above Deerfield, inflicted severe blows upon the hostile tribes, and saved Hadley from the attack of 700 Indians. He also performed good service among the Narragansetts, and fought a successful battle at the Houssatonnuc, killing the sachem of Quabaug. Early in the war he was promoted lieutenant-colonel, and he was known as the "Indian fighter." In March, 1662, the general court granted to him and John Allyn 600 acres of upland and 100 acres of meadow-land, to be laid out in Hammonaset (now Killingsworth). Many of his official papers are preserved among the state records in Hartford, and contain interesting notes regarding the war with King Philip.—Another son, Samuel, soldier, b. in Newtown (now Cambridge), Mass., about 1634; d. in Wethersfield, Conn., 10 Nov., 1691, was graduated at Harvard in 1658, and made a freeman in 1662. His father settled him upon land that he owned in Wethersfield, of which town the son was commissioner from 1669 till 1684. From 1670 till 1684 he was deputy to the general court, of which he was secretary in October, 1684, during the absence of Col. John Allyn. On 16 May, 1676, he was appointed "one of a standing committee to order measures and dispose of such affairs as shall be necessary to attend to in the intervals of general court." He was made lieutenant of the Wethersfield trained band on 12 May, 1677, lieutenant of the troop, 14 Oct., 1679, and afterward captain of the troop of Hartford county. He was an original proprietor of the town of Glastonbury, and the lot that he purchased in 1643 is still owned by his descendants.—The second John's son, Joseph, governor of Connecticut, b. in Hartford, Conn., 16 Nov., 1669; d. there, 11 Oct., 1741, became assistant in 1711, and in that year was appointed one of a committee to lay out the town of Coventry. In 1724 he was made governor of Connecticut, serving until his death, and he was the first native of Connecticut to hold this office.—Samuel's great-grandson, George, soldier, b. in Glastonbury, Conn., 6 Dec., 1786; d. in Albany, N. Y., 25 April, 1862, entered the 25th infantry, 10 July, 1813, and became deputy commissioner of ordnance, with rank of captain, 5 Aug., 1813. He was made 1st lieutenant, 14 March, 1814, transferred to the 2d artillery, 1 June, 1821, became lieutenant-colonel of ordnance, 30 May, 1832, and colonel and chief of ordnance on 25 March, 1848. He was brevetted major on 5 Aug., 1823, for ten years' faithful service in one grade, and brigadier-general on 30 May, 1848, for meritorious conduct, particularly in performing his duties in prosecuting the war with Mexico. On 6 Nov., 1850, he wrote a letter, without the sanction of the secretary of war, containing instructions to Col. Benjamin Huger, commandant of the arsenal at Fort Monroe, regarding the purchase of ammunition. Upon this authority Col. Huger entered into a contract with Dr. Edward Carmichael for the purchase of a large amount of shot and shells. For this offence Gen. Talcott was tried by court-martial, found guilty, and dismissed from the army, to date from 8 July, 1851. The sentence was pronounced illegal and unjust by many well-known persons, who endeavored unsuccessfully to reinstate him in the army. After the decision of the court a "Review" to show the error of the judgment was written by Hon. John C. Spencer (Albany, 1851). This review contains the following facts, elicited from the evidence given before the court: That the letter from Gen. Talcott to Col. Huger, of 6 Nov., 1850, referred to above, appears to have been the moving cause of the difficulty between the secretary and Gen. Talcott. That this letter was not intended by the general to authorize Col. Huger to make a contract with Dr. Carmichael, or any other person, but to direct Col. Huger to procure, by "open purchase"—a system known to have been in use for many years in all the departments—such an amount of shot and shells as he might from time to time require for the public service. Huger, misunderstanding the authority given in the letter, made a contract with Carmichael for a large amount of these articles, but did not immediately advise the general of what he had done. In the mean time the secretary of war, Charles M. Conrad, had been informed that a contract had been made with Carmichael, who had tried to dispose of it to the Tredegar iron-works for a large amount, and asked the general in a casual way if "there were any contracts out for shot and shells," to which the general answered in the negative. This was before Col. Huger's report had reached the ordnance department. The question was repeated at a second interview, still before the reception of the report, and was answered in the same manner. As soon as Gen. Talcott received the report he called upon the secretary, and to the question again he answered: "No, sir, none recognized by the department." Before this last interview the general had written to Col. Huger, disapproving of what he had done, that he, Huger, had misunderstood his instructions. He repudiated the transaction and disallowed the contract. Gen. Talcott's honesty was not impeached, his faithful disbursement of many millions of government funds during his long official life of thirty-eight years, and his eminent services during the war with Mexico, could not be denied, but had no weight in the finding of the court. The question probably arose from a misunderstanding which might have been amicably settled without loss of honor to either party.—George's brother, Andrew, engineer, b. in Glastonbury, Conn., 20 April, 1797; d. in Richmond, Va., 22 April, 1883, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1818, became 2d lieutenant in the engineer corps, and after serving a year on construction duty accompanied Gen. Henry Atkinson as engineer on an expedition to establish military posts on upper Missouri and Yellowstone rivers. He was appointed 1st lieutenant on 1 Oct., 1820, and in 1821-'4 engaged in constructing the defenses of Hampton Roads, Va. He was also superintending engineer of operations preliminary to fortifying Brenton's Point (now Fort Adams, R. I.) and New Utrecht (now Fort Hamilton, N. Y.), and engaged in the construction of Fort Delaware in 1825-'6. In 1826-'8 he was engineer of canals through the Dismal Swamp, Va., and from 1828 till 1835 he was superintending engineer on the forts at Hampton Roads, Va., also acting as astronomer in determining the boundary-line between Ohio and Michigan. He became captain on 22 Dec., 1830, and in 1834-'6 was in charge of the improvement of Hudson river. On 21 Sept., 1836, he resigned his commission to become a civil engineer, and surveyed and constructed various railroads, examined navy-yards, and marked the northern boundary of Iowa. In 1857 he became engineer for a railroad across Mexico, which was organized under the presidency of Don Antonio Escandon, and surveyed the line from Vera Cruz to the city of Mexico; but, owing to political events, the operations of this company were suspended, and Col. Talcott returned to the United States. In 1861 he was appointed chief engineer of Virginia, but in 1862 he returned to Mexico and resumed his office as chief engineer of the railroad from Mexico to the Gulf. A new company was formed with the aid of British capital and under the imperial government of Mexico, and the work of the railroad was prosecuted in 1865-'6, but on the change of government in 1867 his direction of the work ceased. Needing some supplies for the work, he came with the president to New York, where he was seized by the government officials and confined in Fort Lafayette as a spy, and accused of planning and constructing the fortifications around Richmond. He was transferred to Fort Adams, in Boston harbor, and kept there by the order of Gen. John E. Wool until Gen. John A. Dix was put in command of the Eastern military department. Gen. Dix, who knew him well and believed in his loyalty to the U. S. government, had him brought to New York, listened to his statement, and released him. After a visit to Europe he spent the remainder of his life in retirement in Baltimore and Richmond. He was a fine mathematician, and in 1833 devised "Talcott's method" for determining territorial latitudes by the observation of stars near the zenith, contriving a suitable modification of the zenith instrument for the purpose.—George's son, George Henry, soldier, b. in New York city, 16 July, 1811; d. in Indian Springs, near Augusta, Ga., 8 June, 1854, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1831, assigned to the 3d artillery, and was brevetted 1st lieutenant, 1 Dec., 1835, for gallant conduct in the war against the Florida Indians. He was then transferred to the ordnance corps, in which he was made 1st lieutenant on 9 July, 1838. He was appointed captain of infantry and major of voltigeurs on 9 April, 1847, and served at Vera Cruz and Molino del Rey, receiving the brevet of lieutenant-colonel for gallant and meritorious conduct in the latter battle, where he received severe wounds, which hastened his death.—Another son of George, Sebastian Vischer, engineer, b. in New York city, 24 Nov., 1812, entered Yale in 1829, but left college in his sophomore year, and, becoming a civil engineer, was employed by the U. S. government on the survey of the boundary between the United States and Canada, and on the improvement of Hudson river at Albany. He was also engaged in the primary surveys of the Erie railroad near its western terminus at Dunkirk, and also on the survey of the northeastern boundary, the improvement of the mouth of the Mississippi river, and the coast survey. On the election of Horatio Seymour as governor of New York in 1862, Talcott was appointed by him quartermaster-general of the state, with the rank of brigadier-general, and served through the administration. He compiled and published "The Talcott Pedigree" (Albany, 1876); and "Genealogical Notes of New York and New England Families" (1883).

TALCOTT, Mancel, merchant, b. in Rome, N. Y., 12 Oct., 1817; d. in Chicago, Ill., 4 June, 1878. He attended the common schools till he was seventeen years old, when he set out for the west, travelling on foot from Detroit to Chicago and thence to Park Ridge, Ill., where he worked at farming till 1850. The discovery of gold took him to California, where he remained till he had accumulated enough to establish himself in business, when he returned and formed a life-long partnership with Horace M. Singer, of Chicago, in the stone business. Mr. Talcott contributed freely toward public charities and the relief of humanity.—His wife, Mary H. (Oris), b. in Watertown, N. Y., about 1820; d. in Chicago, Ill., 17 April, 1888, married Mr. Talcott, 25 Oct., 1841. She was in full sympathy with her husband, and after his decease carried on his charitable work. Neither of them desired to make known what they had done in the way of charity, and were careful never to allude to favors they had bestowed on those in need. During the last ten years of her life she distributed at least $300,000 in charity and for the support of the Universalist society, of which she and her husband were members. During the last two years of her life she founded and supported two homes or day-nurseries where poor laboring women could leave their children in careful hands while they were at work. In making her will Mrs. Talcott, after bequeathing a liberal part of her estate of $450,000 to her relatives, directed that the residue be equally divided into three parts and placed in trust with her three nieces to distribute as each might think best for religious, educational, or charitable purposes.

TALIAFERRO, Benjamin, soldier, b. in Virginia in 1750; d. in Wilkes county, Ga., 3 Sept., 1821. He served in the Revolutionary army in the rifle corps commanded by Gen. Daniel Morgan, and participated in the battles of Saratoga and Monmouth and in the siege of Savannah, and was taken prisoner by the British at the surrender of Charleston, 12 May, 1780. Afterward he settled in Georgia, was a member of the state senate, and a delegate to the Constitutional convention of 1798. Elected to congress, he served from 2 Dec., 1799, till his resignation in 1802. Subsequently he was judge of the superior court.

TALIAFERRO, John, member of congress, b. in Spottsylvania county, Va., in 1768; d. at "Hagley," King George co., Va., 12 Aug., 1853. He was elected to congress from Virginia as a Democrat, serving from 1801 till 1803, and from 1811 till 1813. He was again chosen to fill a vacancy in 1824, and served from 8 April of that year till 3 March, 1831, and again from 1835 till 1843. He was a presidential elector in 1805 on the Jefferson ticket and in 1821 on the Monroe ticket, and served as librarian of the treasury department in Washington in 1850-'3.

TALIAFERRO, William Booth (tol'-li-ver), soldier, b. in Belleville, Gloucester co., Va., 28 Dec., 1822. He was educated at Harvard and at William and Mary college, where he was graduated in 1841. He became captain in the 11th U. S. infantry, 9 April, 1847, major of the 9th infantry, 12 Aug., 1847, and was mustered out, 26 Aug., 1848. At the beginning of the civil war he was made colonel in the provisional army of Virginia, 1 May, 1861, and he rose to be brigadier-general in the Confederate service, 4 March, 1862, and major-general, 1 Jan., 1865. He commanded the Confederate troops in 1861 at Gloucester point, Va., took part in the engagements at Carrick's Ford, Va., 13 July, and in most of the battles of the Army of Northern Virginia to March, 1863, when he was placed in charge of the district of Savannah, Ga. TALLMADGE, Benjamin, soldier, b. in Brookhaven, N. Y., 25 Feb., 1754; d. in Litchfield, Conn., 7 March, 1835. His father, Benjamin, was a clergyman. After graduation at Yale in 1773 the son had charge of a high-school in Wethersfield until 20 June, 1776, when he was appointed lieutenant and adjutant in a Connecticut regiment and served throughout the Revolutionary war. On 15 Dec., 1776, he was appointed by Gen. Washington captain in the 2d light dragoons, and he was promoted major on 7 April, 1777. A separate detachment for special services was committed to him

several times during the war, and he then received his orders directly from the commander-in-chief. He participated in the battles of Short Hills and Brandywine, and at Germantown his detachment was at the head of Gen. John Sullivan's division. By order of Gen. Washington, Maj. Tallmadge repeatedly threw his dragoons across the principal thoroughfare to check the retreat of the infantry. He was stationed with his troops at Valley Forge in 1777, reconnoitred the country between Schuylkill and Delaware rivers, and served at Monmouth. On 5 Sept., 1779, he became colonel, and performed a brilliant exploit in crossing Long Island sound to Lloyd's Neck, L. I., where he surprised and captured 500 Tory marauders without the loss of a man. In 1780 he planned and conducted the expedition that resulted in the taking of Fort George at Oyster Bay, L. I., and the destruction of the British stores on the island, for which service he received the thanks of congress. He was for some time a member of Washington's military family and carried on with him an important confidential correspondence in 1778-'83. Col. Tallmadge had the custody of Maj. John André until his execution, and walked with him to the scaffold, where they bade an affectionate farewell. Years afterward Tallmadge wrote: "I became so deeply attached to Major André that I can remember no instance where my affections were so fully absorbed in any man. When I saw him swinging under the gibbet it seemed for a time as if I could not support it." After the war he returned to Litchfield, where he engaged successfully in mercantile pursuits. He was elected to congress as a Federalist and served from 7 Dec., 1801, till 3 March, 1817. Col. Tallmadge was made the first treasurer and subsequently president of the Connecticut Society of the Cincinnati, and was much esteemed for his social qualities and numerous gifts to public and private charities. In 1782 he bought the property in Litchfield that is still known as the Tallmadge Place, and is now the summer residence of his granddaughter, Mrs. William Curtis Noyes. Yale gave him the degree of M. A. in 1778. He prepared his "Memoirs at the Request of his Children," which were printed privately by his son, Frederick Augustus Tallmadge (New York, 1859). Col. Tallmadge married the daughter of Gen. William Floyd, a signer of the Declaration of Independence.—His son, Frederick Augustus, lawyer, b. in Litchfield, Conn., 29 Aug., 1792; d. there, 17 Sept., 1869, was graduated at Yale in 1811, studied law at the Litchfield law-school, was admitted to the bar, and began practice in New York. During the closing months of the war with Great Britain he commanded a troop of volunteer cavalry on Long Island. He was made an alderman of New York in 1834, a common councilman in 1836, and was a state senator from 1837 till 1840, serving as president of that body and at the same time as ex-officio judge of the supreme court of errors. In 1841-'6 he was recorder of New York, and he held this office again from 1848 till 1851. He was elected to congress as a Whig and served from 6 Dec., 1847, till 3 March, 1849. From 1857 till 1862 he was general superintendent of the Metropolitan board of police, and in 1862-'5 he was clerk of the court of appeals. Afterward he practised law in New York city. He became best known for the energy that he displayed while he was recorder in suppressing the Astor place riot of May, 1849. (See FORREST, EDWIN.)—Another son, WILLIAM SMITH, served as a colonel in the war of 1812.

TALLMADGE, James, lawyer, b. in Stanford, Dutchess co., N. Y., 28 Jan., 1778; d. in New York city, 29 Sept., 1853. His father, Col. James (1744 to 1821), led a company of volunteers at the capture of Gen. John Burgoyne. After graduation at Brown in 1798 the son studied law, was admitted to the bar, and practised several years in Poughkeepsie and New York, and also gave attention to agriculture, owning a farm in Dutchess county. For some time he was private secretary to Gov. George Clinton, and during the war of 1812-'15 he commanded a company of home-guards in the defence of New York. He was elected a representative to congress as a Democrat, and served from 1 Dec., 1817, till 3 March, 1819, but declined a re-election. In that body he defended Gen. Andrew Jackson's course in the Seminole war, and introduced, as an amendment to the bill authorizing the people of Missouri to form a state organization, a proposition to exclude slavery from that state when admitted to the Union. In support of this amendment Gen. Tallmadge delivered a powerful speech, 15 Feb., 1819, in opposition to the extension of slavery. This was widely circulated, and was translated into German. He was a delegate to the New York constitutional conventions of 1821 and 1846, a member of the state assembly in 1824, and delivered a speech on 5 Aug., 1824, on the bill to provide for the choice by the people of presidential electors. In 1825-'6 he was lieutenant-governor of New York, and while holding this office he delivered a speech at the reception of Lafayette in New York on 4 July, 1825. In 1836 he visited Russia, and aided in introducing into that country several American mechanical inventions, especially cotton-spinning machinery. From 1831 till 1850 he was president of the American institute, of which he was a founder. He also aided in establishing the University of the city of New York, which gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1838, and he was president of its council for many years. Gen. Tallmadge was a leading exponent of the Whig doctrine of protection to American industry, and published numerous speeches and addresses which were directed to the encouragement of domestic production. He also delivered a eulogium at the memorial ceremonies of Lafayette by the corporation and citizens of New York, 26 June, 1834. Gen. Tallmadge was an eloquent orator and vigorous writer. His only daughter was one of the most beautiful women in the country, and after her return from Russia, to which court she accompanied her father, married Philip S. Van Rensselaer, of Albany, third son of the patroon. Their only surviving son, James Tallmadge Van Rensselaer, is a well-known lawyer of New York city.

TALLMADGE, Nathaniel Pitcher, senator, b. in Chatham, N. Y., 8 Feb., 1795; d. in Battle Creek, Mich., 2 Nov., 1864. He was graduated at Union in 1815, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1818, and served in the lower house of the legislature in 1828, and in the state senate in 1830-'3. He was then elected to the U. S. senate, and served from 2 Dec., 1833, till 17 June, 1844, when he resigned. In 1844 he was appointed governor of Wisconsin territory, changing his residence from Poughkeepsie, N. Y., to Fond du Lac, but he was removed in 1846. Mr. Tallmadge became a convert to spiritualism. He published several speeches and contributed an introduction and appendix to Charles Linton's "Healing of the Nations" (New York, 1855).—His son, Grier, soldier, b. in Dutchess county, N. Y., in 1826; d. in Fort Monroe, Va., 11 Oct., 1862, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1848, assigned to the 1st artillery, and served on garrison duty in the west. In 1861 he was made captain in the quartermaster's department at Fort Monroe, discharging also the duties of assistant adjutant-general. The "contraband" idea put into practice by Gen. Benjamin F. Butler is said to have originated with him.

TALLMAN, Peleg, merchant, b. in Tiverton, R. I., 24 July, 1764; d. in Bath, Me., 12 March, 1840. He received a public-school education, and at the age of fourteen entered the privateer service against Great Britain. He served on the "Trumbull," lost an arm in the engagement between this vessel and the "Watt" in 1780, and was captured and imprisoned in England and Ireland in 1781-'3. Subsequently he became master of a vessel and afterward a merchant at Bath, where he acquired a fortune. He was elected to congress as a Democrat, served from 4 Nov., 1811, till 3 March, 1813, but declined a re-election and refused to support the war with England.

TALMADGE, Matthias Burnet, lawyer, b. in Stamford, Dutchess co., N. Y., 1 March, 1774; d. in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., 7 Oct., 1819. He was graduated at Yale in 1795, studied law with Chief-Justice Spencer at Hudson, N. Y., and began the practice of his profession at Herkimer. While residing there he represented his county in the legislature, and the western district of New York in the state senate. Having been appointed judge of the U. S. district court for New York, he removed to New York city, where he won distinction as a jurist. In 1811 he united with the Baptist church in Poughkeepsie, and thenceforth became active in the enterprises of that denomination. He married Elizabeth, daughter of Gov. George Clinton.

TALMAGE, John Van Nest, missionary, b. in Somerville, N. J., 18 Aug., 1819. He was graduated at Rutgers in 1842 and at New Brunswick seminary in 1845, in which year he was licensed by the classis of Philadelphia. Since 1846 he has been a missionary of the Reformed church in China. Rutgers gave him the degree of D. D. in 1867. He has translated several books of the Bible into the Amoy colloquial dialect, and is the author of a "Chinese-English Dictionary" (1888).

—His brother, Thomas De Witt, clergyman, b. in Bound Brook, N. J., 7 Jan., 1832, was educated at the University of the city of New York in the class of 1853, but was not graduated. After graduation at New Brunswick theological seminary in 1856, he was ordained pastor of the Reformed Dutch church in Belleville, N. J. He had charge of the church in Syracuse, N. Y., from 1859 till 1862, and of one in Philadelphia in 1862-'9. During the civil war he was chaplain of a Pennsylvania regiment, and he is now chaplain of the 13th New York regiment. In 1869 he was made pastor of the Central Presbyterian church in Brooklyn, N. Y., which post he still holds. In 1870 his congregation erected a new semicircular church of wood and iron capable of seating 3,400 persons. This building, known as the Brooklyn Tabernacle, was enlarged in 1871 so as to seat 500 more, but it was destroyed by fire on 22 Dec., 1872. On 22 Feb., 1874, a new Tabernacle was dedicated. It is in the Gothic style, with seats for 5,000 persons, and is the largest Protestant church in this country. In 1872 he organized in the building that was formerly occupied by his congregation a lay college for religious training. He is a popular lecturer, and appears once a week in this capacity. He attracts large audiences and his sermons are published weekly in nearly 600 religious and secular journals in this country and in Europe, being translated into various languages. The University of the city of New York gave him the degree of A. M. in 1862, and he received that of D. D. from the University of Tennessee in 1884. In addition to numerous lectures and addresses and sketches and light essays on moral subjects, which have been printed in magazines and weekly papers, he has edited "The Christian at Work" (New York, 1873-'6); "The Advance," of Chicago (1877-'8); and he now conducts "Frank Leslie's Sunday Magazine." Dr. Talmage has published "The Almond-Tree in Blossom" (Philadelphia, 1870); "Crumbs swept Up" (1870); "Sermons" (4 vols., New York, 1872-'5); "Abominations of Modern Society" (New York, 1872; 2d ed., 1876); "One Thousand Gems, or Brilliant Passages and Anecdotes" (1873); "Old Wells dug Out" (1874); "Around the Tea-Table" (Philadelphia, 1874); "Sports that Kill" (New York, 1875); "Every-Day Religion" (1875); "Night Sides of City Life" (1878); "Masque torn Off" (1879); "The Brooklyn Tabernacle, a Collection of 104 Sermons" (1884); and "The Marriage Ring" (1886). Two other brothers are ministers—the Rev. Dr. JAMES R. of the Congregational, and the Rev. GOVY of the Reformed Dutch church.

TALMAGE, Samuel Kennedy, educator, b. in Somerville, N. J., in 1798; d. in Midway, Ga., 2 Oct., 1865. He was graduated at Princeton in 1820 and was tutor there in 1822-'5. From 1838 till 1841 he was professor of ancient languages at Oglethorpe university, of which he was president from 1841 until his death. Princeton gave him the degree of D. D. in 1845. He contributed to the "Southern Presbyterian Review," and published several sermons and addresses.

TALON, Indian chief, b. about 1675. He was also called JEAN LE BLANC and OUTOUTAGA, the latter being probably his real name. He was chief of the Ottawas du Sable, and an able orator. His eloquence gave him great influence, and he was spokesman for the Indian allies of the French in their conference with Callières, the French governor of Canada in 1701. In 1706 the Ottawas made an attack on Detroit, and having seized the Recollet chaplain of the fort, Father Constantin, were about to slay him, when Talon saved him from death and begged him to ask the commandant to stop firing on them, as they had no designs on the fort, but only on the Miamis, who were protected by it. He retired shortly afterward with his tribe to Mackinaw. In June, 1707, he set out for Montreal, as the spokesman of the Ottawa chiefs. He made a long harangue to Vaudreuil, the governor, in which he stated that the trouble at Detroit had been occasioned by the commandant, Bourgmont, who refused him an audience no less than seven times. Vaudreuil refused to make peace until the surrender of Le Pesant, a chief who was supposed to have been principally instrumental in urging the Ottawas to attack the Miamis. Le Pesant gave himself up, but, on the entreaty of Talon and other chiefs, was pardoned.

TALON, Édouard (tah-long), Flemish administrator, b. in Ghent in 1759; d. in Bruges in 1819. He early entered the Portuguese service and held for twenty years important offices under the government of Brazil. In 1810 he was secretary of the commission to mark the boundary between the Portuguese and Spanish possessions in South America, and from 1812 till 1815 he was chief of the local administration of French Guiana, which had been surrendered to the Portuguese. He returned to Europe in 1817, and died suddenly at Bruges during a journey. His works include "Memorial sobre a administração das provincias de Minas-Geraes e Rio Grande do Sul" (Lisbon, 1804); "Estatística politica e commercial do Brazil" (2 vols., 1805); "Historia de Gomez Freire de Andrada eda guerra das sete Missoes" (2 vols., 1808); "Exposé de l'état présent de la Guiane" (1817); and "Mémoire sur l'administration du capitaine général Victor Hugues" (1817).

TALON, Jean-Baptiste, French administrator, b. in Picardy in 1625; d. in Versailles in 1691. He held offices in the intendancies of Bordeaux and Lyons, was intendant of Hainaut in 1661-'3, and was appointed on 23 March, 1663, intendant of justice, police, and finance of Canada, Acadia (Newfoundland), and other possessions of the crown in North America. He was the second intendant of New France, which greatly improved and prospered under his administration. After compelling the company of New France to abandon its monopoly of trade in Canada, he endeavored to develop the resources of the country, was the first to build ships in the colony, established a trade between Canada and the West Indies, cod-fisheries along the river St. Lawrence, built the first brewery in North America, and tried to open a road across the country to Acadia. / Under his auspices Saint-Simon and Albanel penetrated to Hudson bay, and Daumont de Saint-Lusson took possession in the king's name of the country of the upper lakes, and he prepared the way for the remarkable series of explorations that led to the discovery of the whole of the great northwest. He urged upon the king a measure from which, according to Francis Parkman, had it taken effect, momentous consequences must have sprung. This was the purchase or seizure of New York, involving the isolation of New England, the subjection of the Iroquois, and the undisputed control for France of half the American continent. He also established a military aristocracy in Canada, promoted immigration, and took special care to provide for the increase of the population, laying restrictions and taxes upon the unmarried of both sexes. His health failing in 1668, he asked for his recall, which Louis XIV. granted with strong expressions of regret; but two years later he resumed the intendency till 1672, when he returned to France and obtained a high post in the king's household. In 1671 the seigniorship that he had founded at Des Islets in Canada was erected into a barony; in 1675 his two other seigniorships of Ormale and Orsainville were likewise made baronies, and he afterward took the title of Count d'Orsainville. In 1666 he addressed to the king a memoir upon the Indian company, and his "Mémoire à Sa Majesté sur l'état présent du Canada" (1667), which is preserved in the National library at Paris, has always been consulted by the Canadian historians, and is greatly praised by Francis Parkman in his "Old Regime in Canada." Talon's portrait is preserved in the Hôtel-Dieu of Quebec.

TALON, Pierre, explorer, b. in Canada in the second half of the 17th century; d. after 1700. His father, Lucien, accompanied by the entire family, joined La Salle's expedition in 1684. He was also, with a younger brother, a member of the party that entered the country of the Illinois in 1687. After the assassination of La Salle, Pierre took refuge among the Cenis Indians, by whom he was well treated. On the arrival of a Spanish force at the village, he was arrested, but was soon released and asked to remain, as interpreter, with Franciscan missionaries who accompanied the soldiers. He then told the Spaniards that his three brothers and a sister were slaves among the Clamcoets or Carancaguaces, and, at his request, a detachment was sent for them. Two of his brothers and his sister were rescued, but the other brother remained with the Indians until 1691. They all went to Mexico after some time, and were taken into the service of the viceroy. Talon wrote an account of the death of La Salle, which is preserved in the French dépôt de la marine, and is entitled "Interrogations faites à Pierre et Jean Talon, par ordre de Mr. le Comte de Pontchartrain, à leur arrivée de la Vera Cruz, le 14 Septembre, 1698." Charlevoix made use of this document in his account of the death of La Salle. He says that the author, who seems strongly prejudiced against La Salle, agrees with Joutel as to the manner of the murder, but not as to the names of the assassins and the attendant circumstances.

TALTON, Augustus, clergyman, b. in Ralls county, Mo., in 1854. He is the first colored Roman Catholic priest in the United States. He was born in slavery and suffered many hardships in his childhood, but at length escaped with his parents, reaching Quincy, Ill., in 1861. In childhood he showed an aptitude for learning, and in his days of bondage it was no unusual thing for him to sit up half the night painfully spelling his way through such books as came within his reach. He was employed in a tobacco-factory in Quincy, but still continued his night studies under the auspices of the professors in St. Francis's college. In 1873, when he left the tobacco-factory, by doing odd jobs, he was able to spend part of the day in the college. He set out for Rome on 15 Feb., 1880, and, entering one of the colleges of the Propaganda on 12 March, spent two years in studying philosophy and four in going through the theological curriculum, and attracted the favorable notice of his superiors. He was ordained priest on 24 April, 1886, and returned to Quincy, Ill., where he was appointed pastor of a white congregation.

TAMMANY, Indian chief, lived in the 17th century. He was chief of the Delawares, and was variously called Temane, Tamenand, Taminent, Tameny, and Tammany. According to one account, he was the first Indian to welcome William Penn to this country, and was a party to Penn's famous treaty. Another story places his wigwam on the present site of Princeton college, and another says that he lived in the hills of northeastern Pennsylvania, and that he died at an advanced age near a spring in Bucks county, Pa. He was a sagamore, and belonged to the Lenni Lennape confederacy of New York and Pennsylvania, which warred perpetually against the Six Nations and the Manhattan Indians. The tradition is that the evil spirit sought to gain a share in the administration of his kingdom, but Tammany refused to hold intercourse with him. The enemy then resorted to strategy, and attempted to enter his country, but was foiled by the chief, and at length determined to destroy him. A duel was waged for many moons, during which forests were trampled under foot, which have since remained prairie lands. Finally Tammany tripped his adversary, threw him to the ground, and would have scalped him, but the evil spirit extricated himself and escaped to Manhattan, where he was welcomed by the natives, and afterward made his home with them. Tammany appears to have been a brave and influential chieftain, and his nation revered his memory by bestowing his name upon those that deserved that honor. He is now chiefly known as the patron of a Democratic political organization in New York city called the Tammany society.

TANEY, Roger Brooke (taw'-ny), jurist, b. in Calvert county, Md., 17 March, 1777; d. in Washington, D. C., 12 Oct., 1864. He was the son of a Roman Catholic planter, of a family that came to Maryland in the early emigration from England, who had been educated in St. Omer, France, and Bruges, United Netherlands, in the Jesuit college, and was frequently elected to the house of delegates. The son was graduated at Dickinson college in 1795. He read law in Annapolis with Jeremiah Chase, then a judge of the general court, and was admitted to the bar in 1799. His father, who was ambitious of political honors for his son, persuaded him to begin practice in his native county, where, in the autumn of the same year, he was elected to the house of delegates. He was the youngest member in that body, yet was distinguished for the maturity of his opinions and his dialectic powers. He was defeated at the next election by a Republican, and in March, 1801, removed to Frederick. Although he was unknown in that part of the state, his acuteness, thoroughness, and eloquence brought him a lucrative practice, and before many years passed he was retained in important and intricate cases, and confronted the leaders of the Maryland bar. He was a candidate for the house of delegates on the Federalist ticket in 1803, but was defeated. On 7 Jan., 1806, he married Anne Phebe Charlton Key, sister of Francis Scott Key, who had been his fellow law-student. In 1811 he defended Gen. James Wilkin-

during his term of service. He endured the disapprobation of his neighbors by courageously appearing in 1819 in defence of Jacob Gruber, a Methodist minister from Pennsylvania, who in a camp-meeting had condemned slavery in bitter language, and who was indicted as an inciter of insurrection among the negroes. In his opening argument Taney declared of slavery that "while it continues, it is a blot on our national character." In 1821 he was counsel in the important case of Brown vs. Kennedy, which involved the question of the original proprietary title to lands that had been reclaimed from the navigable waters of Maryland, and in the following year in one connected with the law of charitable trusts. He removed in 1823 to Baltimore, where the death of William Pinkney, the retirement of Luther Martin, and the decease of other eminent lawyers left him at the head of the bar until William Wirt came in 1829 to divide with him that distinction. With many other Federals of the south, Taney passed over into the Democratic party, and supported the candidacy of Andrew Jackson for the presidency in 1824. In 1826 he argued the case of Ringgold vs. Ringgold, in which the doctrine of trusts was discussed, and, with Wirt, represented the state of Maryland in the Lord Baltimore case before the U. S. supreme court. In 1827 he was appointed attorney-general of Maryland, and on 27 Dec., 1831, he succeeded John M. Berrien as attorney-general of the United States. He became President Jackson's most trusted counselor, and encouraged and sustained him in his determination to remove the government deposits from the United States bank. There were only two members of the cabinet that approved this action, and when William J. Duane hesitated to carry out the president's decree he was removed and Taney was appointed secretary of the treasury. He entered upon the duties of the office on 24 Sept., 1833, and two days afterward issued the order for the removal of the deposits on 1 Oct. The bank therefore called in its loans and refused accommodation, locking up a large part of the currency, and producing a financial stringency that affected all classes, for which the president was held responsible by the opposition. Sec. Taney was a special object of vituperation and scorn, because he was supposed to have been the "pliant instrument" of the president in his arbitrary purpose from motives of selfish ambition. His nomination to the office was sent to the senate for confirmation on 23 June, 1834, having been withheld till near the close of the session, which, owing to the subject most prominently brought up in debate, has been known as the "panic session." On 24 June the hostile majority rejected the appointment, it being the first time that a president's selection of a cabinet officer had not been confirmed. On the following day Mr. Taney sent in his resignation, which was accepted by President Jackson in a letter expressing gratitude for his patriotic and disinterested aid during the crisis. In January, 1835, on the retirement of Gabriel Duval, associate justice of the U. S. supreme court, President Jackson named Mr. Taney for the vacant judgeship; but the senate refused to ratify the nomination. During the ensuing year the political complexion of the senate was changed, and when, after the death of John Marshall, the president, on 26 Dec., 1835, nominated Mr. Taney to be chief justice of the United States, he was confirmed on 15 March, 1836, by 29 votes against 15, notwithstanding the denunciations of Henry Clay and other political opponents. He took his seat on the bench as circuit judge at Baltimore in April, beginning his functions by abolishing the custom of giving preliminary instructions to the grand jury. In January, 1837, he presided over the full bench.

His first decisions showed divergence between his view of the constitution and that of his predecessor, who had been more and more drawn to allow a wide scope to the powers of congress and to limit the sphere of state sovereignty. In the case of the City of New York vs. Miln, Chief-Justice Taney and the majority of the court decided that an act of the legislature of New York requiring masters of vessels to make reports of passengers on arriving was a police regulation that did not interfere with the power of congress to regulate foreign commerce. In the case of Briscoe vs. the Bank of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, the court reversed the decision of Marshall, who held that the act establishing the bank was a violation of the provision of the constitution that restrains states from emitting bills of credit. In the Charles-river-bridge suit he delivered a judgment under which state legislatures were free to authorize bridges, railroads, and similar improvements without regard to implied contracts in former grants and monopolies. These decisions almost impelled Justice Joseph Story to resign, and caused Chancellor James Kent to say that he had lost confidence in the constitutional guardianship of the supreme court. In the case of disputed boundaries between Massachusetts and Rhode Island, the chief justice, dissenting from the judgment of the court, held that the Federal tribunal had no power to decide questions of political jurisdiction between sovereign states. In 1839 he delivered the opinion in the case of the Bank of Augusta vs. Earle, in which he laid down the principle that corporations chartered in one state may make contracts in others by the comity of nations. The claim of the proprietors of East Jersey to the oyster-fisheries in Raritan river was disallowed on the ground that fishery rights had passed with the powers of government into the hands of the state. In the case of Prigg vs. the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, the chief justice for the first time pronounced a state law unconstitutional. Prigg, as agent for a Maryland slave-holder, had seized and carried back to her master an escaped female slave, for which he was indicted under a state law, which made it a penal act to carry a negro or mulatto by force out of the state. Justice Story delivered the opinion, which declared the law unconstitutional because the remedy for fugitives from labor is vested exclusively in congress. Chief-Justice Taney held, however, that states could pass laws for the rendition of escaped servants, but not to impair the right of the master to seize his fugitive slave, which he declared to be the law of each state. He concurred with Justice Story and Justice John McLean, and protected the rights of the Federal government in the Holmes habeas corpus case, in which he denied the authority of the governor of Vermont to extradite a fugitive from justice, because all foreign intercourse belongs to the Federal government. In 1847 the court decided, in the Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and New Hampshire license cases, that a state can regulate or prohibit the retail sale of wines or spirits that congress has authorized to be imported. In the Massachusetts and New York passenger cases the chief justice delivered an opinion that the state authorities could impose a head-tax on immigrants, on the grounds that the power of congress to regulate commerce is not exclusive, and that persons are not subjects of commerce. In 1849 he declined to pronounce judgment as to which of the contending governments of Rhode Island was the legitimate one, as it belonged to the political and not to the judicial department of the government to determine that question. In 1845 he upheld the constitutionality of the law of congress that extended admiralty jurisdiction over the lakes and connecting navigable waters, although English precedents limited it to tide-water.

In the midst of the excitement that attended the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska bill (30 May, 1854), and the strife of free-soilers and slave-holders, the Dred Scott case, to which President Buchanan alluded in his inaugural message, came before the supreme court for decision. It involved the question whether congress had the power to exclude slavery from the territories. The case was presented in 1854, and, after being twice argued, was finally decided in 1857. The opinion of the court was written by Chief-Justice Taney, who entered into an elaborate historical exposition of the status of the negro, the other five judges who concurred in the decision delivering separate opinions. He held that the plaintiff in error, Dred Scott, was debarred from seeking a remedy in the U. S. circuit court for Missouri, on the ground that he was not a citizen of that state, and enunciated the general principle that negroes could not become citizens by the act of any state or of the United States, since, before the adoption of the constitution, the colonies had special laws for colored people, whether slave or free, and congress had not authorized their naturalization or enrolled them in the militia. "They had for more than a century before been regarded as beings of an inferior order, and altogether unfit to associate with the white race, either in social or political relations, and so far inferior that they had no rights which the white man was bound to respect, and that the negro might justly and lawfully be reduced to slavery for his benefit." He held, further, that the Missouri compromise and other laws of congress inhibiting slavery in the territories of the United States were unconstitutional, and that whatever measure of freedom Dred Scott may have acquired by his residence in Illinois, he lost by being subsequently removed into the territory of Wisconsin, and by his return thence to Missouri. This deliverance, made two days after the inauguration of President Buchanan, produced intense excitement throughout the country and a strong reaction in favor of the anti-slavery party. The chief justice replied to the strictures that it provoked, and especially to a direct attack on the supreme court made by William H. Seward in the senate, in a supplementary opinion explaining and justifying his legal deductions. In the following year a case that arose under the fugitive-slave law of 1850 came before Chief-Justice Taney. Sherman M. Booth, who had been sentenced by the U. S. district court for aiding in the escape of a negro from slavery, was released on habeas corpus proceedings by the supreme court of Wisconsin, which refused to take cognizance of the subsequent mandates of the supreme court of the United States in the matter. In reviewing the case Chief-Justice Taney affirmed the constitutionality of the fugitive-slave law, and declared that "so long as this constitution shall endure, this tribunal must exist with it, deciding in the peaceful forms of judicial procedure the angry and irritating controversies between sovereignties which in other countries have been decided by the arbitrament of force." The reversal of the judgment of the state court called forth a declaration of the legislature of Wisconsin that the government of the United States was not the final judge of the extent of its powers, but that the states, as parties to the compact, have an equal right to determine infractions of their rights and the mode of their redress, and that the judgment of the Federal court was "void and of no force." The chief question at issue in the presidential election of 1860 was whether the Dred Scott decision, throwing all the territories of the United States open to slavery and denying to colored persons any standing in courts of law, should be maintained as the true construction of the constitution. On 13 March, 1861, Chief-Justice Taney delivered the opinion of the court in mandamus proceedings brought by the state of Kentucky against the governor of Ohio to compel him to cause the arrest and delivery of Willis Lago, a free man of color who, while under indictment for assisting a slave to escape, had fled from Kentucky. He affirmed the right of Kentucky to demand the person of the fugitive, and the obligation of Ohio to render him up, yet denied the jurisdiction of the U. S. court in the case.

When, after the secession of the southern states, martial law was proclaimed in Maryland, Chief-Justice Taney, on application of John Merryman, arrested by order of Gen. George Cadwalader, ordered the release of the prisoner, issued an attachment against the officer, and filed an opinion, to be laid before President Lincoln, in which he denied the right of the president to suspend the writ of habeas corpus, affirming that such power is vested in congress alone. When congress passed an act to withhold three per cent. of the salaries of government officers, Chief-Justice Taney, on 16 Feb., 1863, sent a letter to the secretary of the treasury, Salmon P. Chase, pointing out the unconstitutionality of this law so far as it affected the judges of the U. S. courts. In the matter of a seizure of contraband goods, he delivered on 3 June, 1863, an opinion at nisi prius, in which he censured the duplicity of the government detectives, ordered the price of the goods to be restored to the smugglers, and mulcted the provost-marshal and his assistants in damages and costs. Chief-Justice Taney died on the same day on which the state of Maryland abolished slavery. His judicial opinions and decisions are contained in the "Supreme Court Reports" of Benjamin R. Curtis, Benjamin C. Howard, and Jeremiah S. Black. His opinions as a circuit judge from 1836 till 1861 were reported by his son-in-law, James Mason Campbell. He wrote Andrew Jackson's farewell address on retiring from the presidency. At the age of seventy-seven he began an autobiography, which he brought down to 1861, and which forms the introduction to a "Memoir" by Samuel Tyler (Baltimore, 1872).

TANGUAY, Ciprian, Canadian clergyman, b. in Quebec, Canada, 15 Sept., 1819. He was graduated at the Seminary of Quebec on 15 Aug., 1839, ordained priest in the Roman Catholic church on 14 May, 1843, and appointed vicar of Rimouski the same year. He was made curé of St. Raymond in 1846 and of Rimouski in 1850, in 1859 was transferred to St. Michel, and in 1862 appointed curé of St. Henedine. Since 1864 he has been attached to the department of agriculture at Ottawa. He was raised to the rank of domestic prelate of the papal household by Leo XIII. in 1888. He has published "Journal d'un voyage de Boston à l'Orégon" (Quebec, 1842); "Répertoire du clergé Canadien depuis la fondation du Canada" (1868); "À travers les registres" (Montreal, 1886); "Monseigneur Pourroy de l'Auberivière, 5^{ième} évêque de Québec" (1886); and "Dictionnaire généalogique des familles Canadiennes" (Montreal). When it is completed this last work will form seven volumes; four have already appeared, and the fifth is now in press. It is considered a work of national importance in Canada, and the author not only has examined the registers of every parish in the country, family records, etc., but went to Europe in order to make himself acquainted with the archives of the ministry of marine at Paris and those of other institutions.

TANNEHILL, Adamson, soldier, b. in Frederick county, Md., in 1752; d. in Pittsburg, Pa., 7 July, 1817. He received a public-school education, served in the Revolutionary war as captain of riflemen, removed to Pennsylvania, and cultivated a small farm near Pittsburg, where he served as justice of the peace. He opposed the whiskey insurrection. From 25 Sept. till 31 Dec., 1812, he was brigadier-general of Pennsylvania volunteers. He was then elected to congress as a Democrat, and served from 24 May, 1813, till 3 March, 1815.

TANNEHILL, Wilkins, journalist, b. in Pittsburg, Pa., 4 March, 1787; d. in Nashville, Tenn., 2 June, 1858. His father, Gen. John, served in the Continental army during the Revolution. The son removed to Lexington, Ky., at an early age, and soon afterward to Nashville, Tenn., where he became an editor of the "Whig," and also of the "Herald," the first Henry Clay organ in Tennessee. Subsequently he edited "The Orthopolitan," a new literary and independent paper, and in 1848-'9 the "Portfolio," a journal of Freemasonry. He was forced to discontinue this, owing to the failure of his eyesight, and in later years became blind. He was the author of a "Freemason's Manual," containing a history of the progress of the order; "Sketches of the History of Literature" (Nashville, 1827); and "Sketches of the History of Roman Literature" (1846).

TANNER, Benjamin, engraver, b. in New York city, 27 March, 1775; d. in Baltimore, Md., 14 Nov., 1848. At an early age he manifested a talent for drawing and designing, and after receiving his education he began to learn the art of engraving. In December, 1799, he went to Philadelphia, where he established his business, and aided his brother Henry in publishing maps. In 1816 he formed a bank-note engraving establishment, under the name of Tanner, Vallance, Kearny and Co., which he afterward discontinued, and in 1835 established a blank check note and draft publishing office, which he abandoned in 1845. His engravings include portraits of Washington, after Savage; Benjamin Franklin, after Charles N. Cochin (1822); "Apotheosis of Washington," after J. J. Barralet (1802); "Perry's Victory on Lake Erie, 10 Sept., 1813," and "The Launch of the Steam Frigate Fulton," after the same artist (1815); "Macdonough's Victory on Lake Champlain, and Defeat of the British Army at Plattsburg by Gen. McComb, 11 Sept., 1814," after Hugh Reinagle (1816); "The Surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown," after J. F. Renaulty; and "America Guided by Wisdom," after J. J. Barralet.—His brother, Henry S., geographer, b. in New York in 1786; d. in New York city in 1858. In early life he removed to Philadelphia, where he resided until 1850, when he returned to New York city. He engraved and published many atlases and separate maps, contributed geographical and statistical articles to various periodicals, and was a member of the geographical societies of London and Paris. He collected a fine cabinet of shells. His maps include the "New American Atlas," with letterpress descriptions (Philadelphia, 1817-'23); "The World," on a globular projection (4 sheets, 1825); "Map of the United States of Mexico" (1825); "Map of Philadelphia" (1826); and "Map of the United States of America" (1829). He also published "Memoir on the Recent Surveys in the United States" (2d ed., 1830); "View of the Valley of the Mississippi" (1832); "American Traveller" (1836); "Central Traveller" (New York, 1840); "New Picture of Philadelphia" (Philadelphia, 1840); and "Description of the Canals and Railroads of the United States" (New York, 1840).

TANNER, Benjamin Tucker, A. M. E. bishop, b. in Pittsburg, Pa., 25 Dec., 1835. He is of African descent. After studying at Avery institute and Western theological seminary, Alleghany City, Pa., he officiated at the 15th street Presbyterian church in Washington, D. C., also organizing the first school for freedmen in the U. S. navy-yard, by permission of Admiral Dahlgren. At the end of eighteen months he returned to his own church, the African Methodist Episcopal, entering the Baltimore conference in April, 1862. He labored as a missionary in Alexandria, where he organized the first society of his church on Virginia soil. He was stationed in 1863 in Georgetown, D. C., in 1864 in Frederick, Md., and in 1866 in Baltimore, but resigned to organize a proposed conference school in Frederick, Md., as well as to take charge of the schools of the Freedmen's bureau in Frederick county. He was elected secretary of the general conference of 1868, and by this body was chosen editor of the "Christian Recorder," being continued in this post by three subsequent general conferences of 1872, 1876, and 1880. In 1884 he was elected managing editor of a new church publication, the "A. M. E. Church Review." He received the degree of A. M. from Avery college in 1870, and that of D. D. from Wilberforce university in 1878, and on 19 May, 1888, was elected a bishop. Dr. Tanner has written prose and poetry for periodicals, and is the author of "Paul versus Pius Ninth" (Baltimore, 1865); "Apology for African Methodism" (1867); "The Negro's Origin, and Is the Negro Cursed?" (Philadelphia, 1869); and "Outline of the History and Government of the A. M. E. Church" (1883). He has ready for publication "The Negro, African and American."

TANNER, Henry S., physician, b. about 1830. Early in 1880 much interest was manifested in the fasting power of Mollie Fancher, of Brooklyn, N. Y., who claimed to have lived fourteen years without food. Dr. William A. Hammond offered her $1,000 if she would allow herself to be watched for one month by relays of members of the New York neurological society, provided she did not take any food voluntarily during that period. Dr. Tanner, at that time a practising physician in Minneapolis, Minn., saw the challenge in print and offered to perform the experiment under the conditions. To this Dr. Hammond agreed, saying: "If he succeeds he will get $1,000, and if he dies I will give him a decent burial." Dr. Tanner then came to New York city, and after some difficulty secured the co-operation of the Neurological society in conducting the fast. It began at noon on 28 June, 1880, and continued until its successful termination on 7 Aug. During the fast his eyes became slightly dimmed, the top of his head, which was thinly covered with gray hair, became as white as milk, and he lost ten and a half pounds in weight. The outline of his features stood out more clearly, and his lips closed more tightly. Dr. Tanner drank eighty ounces of water during the first two days, in doses ranging from six to eight ounces each, after which, in lieu of drinking, he simply gargled his mouth about once an hour. He spent the time reclining on his cot or sitting in a chair. At bedtime he took a sponge-bath and was rubbed down with coarse towels, after which he retired. Before he dressed in the morning his clothes were examined to ascertain that no food was concealed in them. His pulse and temperature were frequently taken, and his weight every day. Subsequently he lectured on fasting. Several persons have since fasted for long periods, and exhibitions of fasting have taken place both in this country and abroad. In 1888 John Zachar, residing near Racine, Wis., went without food for fifty-three days, which is the longest fast known. His weight was reduced from 160 to 90 pounds.

TANNER, John, captive, b. in Kentucky about 1780; d. in 1847. His father removed from Kentucky to the mouth of Big Miami river, Ohio, and settled there as a farmer. At the age of six years the son was captured in the fields by an Indian, who wished to adopt a son in place of his own, who had recently died. Tanner was compelled to labor for the Indians, and thought to be "good for nothing" by his captor, who tomahawked him and left him to die in the woods, but he was found by his adopted mother, who treated him with kindness and affection, and he recovered. After two years he was sold to Net-no-kwa, an Ottawa Indian, and he remained in captivity for thirty years. He became thoroughly accustomed to Indian life, participated in many hunting warlike excursions in the region of the great lakes, and married Mis-kwa-bun-o-kwa, "the red sky of the morning." He afterward fell in with the Hudson bay company, and went to Detroit, where he was interviewed by Gov. Lewis Cass, and met his brother, with whom he was unable to speak except through an interpreter. After visiting his family he returned to the Indian settlement for his children, and was then employed as interpreter for the Indian agent at Sault Ste. Marie, Mich. He wrote a "Narrative of the Captivity and Adventures of John Tanner during Thirty Years' Residence among the Indians," edited by Edwin James, M. D. (New York, 1830). His son, James, became a Unitarian missionary.

there in 1590. He received his education in Flanders, and early entered the Portuguese service, being employed as surgeon on board ships that sailed to the Indies. At the time of the invasion of Admiral Villegaignon, he was in Brazil as surgeon of the king, and he practised his profession afterward with great success, holding several important offices in the colony. After his return to Europe he published a curious work, "Colloquios dos simples e drogas do Brazil" (Coimbra, 1566), which enjoyed a great reputation for about a century in a revised and completed French version, "Histoire des drogues, especeries, et de certains médicaments et simples qui croissent es Brésil, province de l'Amérique" (Paris, 1590).

TAPPAN, David, clergyman, b. in Manchester, Mass., 21 April, 1752; d. in Cambridge, Mass., 27 April, 1803. The name was originally Topham. His ancestor, Abraham, came to this country from Yarmouth, England, in 1637, and his father, Benjamin, was pastor of a church in Manchester in 1720-'90. After graduation at Harvard in 1771, David studied divinity, and was pastor of a Congregational church in Newbury, Mass., from 1774 till 1792, when he was chosen Hollis professor of divinity at Harvard, serving there until his death. The degree of D. D. was conferred on him by Harvard in 1794. Dr. Tappan published many sermons and addresses. After his death appeared "Sermons on Important Subjects, with a Biographical Sketch of the Author," by Rev. Abiel Holmes (Boston, 1807), and "Lectures on Jewish Antiquities delivered at Harvard in 1802-'3" (1807).—His son, Benjamin, clergyman, b. in Newbury, Mass., 7 Nov., 1788; d. in Augusta, Me., 23 Dec., 1863, was graduated at Harvard in 1805, and was pastor of a Congregational church in Augusta, Me., from 16 Oct., 1811, until his death. Bowdoin gave him the degree of D. D. in 1845.—David's nephew, Benjamin, jurist, b. in Northampton, Mass., 25 May, 1773; d. in Steubenville, Ohio, 12 April, 1857, was the son of Benjamin Tappan, who, sacrificing his opportunity of study at Harvard for his younger brother, David, went to Boston, became a gold- and silver-smith, and in 1770 married Sarah Homes, the great-niece of Benjamin Franklin. After receiving a public-school education, the son was apprenticed to learn copper-plate engraving and printing, and devoted some attention to portrait-painting. Subsequently he studied law, was admitted to the bar, and began practice in Steubenville, Ohio, in 1799. In 1803 he was elected to the legislature, and after the war of 1812, in which he served as aide to Gen. William Wadsworth, he was appointed judge in one of the county courts, and for seven years was president judge of the 5th Ohio circuit. In 1833 he was appointed by President Jackson U. S. judge for the district of Ohio. Being elected to the U. S. senate as a Democrat, he served from 2 Dec., 1839, till 3 March, 1845. He was an active leader of his party, but afterward joined in the free-soil movement at its inception. He was widely known for his drollery and wit and for his anti-slavery sentiments. Judge Tappan published "Cases decided in the Court of Common Pleas," with an appendix (Steubenville, 1831).—The second Benjamin's brother, John, philanthropist, b. in Northampton, Mass., in December, 1781; d. in Boston, Mass., 25 March, 1871, entered mercantile life in Boston in 1799, became a partner in his employer's firm in 1803, and in 1807 was sole manager of the large house that was known by his name, but withdrew in 1825. He was president and treasurer of the American tract society, and was actively interested in missions and in many benevolent associations of Boston.—Another brother, Arthur, b. in Northampton, Mass., 22 May, 1786; d. in New Haven, Conn., 23 July, 1865, was locked up while an infant in a folding bedstead. When he was discovered life was almost extinct, and headaches, to which he was subject daily through life, were ascribed to this accident. He received a common-school education, and served a seven years' apprenticeship in the hardware business in Boston, after which he established himself in Portland, Me., and subsequently in Montreal, Canada, where he remained until the beginning of the war of 1812. In 1814 he engaged with his brother Lewis in importing British dry-goods into New York city, and after the partnership was dissolved he successfully continued the business alone. Mr. Tappan was known for his public spirit and philanthropy. He was a founder of the American tract society, the largest donor for the erection of its first building, and was identified with many charitable and religious bodies. He was a founder of Oberlin college, also erecting Tappan hall there, and endowed Lane seminary in Cincinnati, and a professorship at Auburn theological seminary. With his brother Lewis he founded the New York "Journal of Commerce" in 1828, and established "The Emancipator" in 1833, paying the salary of the editor and all the expenses of its publication. He was an ardent Abolitionist, and as the interest in the anti-slavery cause deepened he formed, at his own rooms, the nucleus of the New York city anti-slavery society, which was publicly organized under his presidency at Clinton hall on 2 Oct., 1833. Mr. Tappan was also president of the American anti-slavery society, to which he contributed $1,000 a month for several years, but he withdrew in 1840 on account of the aggressive spirit that many members manifested toward the churches and the Union. During the crisis of 1837 he was forced to suspend payments, and he became bankrupt in 1842. During his late years he was connected with the mercantile agency that his brother Lewis established. He incurred the hatred of the southern slave-holders by his frequent aid to fugitives, and by his rescuing William Lloyd Garrison from imprisonment at Baltimore. See his "Life," by Lewis Tappan (New York, 1871).—Another brother, Lewis, merchant, b. in Northampton, Mass., 23 May, 1788; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 21 June, 1873, received a good education, and at the age of sixteen became clerk in a dry-goods house in Boston. His employers subsequently aided him in establishing himself in business, and he became interested in calico-print works and in the manufacture of cotton. In 1827 he removed to New York and became a member of the firm of Arthur Tappan and Co., and his subsequent career was closely identified with that of his brother Arthur. With the latter he established in 1828 the "Journal of Commerce," of which he became sole owner in 1829.

In 1833 he entered with vigor into the anti-slavery movement, in consequence of which his house was sacked and his furniture was destroyed by a mob in July, 1834, and at other times he and his brother suffered personal violence. He was also involved in the crisis of 1837, and afterward withdrew from the firm and established the first mercantile agency in the country, which he conducted with success. He was chief founder of the American missionary association, of which he was treasurer and afterward president, and was an early member of Plymouth church, Brooklyn. He published the life of his brother mentioned above.

TAPPAN, Henry Philip, clergyman, b. in Rhinebeck, N. Y., 23 April, 1805; d. in Vevay, Switzerland, 15 Nov., 1881. He was graduated at Union college in 1825, and at Auburn theological seminary in 1827, and after serving for a year as associate pastor of a Dutch Reformed church in Schenectady, N. Y., became pastor of a Congregational church in Pittsfield, Mass., but resigned, owing to impaired health, and visited the West Indies. In 1832 he became professor of moral philosophy in the University of the city of New York, which post he resigned in 1838, and opened a private school. In 1852 he was elected first chancellor of the University of Michigan, and secured valuable additions to the literary and scientific resources of the university, among which were several fine instruments for the observatory. He retired in 1863, and spent the rest of his life in Europe. In 1859 he was elected corresponding member of the French imperial institute, and president of the American association for the advancement of education. He devoted much attention to the subject of university education, and studied the systems of England and Germany. Union gave him the degree of D. D. in 1845, and Columbia that of LL. D. in 1853. Dr. Tappan published a "Review of Edwards's 'Inquiry into the Freedom of the Will'" (New York, 1839); "The Doctrine of the Will determined by an Appeal to Consciousness" (1840); "The Doctrine of the Will applied to Moral Agency and Responsibility" (1841; with additions, Glasgow, 1857); "Elements of Logic, together with an Introductory View of Philosophy in General and a Preliminary View of the Reason" (1844); "Treatise on University Education" (1851); "A Step from the New World to the Old, and Back Again" (1852); and an "Introduction to Illustrious Personages of the Nineteenth Century" (1853).

TAPPAN, Mason Weare, lawyer, b. in Newport, N. H., 20 Oct., 1817; d. in Bradford, N. H., 24 Oct., 1886. His father, a well-known lawyer, settled in Bradford in 1818, and was a pioneer in the anti-slavery movement. The son was educated at Kimball union academy, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1841, and acquired a large practice. He was early identified with the Whig party, and afterward was a Free-soiler and served in the legislature in 1853-'5. He was elected to congress as a Free-soiler, by a combination of the Whigs, Free-soilers, Independent Democrats, and Americans, at the time of the breaking up of the two great parties, Whigs and Democrats. He served from 3 Dec., 1855, till 3 March, 1861, and was a member of the special committee of thirty-three on the rebellious states. On 5 Feb., 1861, when a report was submitted recommending that the provisions of the constitution should be obeyed rather than amended, he made a patriotic speech in support of the government. Mr. Tappan was one of the earliest to enlist in the volunteer army, and was colonel of the 1st New Hampshire regiment from May till August, 1861. Afterward he resumed the practice of law, and held the office of attorney-general of the state for ten years preceding his death. He was a delegate to the Philadelphia Loyalists' convention of 1866, and presided over the New Hampshire Republican convention on 14 Sept., 1886. In the presidential election of 1872 he supported his life-long friend, Horace Greeley.

TAPPAN, William Bingham, poet, b. in Beverly, Mass., 29 Oct., 1794; d. in West Needham, Mass., 18 June, 1849. His early advantages were limited, but he acquired a good education and for six years taught in Philadelphia. In 1826 he removed to Boston, where he became general agent of the American Sunday-school union, and was engaged in the same work in Cincinnati and Philadelphia. He was licensed to preach in 1840. His publications are "New England, and other Poems" (Philadelphia, 1819); "Songs of Judah, and other Melodies" (1820); "Lyrics" (1822); "Poems" (1834); "Mémorial of Capt. James Wilson" (1842); "Poetry of the Heart" (Boston, 1845); "Sacred and Miscellaneous Poems" (1846); "Poetry of Life" (1847); "The Sunday-School, and other Poems" (1848); and "Late and Early Poems" (Worcester, Mass., 1849).

TARAVALL, Sigismond, clergyman, b. in Lodi, Italy, 26 Oct., 1700; d. probably in Italy. He entered the Jesuit novitiate on 31 Oct., 1718, went to Mexico, and thence to California, where he founded the mission of Santa Rosa. He discovered the islands of Afagua and Amalgua on the Pacific coast, afterward known as Los Dolores, and collected a large number of documents for a history of California. His manuscript work, entitled "Relacion del Martirio de los PP. Tomás Tello y Enrique Ruhen, muertos por los Indios Seris," is in the Library of Mexico.

TARBELL, John Adams, physician, b. in Boston, Mass., 31 March, 1810; d. there, 21 Jan., 1864. He was graduated at Harvard in 1832, and studied medicine in Paris for three years, receiving his degree from Bowdoin in 1836. He began practice in Boston, and in 1843 became a homœopathist. He was associate editor of the "Quarterly Homœopathic Review" (Boston, 1853-'4), edited John Epps's "Domestic Homœopathy" and "The Pocket Homœopathist" (Boston, 1849); and was the author of "Sources of Health" (1850) and "Homœopathy Simplified" (1856-'62).

TARBELL, Joseph, naval officer, b. about 1780; d. in Norfolk, Va., 24 Nov., 1815. He entered the navy as a midshipman, 5 Dec., 1798, was promoted to lieutenant, 25 Aug., 1800, and served in Preble's squadron during the Tripolitan war. He was included in the vote of thanks to Preble and his officers by act of congress, 3 March, 1805, was promoted to master-commandant, 25 April, 1808, and commanded the frigate "John Adams" in 1811-'14. He was commissioned a captain, 24 July, 1813, and rendered good service in the defence of Craney island and James river in June, 1813, capturing three barges and forty prisoners when the British were repelled in this attack. He was then stationed at Norfolk, Va., where he died.

TARBOX, Increase Niles, author, b. in East Windsor, Conn., 11 Feb., 1815; d. in West Newton, Mass., 3 May, 1888. He was graduated at Yale in 1839, studied theology while acting as tutor there in 1842-'4, and from 1844 till 1851 was pastor of a Congregational church in Framingham, Mass., which he left to become secretary of the American education society, later the American college and education society, in Boston, Mass. This office he filled till 1884. He received the degree of D.D. from Yale and from Iowa college in 1869. He wrote extensively on historical and religious subjects for the "New Englander," "Bibliotheca Sacra," "Historic-Genealogical Register," and other periodicals, was in 1849-'51 associate editor of the "Congregationalist," contributed many poems and hymns to that and other journals, and from 1881 till his death was historiographer for the New England historic-genealogical society. Dr. Tarbox published juvenile books entitled the "Winnie and Walter Stories" (4 vols., Boston, 1860) and "When I was a Boy" (1862); "Nineveh, or the Buried City" (1864); "The Curse, or the Position occupied in History by the Race of Ham" (1865); "Tyre and Alexandria the Chief Commercial Cities of Scripture Times" (1865); "Missionary Patriots: James H. and Edward M. Schneider" (1867); "Uncle George's Stories" (1868); "Life of Israel Putnam (Old Put), Major-General in the Continental Army" (1876); "Sir Walter Raleigh and his Colony in America" (1884); "Songs and Hymns for Common Life" (1885); and "Diary of Thomas Robbins, D. D." (2 vols., 1886-'7).

TARDIVAL, Julius Paul, Canadian journalist, b. in Covington, Ky., 2 Sept., 1851. He removed to Canada in 1868, was educated at St. Hyacinth college, in the province of Quebec, was assistant editor of "Le Canadien" in 1874, and is editor of "La vérité," in Quebec, which he founded in 1881. He was assistant government translator at Ottawa from 1879 till 1881. Mr. Tardival has published "Vie du Pape Pie IX., ses œuvres et ses douleurs" (Quebec, 1878); "Borrowed and Stolen Feathers, or a Glance through Mr. James M. Lemoine's Latest Work, 'The Chronicles of the St. Lawrence'" (1878); "L'Anglicisme, voilà l'ennemie" (1879); and "Mélanges" (1887).

TARIEU DE LANAUDIÈRE, Charles (tah-ree-uh), Canadian statesman, b. in Canada in 1744; d. there in 1841. At the age of sixteen he took part in the battle of Saint Foye, as an officer in the regiment de la Sarre, and was severely wounded. He went to France with his regiment after the surrender of Montreal, visited the principal courts of Europe, and married shortly after his return to Canada. In 1775 he held a command in the Canadian militia, and was taken prisoner by the Americans in a skirmish on the frontier. He was instrumental in saving Gen. Carleton from capture when Benedict Arnold reached Montreal, escorting the English leader to Quebec at the head of three hundred Canadians. He was made aide-de-camp on Carleton's staff, and several years later master of the waters and forests. Tarieu made frequent journeys to Europe, the expenses of which impaired his fortune. When he returned to Canada in 1787 he endeavored to turn his influence with the Canadian government to account, in order to obtain a change in the system of seigniorial tenures, and presented a petition to this effect in January, 1788. The result of the changes he asked for would enable the Canadian seigneurs to draw larger revenues from their fiefs by throwing them open to American and English settlers. The measure was opposed by most of the other great proprietors, and the agitation that then began was not settled until 1854, when the question of land-tenure in Canada received a definitive solution. In 1792 he was created a member of the legislative council, which post he held till his death, and in which his talents, combined with his influence over successive governors, gave him great power.

TARLETON, Sir Banastre, bart., British soldier, b. in Liverpool, 21 Aug., 1754; d. in England, 23 Jan., 1833. He came to America with Lord Cornwallis in Sir Peter Parker's squadron in May, 1776. He was major in Col. Harcourt's regiment of dragoons, and accompanied Harcourt in the raid upon Baskingridge, N. J., which resulted in the capture of Gen. Charles Lee, 13 Dec. Little is heard of him during the next three years. In December, 1779, he accompanied the expedition of Sir Henry Clinton to South Carolina with the rank of lieutenant-colonel. He raised and organized a troop known as the "British legion," or sometimes as "Tarleton's legion." It comprised both light infantry and cavalry, with a few field-pieces, and was thus a miniature army in itself. It was made up partly of British regulars, partly of New York loyalists, and was further recruited by loyalists of South Carolina. At the head of this legion Tarleton soon made himself formidable in partisan warfare. In the difficult country of the Carolinas, with poor roads, frequent swamps or pine-barrens, and scant forage, he could move far more rapidly than the regular army, and his blows were delivered with sudden and crushing effect. After Clinton's capture of Charleston, 12 May, 1780, Col. Buford's regiment, which had been marching toward Charleston, began its retreat to Virginia, but Tarleton, giving chase, overtook and overwhelmed it at Waxhaw Creek, near the border between the two Carolinas. Nearly all Buford's men were slaughtered, and thenceforth the phrase "Tarleton's quarter" was employed to denote wholesale butchery. At Camden, 15 Aug., Tarleton completed the ruin of Gen. Gates's left wing. At Fishing Creek, 18 Aug., he surprised Gen. Thomas Sumter, and utterly routed and dispersed his force; but at Blackstock's Hill, 20 Nov., Sumter returned the compliment, and severely defeated Tarleton. Early in January, 1781, Lord Cornwallis sent Tarleton, with 1,100 men, westward to the mountain country to look after Gen. Daniel Morgan, who was threatening the British inland posts. At the Cowpens, 17 Jan., Morgan, with 900 men, awaited his attack and almost annihilated his force of 1,100 men in one of the most brilliant battles of the war. Tarleton accompanied Cornwallis during his campaigns in North Carolina and Virginia. In June, 1781, he made a raid upon Gov. Jefferson's house at Monticello; but the governor, forewarned, had escaped to the mountains a few minutes before Tarleton's arrival. He remained with Cornwallis until the surrender at Yorktown. On returning to England he was promoted colonel. In 1790 he was elected to parliament from Liverpool, and was so popular that all the expenses of the election were borne by his friends. He was member of parliament in 1790-1806, and again in 1807-12. In 1817 he reached the grade of lieutenant-general, and was made a baronet, 6 Nov., 1818. Ross, the editor of Cornwallis's "Correspondence," says (p. 44) that, in the house of commons, Tarleton "was notorious for his criticisms on military affairs, the value of which may be estimated from the fact that he almost uniformly condemned the Duke of Wellington." He published a "History of the Campaigns of 1780 and 1781 in the Southern Provinces of North America" (London, 1787). This book has value in so far as it contains many documents that cannot elsewhere be obtained except with great labor. As a narrative it is spoiled by the vanity of the author, who distorts events for his self-glorification to a degree that is seldom paralleled in books of this character. The work was severely criticised by Col. Roderick Mackenzie, "Strictures on Lieutenant-Colonel Tarleton's History" (London, 1787). Mackenzie in turn was answered by Tarleton's second in command, Major George Hanger, afterward Lord Colerain, "Address to the Army in Reply to Colonel Mackenzie's Strictures" (London, 1787). The best-known portrait of Tarleton is the one by Sir Joshua Reynolds (1782), representing him in full uniform, with his foot on a cannon, from which the accompanying vignette is copied. Among the English colonel's American friends was Israel Halleck, a loyalist, father of Fitz-Greene, who was for a time a member of his military family, and between whom and Tarleton there was an enduring friendship.

TASCHER DE LA PAGERIE, Joseph (tash-air), Chevalier, French soldier, b. in the castle of La Pagerie, near Blois, in 1701; d. in Trois Islets, Martinique, in 1762. He was descended from a family of German origin that settled in Blaisois about the 12th century, and whose members served with credit in the army and in the magistracy. In 1726 he settled in Martinique, where he married a wealthy creole, Aymer de la Chevalerie, and held for several years the office of lieutenant of the king in Saint Pierre. During the English invasion in 1756 he armed his slaves, led them to the front, and was dangerously wounded at the attack on Grande Savane.—His son, Joseph Gaspard, Chevalier, and afterward Baron, b. in Carbet, Martinique, 5 July, 1735; d. in Trois Islets, 6 Nov., 1790, became, when seventeen years old, a page to the Dauphine Marie Joséphe, served afterward as lieutenant in the marines, and fought against the English when they invaded Martinique in 1756. After the conclusion of peace in 1763 he was retired with the brevet of captain, made a knight of Saint Louis, and devoted himself to agricultural pursuits on his large estate at Trois Islets. He published several treatises on colonial methods of culture.—By his wife, ROSE CLAIRE DES VERGERS DE SANNOIS (b. in Saint Pierre, Martinique, 27 Aug., 1736; d. in Trois Islets, 2 June, 1807), he had three daughters, the eldest of whom was Marie Joséphine Rose, who became the Empress Josephine.

TASCHER DE LA PAGERIE, Louis Robert Pierre Claude, Count and afterward Duke, West Indian soldier, b. in Fort de France, Martinique, 1 April, 1787; d. in Paris, France, 3 March, 1861. He was a first cousin to Empress Josephine, and received his early education in Martinique. Napoleon Bonaparte summoned him to France in 1802, and placed him at the military school of Fontainebleau. He was promoted lieutenant in 1806, assisted in the battle of Eylau, was aide-de-camp to Napoleon at the battle of Friedland, served under Junot in Portugal in 1808, was afterward aide-de-camp to Prince Eugène de Beauharnais, son of Empress Josephine, and, accompanying him to Bavaria in 1815, became a major-general in the Bavarian army. He was created a senator of the empire on 31 Dec., 1852, and made on 27 Jan., 1853, grand-master of the Empress Eugénie's household, which post he retained till his death. By his marriage with Princess Marie de Leyen, he had several sons, one of whom was for some years French consul-general in New Orleans, Porto Rico, and Havana.

TASCHEREAU, Elzear Alexandre (tash-er-o), Canadian cardinal, b. in Sainte Marie de la Beauce, province of Quebec, 17 Feb., 1820. His great-grandfather, Thomas Jacques Taschereau, emigrated from Touraine, France, and in 1746 was granted the seigniory of Sainte Marie de la

Beauce. When he was eight years of age Elzear was entered as a pupil at the Seminary of Quebec, and when he was seventeen he went to Rome, where a year later he received the tonsure. The same year he returned to Quebec, resuming his theological studies, and on 13 Sept., 1842, was ordained a priest. Soon afterward he was appointed to the chair of moral philosophy in the Seminary of Quebec, which he filled for twelve years, and during this period displayed liberal tendencies, opposing the ultramontane element in the church to which he belonged. In 1847, during the prevalence of a fatal fever among the emigrants at Grosse island, he volunteered to assist the chaplain at that place in ministering to the sick and dying, and labored untiringly among them until he was stricken by the pestilence. In 1854 he was sent to Rome by the second provincial council of Quebec to present its decrees for ratification to Pius IX., and he remained two years in the city, studying canon law. In July, 1856, the degree of doctor of canon law was conferred on him by the Roman seminary. Soon afterward he returned to Quebec, and became director of the Petit séminaire, which post he held till 1859, when he was appointed director of the Grande séminaire, and a member of the council of public instruction for Lower Canada. In 1860 he became superior of the seminary and rector of Laval university, and in 1862 he accompanied Archbishop Baillargeon on a visit to Rome, and, returning toward the end of the same year, was appointed vicar-general of the diocese of Quebec. In 1865 he again went to Rome on business connected with the university, in 1866 (his term of office as superior having expired) he was again made director of the Grande séminaire, and three years later he was re-elected superior. He attended the ecumenical council at Rome in 1870, and on the death of the archbishop of Quebec in October of the same year he became an administrator of the archdiocese conjointly with Vicar-General Cazeau. In February, 1871, he was appointed archbishop of Quebec, and he was consecrated on 19 March by Archbishop Lynch, of Toronto. Subsequently he visited Rome several times on business of importance, and in 1886 he became the first Canadian cardinal, the beretta being conferred upon him with great ceremony on 21 July at Quebec. Immediately after his elevation Cardinal Taschereau issued a circular letter forbidding the use of spirituous and fermented liquors at bazaars, and also prohibiting the holding of such sales on Sunday.

TASCHEREAU, Jean Thomas, Canadian jurist, b. in Quebec, 12 Dec., 1814. He studied law, was admitted as an advocate in 1836, appointed professor of commercial law in Laval university in 1855, and was assistant judge of the superior court of Quebec in 1850, 1855, and 1858. He became queen's counsel in 1860, puisne judge of the superior court of Quebec in 1865, and judge of the court of queen's bench in 1873, and he was puisne judge of the supreme court of Canada in 1875-'8.—His son, Henri Thomas, Canadian jurist, b. in Quebec, 6 Oct., 1841, was graduated in law in 1861, admitted as an advocate in 1863, entered parliament in 1872, and was appointed puisne judge of the supreme court of Lower Canada in 1878. He edited "Les débats" in 1862 and "La tribune" in 1863.—Jean Thomas's cousin, Henri Elzear, Canadian jurist, b. in St. Mary's, Beauce, Canada East, 7 Oct., 1836. He was educated at the Seminary of Quebec, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1867, and practised in the city of Quebec. He represented Beauce in the Canadian assembly from 1861 till 1867, when he was defeated as a candidate for the Dominion parliament. He was appointed clerk of the peace for the district of Quebec in 1868, but soon resigned and became puisne judge of the superior court of the province of Quebec, 12 Jan., 1871, and of the supreme court of the Dominion in October, 1878, in succession to Jean Thomas Taschereau. He is a cousin of Cardinal Taschereau. He has published "The Criminal Law for the Dominion of Canada, with Notes, Commentaries, Precedents of Indictments, etc." (2 vols., Montreal and Toronto, 1874-'8; 2d ed., enlarged, Toronto, 1888); and "Code de procédure civile du Bas Canada," with annotations (Quebec, 1876).

TASISTRO, Louis Fitzgerald, author, b. in Ireland about 1808; d. about 1868. He received a liberal education, travelled in various countries, and while yet a young man came to the United States. He edited a paper in New York city, and afterward one in Boston, wrote for periodicals, and essayed the dramatic profession, making his appearance as Zanga, in "The Slave," at the Park theatre, New York city, and afterward as Hamlet, at the Chestnut street theatre, Philadelphia, 31 Aug., 1831. Subsequently he settled in Washington, D. C., where he was for several years translator for the department of state. Afterward he engaged in lecturing and literary work. He was the author of "Travels in the Southern States: Random Shots and Southern Breezes" (New York, 1842).

TASSE, Joseph, Canadian author, b. in Montreal, 23 Oct., 1848. He was educated at Bourget's college, and afterward connected himself with the press. In 1867 he became editor of "Le Canada" at Ottawa, and from 1869 till 1872 he was associate editor of "La Minerve" in Montreal, and at the same time a director of "Le revue Canadienne," to which he contributed essays on history, literature, and political economy. He was afterward employed as assistant French translator of the house of commons, and in 1873 visited Europe, publishing a detailed account of his travels. He was elected president of the French Canadian institute of Ottawa in 1872 and 1873, was a delegate to the French national convention at Montreal in 1874, and took an active part in its deliberations regarding the return of expatriated Canadians from the United States. He declined to become a candidate for the Canadian parliament in 1874, was elected to that body for Ottawa in 1878, and was re-elected in 1882. He was chosen president of the Quebec press association in 1883, and has been a frequent lecturer before national and literary societies in Canada and the United States. Among other works he has published the pamphlets "Philemon Wright, ou colonisation et commerce de bois" (Montreal, 1871); "Le chemin de fer Canadien Pacifique" (1872); and "Le vallée de l'Outawais" (1872); and, in book-form, "Les Canadiens de l'ouest" (2 vols., 1878). The purport of the last work is to demonstrate that French Canadians have been chiefly the pioneers and discoverers of the United States and also the Canadian northwest. It has been partly translated in the collections of the Historical society of Wisconsin.

TASSEMACHER, or TESSCHENMAEKER, Peter, clergyman, b. in Holland about 1650; d. in Schenectady, N. Y., 8 Feb., 1690. He was educated at the University of Utrecht, came to Kingston, N. Y., in 1675, where he preached in both English and Dutch, and then spent two years in Dutch Guiana. Gov. Edmund Andros, on 30 Sept., 1679, authorized the Dutch clergymen to examine and ordain him for the church at New Amstel, Del. The assembling of this body constituted the first American classis or ecclesiastical gathering of the Reformed church that was held on this continent, as well as the first ordination of a domine. He preached on Staten island in 1679-'82, and then lived at Schenectady, N. Y., until 1690, when he was slain in the massacre. Orders had been given to spare his life and obtain his papers, but these the Indians disregarded. His farm of eighty acres on Staten island was claimed, 2 Nov., 1692, for the poor fund.

TASSIN, Charles Stanislas (tas-sang), South American artist, b. in Berbice, Guiana, in 1751; d. in Paris in October, 1812. He studied with Watteau, and became one of his best pupils. In 1773 he exhibited a "Christ in the Cradle," which attracted much attention, and procured for the artist a prize of $600 from Louis XV. Later he produced "Venus and Cupid" (1777); several pastoral pictures; "A Runaway Match" (1784); "Over the Wall" (1786); "Peasants Dancing" (1788); "Marchioness as Shepherdess" (1790), and other pictures; and obtained the title of royal painter. He also decorated several panels in the castles of Trianon, Sceaux, and Luciennes, painted portraits of Madame du Barry, Duke de la Vauguyon, Admiral d'Estaing, Bailly de Suffren, and Duchess Jules and Countess Diane de Polignac. In 1791 he went to England and executed portraits of William Pitt, Charles James Fox, and Edmund Burke, and, having inherited a large estate in Guiana, returned to his native land in 1795, remaining there till the peace of Amiens, when he returned to Paris in 1802. His later works include "Sunset in Guiana" (1799); "Fish-Vender at Berbice" (1802); "A Creole" (1803); and "Love Victorious" (1805).

TASTERA, Jacques de (tah-stay-rah), French missionary, b. in Bayonne in 1480; d. in Mexico, 8 Aug., 1544. He served a few years in the army, but, despite fair prospects of advancement, became a Franciscan friar at Seville in 1508, and soon attained to the highest ranks in the order. After preaching with success at Seville he was appointed court chaplain of Ferdinand of Aragon, and later he became a favorite with Charles V., who offered him a bishopric; but he declined, and in 1529 went to New Spain. From Mexico he went to Champoton in Yucatan, where he founded a convent, and for years he travelled alone in the country, accompanied only by one interpreter, evangelizing the Indians and preaching the gospel with success. In 1533 he was appointed prior of the Convent of Santo Evangelio at Mexico, and, continuing to interest himself in the welfare of the Indians, summoned and presided over councils of Franciscan missionaries at Michoacan and Guatemala in 1535 and 1537, where means for the protection of the conquered nation were devised, an embassy being sent to the holy see to obtain its ratification of the measures. In 1541 he went to Milan and took part in the general council of the Franciscan order in that city, and before returning to Mexico obtained from the pontiff an encyclical letter to the Spanish officials, advising them to show leniency toward the Indians. In 1542 he was appointed commissary-general of the Franciscan friars in the New World, which post he held until his death. He is the author of "Arte de la lengua Mexicana" (Seville, 1555), and "Litteræ annuæ Mexicanæ" (1571). The recent publication, "Cartas de Indias," prepared by the Spanish government from manuscripts in the state archives, contains several letters of Tastera.

TATHAM, William, engineer, b. in Hutton, England, in 1752; d. in Richmond, Va., 22 Feb., 1819. He emigrated to this country in 1769, entered a mercantile establishment on James river, Va., and served as adjutant of militia against the Indians. He studied the character and customs of the red men, and wrote biographical accounts of Atakullakulla, Oconistoto, Cornstalk, and other warriors. During the Revolutionary war he served as a colonel in the Virginia cavalry under Gen. Thomas Nelson, and was a volunteer in the party that stormed the redoubt at Yorktown. In 1780, with Col. John Todd, he compiled the first exact and comprehensive account of the western country. After the Revolution he studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1784, removed to North Carolina, and in 1786 founded the settlement of Lumberton. He was a member of the North Carolina legislature in 1787. Tatham went back to England in 1796, and in 1801 became superintendent of the London docks, but returned to the United States in 1805, and became poor in his old age. He was given the office of military store-keeper in the Richmond arsenal in 1817, and while there committed suicide by throwing himself before a cannon at the moment of discharge. His publications include "Memorial on the Civil and Military Government of the Tennessee Colony"; "An Analysis of the State of Virginia" (Philadelphia, 1790-'1); "Two Tracts relating to the Canal between Norfolk and North Carolina"; "Plan for Insulating the Metropolis by Means of a Navigable Canal" (London, 1797); "Remarks on Inland Canals" (1798); "Political Economy of Inland Navigation, Irrigation, and Drainage" (1799); "Communications on the Agriculture and Commerce of the United States" (1800); "Historical and Practical Essay on the Culture and Commerce of Tobacco" (1800); "National Irrigation" (1801); "Oxen for Tillage" (1801); and two reports "On the Navigation of the Thames" (1803).

TATNALL, Henry Lea, artist, b. in Brandywine Village, Del., 31 Dec., 1829; d. in Wilmington, Del., 26 Sept., 1885. After being educated at the Friends' Westtown boarding-school, Chester co., Pa., he entered the flour-mills of Tatnall and Lea as a clerk, but afterward turned his attention to agriculture. In 1856 he removed to Wilmington and began the lumber business, and at the same time cultivated his musical and artistic talent, which showed itself in early life. He could play on almost every instrument, and composed and set to music many popular songs. His friends induced him to fit up a studio over his counting-house, where the intervals of business were devoted to the study and practice of marine and landscape painting. His success was rapid and extraordinary, and in a few years his orders were so numerous that he turned the lumber business over to his sons, opened a larger studio, and devoted the remainder of his life to his adopted profession. He was called the father of Wilmington art, and on the formation of the Delaware artists' association he was elected its president.

TATTNALL, Josiah, statesman, b. in Bonaventure, near Savannah, Ga., in 1762; d. in Nassau, New Providence, 6 June, 1803. Upon the revolt of the American colonies he and his brother were obliged to go to England with their father and grandfather, who remained loyal to the British crown but refused service in the army to coerce the colonies. The family estates in Georgia were confiscated by the Americans because of their absence in England. In 1780 Josiah ran away from his parents in England and returned to this country, where he joined Gen. Nathanael Greene's army and served against the British until the close of the war. In recognition of this service the state of Georgia restored a part of the confiscated estates to him. He was the third captain of the Chatham artillery, colonel of the 1st Georgia regiment, and brigadier-general commanding the 1st division of the Georgia state militia. He was a member of the Georgia legislature, a U. S. senator in 1796-'9, and governor of Georgia in 1800. He served in the general assembly at Louisville in 1796, when the Yazoo act of 1795 was rescinded. His remains were brought from Nassau and are buried at Bonaventure, which estate has been converted into a cemetery.—His son, Josiah, naval officer, b. in Bonaventure, near Savannah, Ga., 9 Nov., 1795; d. in Savannah, Ga., 14 June, 1871, was educated in England under the supervision of his grandfather in 1805-'11. He returned to the United States in 1811 and entered the navy as a midshipman, 1 Jan., 1812. He served in the war of 1812 in the seamen's battery on Craney island, and with a force of navy-yard workmen in the battle of Bladensburg. During the Algerine war he participated in the engagements of Decatur's squadron. He returned to the United States in September, 1817, was promoted to lieutenant, 1 April, 1818, and served in the frigate "Macedonian," on the Pacific station, in 1818-'21. In 1823-'4 he served in the schooner "Jackal," one of Porter's "Mosquito fleet," in the suppression of piracy in the West Indies. In October, 1828, he was appointed 1st lieutenant of the sloop "Erie," in the West Indies, where he cut out the Spanish cruiser "Federal," which had confiscated American property at sea during the wars of the Spanish-American republics for independence. In August, 1829, he took charge of the surveys of the Tortugas reefs off the coast of Florida, which surveys proved to be of great value for the location of fortifications at Dry Tortugas. In March, 1831, he took command of the schooner "Grampus" in the West Indies, and in August, 1832, he captured the Mexican war-schooner "Montezuma" for illegal acts against an American vessel. His services with the "Grampus" in protecting American commerce elicited letters of thanks from the merchants and insurance companies at Vera Cruz and New Orleans, from whom he also received a service of silver. In December, 1832, he was relieved of his command at his own request, and he subsequently served on duty in making experiments in ordnance and in the conduct of the coast tidal survey. In November, 1835, in command of the bark "Pioneer," he took Gen. Santa-Anna to Mexico after he had been captured in a battle with the Texans and surrendered to the United States. Upon their arrival at Vera Cruz, Tattnall personally prevented an attack on Santa-Anna by an excited mob of his opponents. He was promoted to commander, 25 Feb., 1838, and placed in charge of the Boston navy-yard. While on his way to the African station in the "Saratoga" in 1843 he encountered a hurricane off Cape Ann, Mass., and won a brilliant professional reputation by the skill he displayed in cutting away the masts and anchoring when almost on the rocks off the cape. When war was declared with Mexico he was assigned to command the steamer "Spitfire," joined the squadron at Vera Cruz, and was given command of the Mosquito division. With this he covered the landing of Gen. Winfield Scott's army, and assisted in the bombardment of the city. After the fall of Vera Cruz he led in the attack on the forts at Tuspan and was severely wounded in the arm by grape-shot. The legislature of Georgia gave him a vote of thanks and a sword. He was promoted to captain, 5 Feb., 1850, and in command of the steamer "Saranac" contributed much to preserve peace between the United States and Spain during the Cuban insurrection. On 15 Oct., 1857, he was appointed flag-officer of the Asiatic station. He found China at war with the allied English and French fleets, and went to the scene of operations at Pei-ho. Shortly before an engagement his flagship grounded and was towed off by the English boats. This service was taken as an excuse for subsequent active participation in the attack on the Chinese. In explanation of his violation of neutrality, Tattnall exclaimed that "blood was thicker than water." He was sustained in his course by public opinion at the time and also by the government. On 20 Feb., 1861, he resigned his commission as captain in the navy, and offered his services to the governor of Georgia. He was commissioned senior flag-officer of the Georgia navy, 28 Feb., 1861, and in March, 1861, he became a captain in the Confederate navy, and was ordered to command the naval defences of Georgia and South Carolina. On 7 Nov., 1861, he led an improvised naval force against the attack on Port Royal. He conducted attacks on the blockading fleet at the mouth of the Savannah, constructed batteries for the defence of that river, and materially delayed the operations of the National forces. In March, 1862, he was ordered to relieve Franklin Buchanan, who was wounded in the engagement with the "Monitor," and took command of the "Merrimac" and the naval defences of the waters of Virginia. He set out for Hampton Roads on 11 April, 1862, accompanied by the gun-boats, which cut out three merchant vessels, but the "Merrimac" did not venture to lose communication with Norfolk. When the Confederates were forced to abandon the peninsula, Norfolk and the navy-yard were also surrendered; and on 11 May, 1862, Tattnall destroyed the "Merrimac" off Craney island in order to prevent her capture. He was then ordered to resume command of the naval defences of Georgia. At his request a court of inquiry was ordered to investigate the destruction of the "Merrimac," and he was censured for destroying the vessel without attacking the enemy's fleet, and for not taking her to Hog island to defend the James river. He then demanded a regular court-martial, which met at Richmond, 5 July, 1862, and, after a thorough investigation, honorably acquitted him. He was indefatigable in his efforts to defend Savannah river, but in January, 1865, he was obliged to destroy all the vessels he had collected. He then went to Augusta, where he was included in the parole of the surrender of Gen. Joseph E. Johnston's army. He remained there until 12 June, 1866, when he took his family to Nova Scotia, after first obtaining permission from the war department to leave the country. He resided near Halifax, but his pecuniary resources became nearly exhausted, and in 1870 he returned to his home in quest of employment. On 5 Jan., 1870, the mayor and city council appointed him inspector of the port of Savannah. He held this office, which had been created for him, for seventeen months, when it was abolished by his death. See "The Life of Commodore Tatt-nall," by Charles C. Jones, assisted by J. R. F. Tatt-nall, the commodore's son (Savannah, 1878).

TAUSTE, Francisco (tah-oo'-stay), Spanish missionary, b. in Tauste, Aragon, about 1630; d. in Venezuela toward the end of the 17th century. He entered the Capuchin order in Spain, and was sent as a missionary to the coast of Cumana, where he soon became proficient in the Indian languages of that province, and evangelized numerous tribes. He wrote "Arte y Diccionario de la Lengua de Cumaná" (Madrid, 1680), and, according to Juan de San Antonio, in his "Biblioteca Franciscana," left in manuscript "Doctrina Cristiana para instruccion de los Indios Chaimas, Cumanagotas, Cores y Parias, en sus respectivos Idiomas."

TAVARES-BASTOS, Aureliano Candido (tah-vah'-rays), Brazilian lawyer, b. in Pernambuco in 1840; d. in Nice, France, 3 Dec., 1875. After finishing his studies he was admitted to the bar of his native city, and soon attained prominence as an able and eloquent orator. He was counsel for several political prisoners, advocated religious freedom with great vehemence, and participated in the movement that led to the abolition of slavery throughout the empire. He was a member of the Brazilian parliament in 1872, but his health failing he went to Nice, where he died. His works include "Cartas de um solitario" (Rio Janeiro, 1865); "O valle do rio Amazonas" (1869); "Estudos sobre algumas reformas legislativas" (1870); and several political pamphlets.

TAVERNIER, Jacques (tah-vair-ne-ay), called LE LYONNAIS, French buccaneer, b. in Lyons, France, about 1625; d. in Havana, Cuba, in 1673. He early followed the sea, served on privateers in the Gulf of Mexico, and later joined the buccaneers in Tortugas. He took part in most of the expeditions under the leadership of Laurent van Graaf, Grandmount, Jacques Nau, Pierre le Picard, Henry Morgan, and other famous chiefs, but never commanded a strong following, as he was unable to read and write. After 1664, however, he was the owner of the ship "La Perle," carrying twelve canons, and he made some daring inroads on the coasts of Venezuela, Panama, Cuba, and even Mexico. He assisted at the capture of Maracaibo in 1666, and of Porto Cabello in 1667, was with Morgan at Panama in 1671, and later ravaged with Bradley the Bay of Honduras. On returning from the last expedition he fell in with two Spanish men-of-war;

a desperate battle ensued, and one of the Spanish ships took fire and was obliged to head for the coast. Tavernier and his buccaneers boarded the other vessel and had nearly captured it, when a sudden storm parted the cables that lashed the two vessels together. The buccaneers retreated in great haste to their ship, but a few, including the chief, were unable to regain it, as the two vessels parted. The fight continued, nevertheless, for some time on board the Spanish vessel, but Tavernier being severely wounded, the buccaneers, deprived of their chief, lost courage and were finally overcome. Tavernier was brought nearly dying to Havana, where he was immediately executed before the palace of the audiencia.

TAYLOR, Alexander Smith, ethnologist, b. in Charleston, S. C., 16 April, 1817; d. near Santa Barbara, Cal., 27 July, 1876. He received a limited education, left Charleston in 1837, travelled for several years in the West Indies and in India and China, went to California from Hong Kong in 1848, and lived at Monterey till 1860, where he was clerk of the U. S. district court in 1853, and afterward on a ranch near Santa Barbara. He has written for magazines and newspapers articles on the Indian races, the history of California, and natural history. He published a translation of the diary of Juan Rodriguez Cabrillo, under the title of "The First Voyage to the Coast of California" (San Francisco, 1853); a "History of Grasshoppers and Locusts of America" in the "Report" of the Smithsonian institution for 1858; "The Indianology of California" in the "California Farmer" (1860-'4); and "Bibliographia Californica" in the Sacramento "Union" (1863-'6).

TAYLOR, Alfred, naval officer, b. in Fairfax county, Va., 23 May, 1810. He entered the navy as a midshipman, 1 Nov., 1826, became a passed midshipman, 4 June, 1831, and was commissioned a lieutenant, 9 Feb., 1837. During the Mexican war he was attached to the frigate "Cumberland" in the blockade of Vera Cruz and in some of the operations on the coast. He served at the Washington navy-yard in 1848-'51, and in the steamer "Mississippi" with Perry's expedition to Japan in 1853-'5, was commissioned commander, 14 Sept., 1855, and commanded the sloop "Saratoga" on the coast of Africa when the civil war opened in 1861. He was commissioned captain, 16 July, 1862, and was attached to the navy-yard at Boston in 1862-'5. He commanded the flag-ship "Susquehanna" on the Brazil station in 1866, and was promoted to commodore, 27 Sept., 1866. He was then on waiting orders until February, 1869, when he was appointed light-house inspector. He was promoted to rear-admiral, 29 Jan., 1872, and was retired by operation of law, 23 May, 1872. He has been a resident of New York city since his retirement.

TAYLOR, Alfred, clergyman, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., in 1831. He was pastor of Presbyterian churches at Bristol and Williamsport, Pa. He has exerted himself for the improvement of Sunday-school teaching, and in 1870-'1 conducted a weekly called the "Sunday-School Workman." His publications include "Union Prayer-Meeting Hymn-Book" (Philadelphia, 1858); "Sunday-School Photographs" (Boston and Edinburgh, 1864); "Extra Hymn-Book" (Philadelphia, 1864); and "Hints about Sunday-School Work" (1869).

TAYLOR, Archibald Alexander Edward, educator, b. in Springfield, Ohio, 27 Aug., 1834. He was graduated at Princeton in 1854, and at the theological seminary there in 1857. He was pastor of a Presbyterian church at Portland, Ky., in 1857-'9, then at Dubuque, Iowa, till 1865, for the next four years at Georgetown, D. C., and at Cincinnati, Ohio, from 1869 till 1873. In 1870-'2 he was co-editor of "Our Monthly," published in Cincinnati. From 1873 till 1883 he was president of Wooster university, Ohio. He continued to be connected with the institution as professor of logic and political economy and dean of the post-graduate department for five years longer, editing in 1886-'8 "The Post-Graduate," a quarterly journal of philosophy. He then became editor of "The Mid-Continent," the organ of the Presbyterian church in the southwest, published in St. Louis, Mo. He received the degree of D. D. from Wooster in 1872, and that of LL. D. when he retired from the presidency in 1883.

TAYLOR, Bayard, author, b. in Kennett Square, Chester co., Pa., 11 Jan., 1825; d. in Berlin, Germany, 19 Dec., 1878. He was the son of Joseph and Rebecca (Way) Taylor, and was of Quaker and South German descent. His first American ancestor, Robert Taylor, was a rich

Quaker, who came over with Penn in 1681, and whose eldest son inherited land that now includes "Cedar-croft," the poet's recent estate. His grandfather married a Lutheran of pure German blood, and was excommunicated by the Quakers. The poet's mother, although a Lutheran, was attached to the Quaker doctrines, and the Quaker speech and manners prevailed in her household. Bayard was named after James A. Bayard, of Delaware, and his first book bore on its title-page, through a mistake of Griswold, its editor, the name of "James Bayard Taylor." After reaching his majority he always signed his name Bayard Taylor. His boyhood was passed near Kennett on a farm. He learned to read at four, began to write early, and from his twelfth year wrote "poems, novels, historical essays, but chiefly poems." At the age of fourteen he studied Latin and French, and Spanish not long afterward. In 1837 the family removed to West Chester. There, and at Unionville, the youth had five years of high-school training. His first printed poem was contributed in 1841 to the "Saturday Evening Post," Philadelphia. In 1842 he was apprenticed to a printer of West Chester. His contributions to the "Post" led to a friendship with Rufus W. Griswold, who was then connected with that paper and was also editor of "Graham's Magazine." Griswold advised him concerning the publication of "Ximena, and other Poems" (Philadelphia, 1844), which was dedicated to his adviser and sold by subscription. By this time he found a trade distasteful, and, to gratify his desire for travel and study in Europe, he bought his time of his employer. The "Post" and the "United States Gazette" each agreed to pay him fifty dollars in advance for twelve foreign letters. Graham bought some of his poems, and with one hundred and forty dollars thus collected he sailed for Liverpool, 1 July, 1844. Horace Greeley gave him a conditional order for letters to the "Tribune," of which he afterward wrote eighteen from Germany. His experiences abroad are well condensed in his own language: "After landing in Liverpool, I spent three weeks in a walk through Scotland and the north of England, and then travelled through Belgium and up the Rhine to Heidelberg, where I arrived in September, 1844. The winter of 1844-'5 I spent in Frankfort-on-the-Main, and by May I was so good a German that I was often not suspected of being a foreigner. I started off again on foot, a knapsack on my back, and visited the Brocken, Leipsic, Dresden, Prague, Vienna, Salzburg, and Munich, returning to Frankfort in July. A further walk over the Alps and through northern Italy took me to Florence, where I spent four months learning Italian. Thence I wandered, still on foot, to Rome and Civita Vecchia, where I bought a ticket as deck-passenger to Marseilles, and then tramped on to Paris through the cold winter rains. I arrived there in February, 1846, and returned to America after a stay of three months in Paris and London. I had been abroad for two years, and had supported myself entirely during the whole time by my literary correspondence. The remuneration which I received was in all five hundred dollars, and only by continual economy and occasional self-denial was I able to carry out my plan." His letters were widely read, and shortly after his return were collected in "Views Afoot, or Europe seen with Knapsack and Staff" (New York, 1846). Six editions were sold within the year. In December, 1846, Taylor bought, with a friend as partner, a printing-office in his native county, and began to publish the Phoenixville "Pioneer." But after a year he sold his newspaper and obtained a place on the New York "Tribune" in the literary department and as man-of-all-work. In December, 1848, he published "Rhymes of Travel, Ballads, and Poems," which gave him repute as a poet. In 1849-'50 he was sent by the "Tribune" to California to report on the gold discoveries, and his letters were collected in "Eldorado, or Adventures in the Path of Empire" (1850). The same year he delivered the $\Phi \beta \kappa$ poem at Harvard. On 24 Oct., 1850, Taylor married, at Kennett, Mary Agnew, a Quaker girl of exquisite character, to whom he had long been betrothed, but who was now in an incurable decline, and she died within two months. He obtained an interest in the "Tribune," and also issued "A Book of Romances, Lyrics, and Songs" (1851). In the autumn he again visited Europe as a correspondent, went to Egypt, and thence to Syria, Palestine, and Asia Minor, and reached London in October, 1852. His instructions next led him to join Com. Perry's expedition to Japan. Travelling through Spain, he proceeded to Bombay via Cairo and Suez, journeyed through India to Delhi and Calcutta, thence to the Himalayas and back, and finally voyaged to Hong Kong, China, which he reached in March, 1853, joining Perry's flag-ship in May, and obtaining the nominal appointment of master's mate. He remained with the expedition until September, sharing its visit to Japan, and transmitting graphic accounts thereof to the "Tribune," besides furnishing valuable notes to Perry for the latter's report to the U. S. government. After his return home he was in demand as a lecturer, and made lecturing a vocation throughout much of his after career. In 1854 he published "A Journey to Central Africa" and "The Land of the Saracen." "A Visit to India, China, and Japan" appeared in 1855. In 1854 he also brought out his "Poems of the Orient," perhaps his freshest, most glowing and characteristic book of verse. The next year or two were occupied with lecturing, travelling in this country, and authorship. "Poems of Home and Travel," a collective edition of his verse, and a revised edition of "Views Afoot," came out in 1855. His income grew large from copyrights, lecture-fees, and the "Tribune" stock. He edited a "Cyclopædia of Modern Travel" (New York, 1856). In July, 1855, he revisited Germany, and then made a journey to Norway and Lapland. His letters to the "Tribune" composed the volume "Northern Travel" (1858). He married in October, 1857, Marie Hansen, of Gotha, and spent the winter of 1857-'8 in Greece. In October, 1858, they returned to Kennett Square, bringing with them a daughter, Lilian Bayard, who now resides at Halle with her husband, Dr. Kiliani. Taylor laid the corner-stone of his country-home, "Cedarcroft," upon a generous tract of land which he had purchased near Kennett Square. In 1861 the house was completed and became his residence. It is represented in the accompanying illustration. At the beginning of the civil war he spoke and wrote for the National cause, and in May, 1862, he was appointed secretary of legation, Gen. Simon Cameron being minister, at St. Petersburg. When left for a time in sole charge, he was influential, as the files of the state department show, in determining Russia to extend her sympathy and active friendship to the U. S. government. Resigning his office in 1863, he visited Gotha, where he obtained unusual facilities for his study of the life and writings of Goethe. After the loss of a brother, Col. Frederic Taylor, at Gettysburg, he went home in the autumn of 1863 and resumed his professional labors. In 1867 the Taylors revisited Switzerland and Italy, and the poet was brought near to death by an attack of Roman fever. He made a trip to Corsica in 1868. Two years were now devoted to his translation of "Faust," which was published in the United States, England, and Germany. In 1870 he delivered a course of lectures, as professor of German literature, at Cornell university. He went again to Weimar in search of materials for biographies of Goethe and Schiller, and in February, 1874, revisited Italy and Egypt. Midsummer found him at the Millennial celebration of Iceland, which he described for the "Tribune," and reached home in the autumn. In 1876 he once more occupied a desk in the "Tribune" office. On 4 July, 1876, he delivered the stately National ode at the Centennial celebration in Philadelphia. In 1877 his health failed, and after a partial recuperation he was nominated by President Hayes as minister to Berlin. His confirmation was followed by a notable series of popular testimonials, culminating with a banquet in New York, at which the poet Bryant presided, 4 April, 1878. He entered upon his official duties in May. His books of travel, subsequent to those heretofore named, were "Travels in Greece and Rome" (New York, 1859); "At Home and Abroad" (2 vols., 1859-'62); "Colorado: a Summer Trip" (1867); "Byways of Europe" (1869); "Travels in Arabia" (1872); and "Egypt and Iceland" (1874). Among his miscellaneous works are a "Masque," for the golden wedding of his parents (printed privately, 1868); a "School History of Germany to 1871" (1874); "The Boys of other Countries" (1876); and "The Echo Club" (1876). The last-named is a book of talk upon modern poets, with burlesque imitations of their verse, for which sparkling by-play Taylor had a native readiness. He also edited, with George Ripley, a "Handbook of Literature and Fine Arts" (1852), and, alone, the "Illustrated Library of Travel" (8 vols., 1871-'4), besides various translations. He began with much zest, in 1863, his career as a novelist, laying his plots and scenes in his own country. "Hannah Thurston" (1863), whose heroine is a Pennsylvania Quakeress, was followed by "John Godfrey's Fortunes" (1864); "The Story of Kennett" (1866); "Joseph and his Friend" (1870); and "Beauty and the Beast, and Tales of Home" (1872). "The Story of Kennett" is the most complete as a work of art. But it was as a poet that Taylor exerted all his powers and hoped to be remembered, and some of his verse reflects his highest creative mood. His later books of poetry comprise "The Poet's Journal" (Boston, 1862); "Poems" (1865); "The Picture of St. John," a romantic art-poem (1869); "Ballad of Abraham Lincoln" (1869); "The Masque of the Gods" (1872); "Lars: a Pastoral of Norway" (1873); "The Prophet: a Tragedy" (1874); "Home-Pastorals" (1875); "The National Ode" (1876); and "Prince Deukalion: a Lyrical Drama" (1878). His poetry is striking for qualities that appeal to the ear and eye, finished, sonorous in diction and rhythm, at times too rhetorical, but rich in sound, color, and metrical effects. His early models were Byron and Shelley, and his more ambitious lyrics and dramas exhibit the latter's peculiar, often vague, spirituality. "Lars," somewhat after the manner of Tennyson, is his longest and most attractive narrative poem. "Prince Deukalion" was designed for a masterpiece; its blank verse and choric interludes are noble in spirit and mould. Some of Taylor's songs, oriental idyls, and the true and tender Pennsylvanian ballads, have passed into lasting favor, and show the native quality of his poetic gift. His fame rests securely upon his unequalled rendering of "Faust" in the original metres, of which the first and second parts appeared in 1870 and 1871. His commentary upon Part II. for the first time interpreted the motive and allegory of that unique structure. During his one summer in Germany he was able only to revise the proofs of "Prince Deukalion" and to write an "Epicidium" on the death of Bryant. Tributes were paid to his memory at Berlin, Berthold Auerbach pronouncing an eloquent address. His remains, on arriving at New York, were honored with a solemn reception by the German societies and an oration by Algernon S. Sullivan. The body lay in state at the city-hall, was then removed to Kennett, and there interred, 15 March, 1879. Posthumous collections of Taylor's miscellanies, "Studies in German Literature" (1879), and "Essays and Notes" (1880), were edited by George H. Boker and Mrs. Taylor. In person he was of a handsome and commanding figure, with an oriental yet frank countenance, a rich voice, and engaging smile and manner.—His wife, Marie Hansen, b. in Gotha, Germany, 2 June, 1829, is the daughter of the late Prof. Peter A. Hansen, founder of the Erfurt observatory. She zealously promoted her husband's literary career, and translated into German his "Greece" (Leipsic, 1858); "Hannah Thurston" (Hamburg, 1863); "Story of Kennett" (Gotha, 1868); "Tales of Home" (Berlin, 1879); "Studies in German Literature" (Leipsic, 1880); and notes to "Faust," both parts (Leipsic, 1881). After her husband's death she edited, with notes, his "Dramatic Works" (1880), and in the same year his "Poems" in a "Household Edition," and brought together his "Critical Essays and Literary Notes." In 1885 she prepared a school edition of "Lars," with notes and a sketch of its author's life. After six years' labor in collecting and arranging the poet's extensive private correspondence, she completed, with Horace E. Scudder, the "Life and Letters of Bayard Taylor" (2 vols., Boston, 1884).

TAYLOR, Benjamin Cook, clergyman, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 24 Feb., 1801; d. in Bergen, N. J., 2 Feb., 1881. He was graduated at Princeton in 1819 and at the New Brunswick theological seminary in 1822, held various pastorates between 1825 and 1828, and from the latter year till the time of his death was pastor of the Reformed church at Bergen, the 200th anniversary of which he commemorated in a sermon in 1861. Besides this and other discourses, he published "Annals of the Classis and Township of Bergen" (1856). He received the degree of D. D. from Hobart in 1843.—His brother, Isaac Ebenezer, physician, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 25 April, 1812, was educated at Rutgers, and graduated at the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania in 1834. He was engaged in mercantile business in New York city from 1835 till 1839, then began practice, travelled and studied in Europe in 1840-'1, and after his return had charge for seven years, as attending physician, of cases of diseases of women in the Eastern, City, Northern, and Demilt dispensaries, in which he introduced a system of clinical instruction in his department. In 1851 he was elected physician to Bellevue hospital. In 1860 he suggested the establishment of a medical college in connection with the hospital, and in the following year Bellevue hospital medical college was incorporated and went into operation, with Dr. Taylor as its president and treasurer. In 1863, at his suggestion, an out-door department was organized in connection with the hospital. He resigned his professorship of obstetrics in 1867, but was elected emeritus professor, and continued in the presidency of the faculty. He was president of the medical board of Bellevue hospital from 1868 till 1876, when he ceased his labors as attending obstetrical physician. From 1860 till 1874 he was attending physician to Charity hospital, and for the first two years was president of its medical board. As consulting physician, he is still connected with both hospitals. Since 1876 he has been obstetrical physician to the Maternity hospital. He is vice-president of the American gynecological society. He was one of the originators of the "New York Medical Journal" and president of its association in 1869-'70. As early as 1839 Dr. Taylor suggested the hypodermic method of treatment by morphia and strychnia. He was the earliest American physician to use the speculum in diseases of women, publishing a paper on the subject in 1841. He was also the first to introduce the subject of uterine auscultation, and in 1843 edited Dr. Evory Kennedy's work on that diagnostic method. He has published original monographs on the symptoms and treatment of Addison's disease, the inhalation of chloroform as a remedy for regurgitation of the stomach, the non-shortening of the cervix uteri during gestation, the nature of placenta previa, the seat of disease in procidentia uteri, the mechanism of spontaneous inversion of the uterus, and on contracted and faulty pelves, and various other subjects connected with midwifery.—A son of Benjamin C., William James Romeyn, clergyman,

b. in Schodack, Rensselaer co., N. Y., 31 July, 1823, was graduated at Rutgers in 1841, and at the theological seminary at New Brunswick in 1844, and licensed by the classis of Bergen in the latter year. He was pastor of the Reformed church at New Durham, N. J., in 1844-'6, then in Jersey City for three years, in Schenectady, N. Y., for about the same length of time, then of another church in Jersey City in 1852-'4, and after that of the 3d Reformed church of Philadelphia till 1862, when he became corresponding secretary of the American Bible society. He resumed the active work of the ministry in 1869, and from that year has had charge of a church in Newark, N. J. He presided over the general synod in 1871. From 1872 till 1876 he edited the "Christian Intelligencer," and attended the Presbyterian councils held in Philadelphia, Belfast, and London. The degree of D. D. was conferred on him by Rutgers in 1860. Dr. Taylor has written much for the religious press and published hymns, addresses, sermons, and tracts. He is the author of "Louisa, a Pastor's Memorial" (Philadelphia, 1860); "The Bible in the Last Hundred Years" (1876); "Church Extension in Large Cities" (1880); and "On Co-operation in Foreign Missions" (1884).

TAYLOR, Bushrod Bust, naval officer, b. in Madison, Ind., 31 March, 1832; d. in Washington, D. C., 22 April, 1883. He entered the navy as an acting midshipman, 3 April, 1849, and was graduated at the naval academy, 12 June, 1855. He was promoted to master on 16 Sept., lieutenant, 31 July, 1856, and served in the Paraguay expedition of 1859. He went to the naval academy as an instructor in October, 1860, and assisted in the removal of the academy from Annapolis to Newport. From May to August, 1861, he served in the flagship "Colorado," in the Gulf squadron, on the blockade. He was in the supply and despatch steamer "Connecticut" in 1861-'2, and was executive of the steamer "Cimmerone" in James river and the South Atlantic blockade in 1862-'3. He was promoted to lieutenant-commander, 16 July, 1862, served in the steamer "Ticonderoga," flag-ship of the West India squadron, in 1863, and commanded the steamer "Kanawha," in the Western Gulf squadron, until 28 Sept., 1865. He next served at the Philadelphia navy-yard in 1865-'6, and at the naval academy as an instructor in 1866-'9. He was commissioned commander, 14 March, 1868, and had the steamer "Idaho," of the Asiatic squadron, in 1869. In this vessel he encountered the centre of a terrible typhoon, in which she was completely dismantled and became almost a total wreck. This was one of the worst storms, that was ever survived by any ship. He next commanded the "Ashuelot" on the same station, until January, 1872, served at the Philadelphia navy-yard in 1872, and in the bureau of yards and docks at Washington in 1872-'4. He commanded the steamer "Wachusett" during the threatened war with Spain in 1874, was a member of the board of inspection in 1876, and at the Boston navy-yard in 1876-'9. He was commissioned captain, 27 Oct., 1869, and had special duty at Washington in 1880.

TAYLOR, Christopher, Quaker preacher, b. near Skipton, Yorkshire, England, about 1620; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., in April, 1686. He was a Puritan minister until he was converted to Quaker doctrines by the teachings of George Fox. He was a man of learning, and expounded his belief in different parts of England while pursuing the vocation of a teacher of the classics. After suffering persecution and imprisonment for his convictions he left his school at Edmonton, Middlesex, and emigrated to Pennsylvania. He settled in Bucks county, which he represented in the first assembly of the province, and after the arrival of William Penn he became a member of the council, and continued a councillor till the time of his death. He also held the office of registrar-general, removing to Philadelphia from Chester county, where he had for some time resided and held a commission as justice of the peace. He published "Compendium trium linguarum" (1679).

TAYLOR, Edward, clergyman, b. in England in 1642; d. in Westfield, Mass., 29 June, 1729. He began his education in England with the intention of following the ministry, left that country on account of measures that were taken against non-conformists, and on his arrival in Massachusetts in 1668 entered Harvard, where he was graduated in 1671. He was invited to become minister to the people of Westfield, and arrived there on 3 Dec., 1671, but, owing to the insecurity of that frontier settlement and the small number of its inhabitants, the church was not organized till 27 Aug., 1679. He performed the duties of minister there, and for much of the time those of physician also, until his death. He left several manuscript volumes, including a "Commentary on the Four Gospels," "Christographia, or a Discourse on the Virtues and Character of Christ," and poems in English and in Latin.

TAYLOR, Edward Thompson, missionary, b. in Richmond, Va., 25 Dec., 1793; d. in Boston, Mass., 6 April, 1871. He was left an orphan in infancy, taken away by a sea-captain when seven years old, and trained as a sailor, in which calling he passed his early life. In 1819 he became a minister of the Methodist Episcopal church. About 1830 he became a Bethel missionary in Boston. He served as chaplain on the frigate "Macedonian," which took supplies to the famishing Irish in 1827, and delivered addresses in Cork and Glasgow. "Father Taylor," as he was called, mingled nautical terms and figures in his discourses, and by his wit, pathos, and imagination controlled the moods and wrought upon the feelings of his hearers in a remarkable degree.

TAYLOR, George, signer of the Declaration of Independence, b. in Ireland in 1716; d. in Easton, Pa., 23 Feb., 1781. He is said to have been the son of a clergyman and to have received a liberal education and begun the study of medicine, which he abandoned in order to emigrate to this country in 1736. Leaving his home clandestinely and without money, he took passage as a redemptioner, and on his arrival at Philadelphia was bound to an iron-manufacturer at Durham, Pa., for a term of years. He worked as a clerk, instead of at common labor, and when his employer died, several years later, he married the widow, and became proprietor of the works, which prospered under his direction. Removing to Northampton county, where he established a large iron-mill, he was soon called to take part in public affairs as a member of the provincial assembly that met at Philadelphia on 15 Oct., 1764. He was appointed on the committee on grievances, and engaged effectively in the debate on the revision of the charter. He was re-elected for each year till 1770, taking an active part in the discussions, and after that applied himself to his business, which proved unprofitable in the new situation, holding only the offices of county judge and colonel of militia. Returning to Durham, he was again sent to the provincial assembly in 1775, and was placed on the committee of safety. He was a member also of committees on grants of the crown and military preparations and of the one that was appointed to draw up instructions for the delegates to the Continental congress. These instructions, forbidding them to vote for separation, were revoked in June, 1776, and because five of the delegates from Pennsylvania hesitated to agree to the Declaration of Independence, others were chosen in their place on 20 July. George Taylor was one of the new delegates. He took his seat in congress on the day of his election, and signed his name to the declaration with the other members when the engrossed copy of the instrument was ready, 2 Aug. He made a treaty in behalf of congress with several Indian tribes of the Susquehanna border at Easton, where he had resided in the neighborhood of his estates in Northampton county, and in March, 1777, he retired from congress.

TAYLOR, George H., physician, b. in Williston, Vt., in 1821. He was graduated at the New York medical college in 1852, studied the Swedish treatment, developed the massage-cure for nervous, gynecological, and other classes of diseases, and invented mechanical massage, with apparatus for expanding the chest, lifting the contents of the pelvis, kneading the abdomen, and transmitting motor energy. Dr. Taylor is the author of "Exposition of the Swedish Movement-Cure" (New York, 1860); "Paralysis and Diseases of the Nerves, and the Remedial Use of Transmitted Motor Energy" (1872); "Health for Women" (1880); "Massage" (1884); "Pelvic and Hernial Therapeutics" (1884); and "Massage; Mechanical Processes" (1887).—His brother, Charles Fayette, surgeon, b. in Williston, Vt., 25 April, 1827, was graduated at the medical department of the University of Vermont in 1856, and settled in New York city, devoting himself to the specialty of orthopedy. He founded the New York orthopedic dispensary and hospital in 1866, and was surgeon there till 1876. In 1867 he was appointed consulting orthopedic surgeon to St. Luke's hospital. Dr. Taylor is the inventor of an antero-posterior spinal apparatus, and other contrivances for the correction of spinal deviations consequent upon Pott's disease and angular and lateral curvature of the spine; a long counter-extension hip-splint for disease of the hip-joint; a jointed supporting splint for the recovering stage of hip-disease and for other purposes; and various apparatus for the correction of club-foot and other deformities of the feet and legs, and others for promoting the development of certain muscles or groups of muscles by means of local exercise; also of an osteoclast and a genucrist. He received medals for his inventions at the international exhibitions of 1873 and 1876 at Vienna and Philadelphia, and was elected a corresponding member of the Royal society of physicians at Vienna. Besides monographs on the Swedish treatment in the New York medical journals, he published a volume on the "Theory and Practice of the Movement-Cure" (Philadelphia, 1861). He is the author of many medical papers, the chief of which are those on "Synovitis of the Knee-Joint," "Emotional Prodigality," and "Bodily Conditions as related to Mental States," and of volumes on "Spinal Irritation, or Causes of Backache in American Women" (New York, 1864); "Mechanical Treatment of Angular Curvature of the Spine" (New York, 1864; German translation, Berlin, 1873); "Infantile Paralysis and its Attendant Deformities" (Philadelphia, 1867); "Mechanical Treatment of Disease of the Hip-Joint" (New York, 1873; German ed., Berlin, 1873); and "Sensation and Pain" (New York, 1881).

In the beginning of the Mexican war he assisted in raising a company in New Jersey, being commissioned as lieutenant on 8 March, 1847, and as captain in the following September, and served through Gen. Zachary Taylor's campaigns. After the war he went to California, remaining there three years. Returning then to New Jersey, he occupied himself in mining and iron-manufacturing. When the civil war began he was made colonel of the 3d New Jersey infantry, which left for the field on 28 June, 1861, assisted in guarding Long Bridge, formed part of the reserve division at Bull Run, and participated in the occupation of Manassas in March, 1862, being the first to perceive the enemy retreating. When Gen. Philip Kearny was promoted, Col. Taylor succeeded to the command of the brigade, which he led in the advance on Richmond and the seven days' battles, receiving his commission as brigadier-general of volunteers on 9 May, 1862. At Gaines's Mills his command was subjected to the hottest fire. At the second battle of Bull Run he fought with distinguished courage, and received wounds from which he soon after died.

During the second war with Great Britain he used his money and credit to pay the troops, took the field as brigadier-general of Kentucky militia, served as quartermaster-general of the northwestern army under Gen. William Hull, and was active in concerting a plan to displace Hull and confide the command of the fortress at Detroit to Gen. Duncan McArthur. When Gen. Hull ordered him to act with Col. James Miller and the British officers in drawing up articles of capitulation, he refused to have any participation in the surrender. He became one of the largest land-owners in the west.

In 1839-'40 he officiated as chaplain of the University of Virginia. Returning to Richmond, he served as a pastor there for five years longer. He labored also as a missionary, and in 1845, soon after the organization of the Southern Baptist convention, became its corresponding secretary. He was pastor also of the Baptist church at Taylorsville, Hanover co., Va., till the civil war began. During the war he labored as a colporteur in camps and hospitals, and for three years as Confederate post-chaplain. two years, after which he returned to his former church at Staunton, of which he again took leave in 1873, on being appointed by the mission board of the Southern Baptist convention missionary to Rome, Italy. He was co-editor of the "Christian Review" for two years, and since 1876 he has been one of the editors of "Il Seminare," a monthly Baptist magazine published in Rome. The degree of D. After his graduation at Princeton in 1826 he studied at Yale divinity-school, taking an active part in the revivals in the neighborhood and in the south, whither he removed on account of failing health. His faith and ardor are commemorated in a "Memoir" by John H. and Benjamin H. Rice, who were near him in his last days at the Theological seminary of Virginia (New York, 1833).—His brother, Fitch Waterman, author, b. in Middle Haddam, Conn., 4 Aug., 1803; d. in Brooklyn, N. In 1817 he was appointed a commissioner to revise the statute laws of North Carolina. The work was completed and published in 1821, and a continuation by Judge Taylor appeared in 1825. In January, 1836, he began the publication at Albany, N. Y., of a monthly educational magazine called the "Common-School Assistant," which was also successful. Public-spirited citizens sent large subscriptions for gratuitous circulation of the periodical, and after four years the New York state legislature established a paper of the same character and intent. Mr. Taylor published, with a long introduction, a translation of Victor Cousin's "Report of the Prussian School System" (New York, 1836), and for the succeeding fifteen years lectured on the improvement of common-school education in the principal cities of the country. TAYLOR, Mary Cecilia, actress, b. in New York city, 13 March, 1827; d. there, 10 Nov., 1866. She began her career as chorus-singer at the New York National and Park theatres, and gradually won her way to the representation of small parts and soubrette and burlesque performances, until she attained a respectable rank as a comedian and opera-singer. On a few occasions she appeared in Brooklyn, Albany, and Boston, but during most of her career was connected with the Olympic, Brougham's, and Burton's theatres, of New York city. Several years before her death Miss Taylor married William O. Ewen, a merchant, and retired from the stage. She was personally attractive and her voice, though small, was agreeable, but her style suffered from want of refinement. She had winning ways, which charmed the public and for years rendered "Our Mary," as she was called, a very general favorite.

In November, 1822, he resigned this office on being appointed professor of didactic theology at Yale. His theological system was in some respects a development of that of Timothy Dwight, whose pupil and amanuensis he was for two years after leaving college. His views on total depravity and other dogmas, which he first enunciated in the annual discourse to the clergy in 1828, and afterward defended in the "Christian Spectator," were earnestly controverted by Bennett Tyler, Leonard Woods, and other clergymen. His other essays and doctrinal sermons that were published during the Unitarian controversy excited attention and discussion. He was the leader of the New Haven school of theology, and exercised a powerful influence on the religious thought of his time. He received the degree of D. D. from Union college in 1823. After his death his son-in-law, Noah Porter, published his "Practical Sermons" (New York, 1858); "Lectures on the Moral Government of God" (2 vols., 1859); and "Essays

He continued occupied with similar work in the United States, and also made surveys of mining lands in Cuba and the British provinces. Mr. Taylor's knowledge of theoretical geology led him to refer the old red sandstone that underlies the Pennsylvania coal-fields to its true place, corresponding with its location in the series of European rocks. He was the first to point out this fact. Prior to his arrival in this country he devoted much attention to archæology, and published "Index Monasticus, or the Abbeys, Monasteries, etc., formerly established in the City of Norwich and the Ancient Kingdom of East Anglia" (London, 1821); "The Geology of East Anglia" (1827); and a very complete "General Index to Dugdale's 'Monasticon Anglicanum'" (1830). On 16 July he was in the battle on board the monitor "Catskill," and on 18 July in the monitor "Montauk." He commanded the steamer "Juniata" in both attacks on Fort Fisher. He was president of the board to revise the navy regulations, was in charge of the ordnance-yard at Washington in 1866-'7, and was promoted to commodore, 25 July, 1866. He was a member of the examining board in 1868, commanded the northern squadron of the Pacific fleet in 1869-'71, was promoted to rear-admiral, 19 Jan., 1871, and was president of the examining board in 1871-'2, and commanded the South Atlantic squadron from 22 May, 1872, till 7 Nov., 1873, when he was retired.

TAYLOR, Zachary, twelfth president of the United States, b. in Orange county, Va., 24 Sept., 1784; d. in the executive mansion, Washington, D. C., 9 July, 1850. His father, Col. Richard Taylor, an officer in the war of the Revolution, was conspicuous for zeal and daring among men in whom personal gallantry was the rule. After the war he retired to private life, and in 1785 removed to Kentucky, then a sparsely occupied county of Virginia, and made his home near the present city of Louisville, where he died. Zachary was the third son. Brought up on a farm in a new settlement, he had few scholastic opportunities; but in the thrift, industry, self-denial, and forethought required by the circumstances, he learned such lessons as were well adapted to form the character illustrated by his eventful career. Yet he had also another form of education. The liberal grants of land that Virginia made to her soldiers caused many of them, after the peace of 1783, to remove to the west; thus Col. Taylor's neighbors included many who had been his fellow-soldiers, and these often met around his wide hearth. Their conversation would naturally be reminiscences of their military life, and all the sons of Col. Taylor, save one, Hancock, entered the U. S. army. The rapid extension of settlements on the border was productive of frequent collision with the Indians, and required the protection of a military force.

In 1808, on the recommendation of President Jefferson, congress authorized the raising of five regiments of infantry, one of riflemen, one of light artillery, and one of light dragoons. From the terms of the act it was understood that this was not to be a permanent increase of the U. S. army, and many of the officers of the "old army" declined to seek promotion in the new regiments. At this period questions had arisen between the United States and Great Britain which caused serious anticipations of a war with that power, and led many to regard the additional force authorized as a preliminary step in preparation for such a war. Zachary Taylor, then in his twenty-fourth year, applied for a commission and was appointed a 1st lieutenant in the 7th infantry, one of the new regiments, and in 1810 was promoted to the grade of captain in the same regiment, according to the regulations of the service. He was happily married in 1810 to Miss Margaret Smith, of Calvert county, Md., who shared with him the privations and dangers of his many years of frontier service, and survived him but a short time. The troubles on the frontier continued to increase until 1811, when Gen. William H. Harrison, afterward president of the United States, marched against the stronghold of the Shawnees and fought the battle of Tippecanoe.

In June, 1812, war was declared against England, and this increased the widespread and not unfounded fears of Indian invasion in the valley of the Wabash. To protect Vincennes from sudden assault, Capt. Taylor was ordered to Fort Harrison, a stockade on the river above Vincennes, and with his company of infantry, about fifty strong, made preparations to defend the place. He had not long to wait. A large body of Indians, knowing the smallness of the garrison, came, confidently counting on its capture; but as it is a rule in their warfare to seek by stratagem to avoid equal risk and probable loss, they tried various expedients, which were foiled by the judgment, vigilance, and courage of the commander, and when the final attack was made, the brave little garrison repelled it with such loss to the assailants that when, in the following October, Gen. Hopkins came to support Fort Harrison, no Indians were to be found thereabout. For the defence of Fort Harrison, Capt. Taylor received the brevet of major, an honor that had seldom, if ever before, been conferred for service in Indian war. In the following November, Maj. Taylor, with a battalion of regulars, formed a part of the command of Gen. Hopkins in the expedition against the hostile Indians at the head-waters of the Wabash. In 1814, with his separate command, he being then a major by commission, he made a campaign against the hostile Indians and their British allies on Rock river, which was so successful as to give subsequent security to that immediate frontier. In such service, not the less hazardous or indicative of merit because on a small scale, he passed the period of his employment on that frontier until the treaty of peace with Great Britain disposed the Indians to be quiet.

After the war, 3 March, 1815, a law was enacted to fix the military peace establishment of the United States. By this act the whole force was to be reduced to 10,000 men, with such proportions of artillery, infantry, and riflemen as the president should judge proper. The president was to cause the officers and men of the existing army to be arranged, by unrestricted transfers, so as to form the corps authorized by the recent act, and the supernumeraries were to be discharged. Maj. Taylor had borne the responsibilities and performed the duties of a battalion commander so long and successfully that when the arranging board reduced him to the rank of captain in the new organization he felt the injustice, but resigned from the army without complaint, returned home, and proceeded, as he said in after-years, "to make a crop of corn." Influences that were certainly not employed by him, and are unknown to the writer of this sketch, caused his restoration to the grade of major, and he resumed his place in the army, there to continue until the voice of the people called him to the highest office within their gift. Under the rules that governed promotion in the army, Maj. Taylor became lieutenant-colonel of the 1st infantry, and commanded at Fort Snelling, then the advanced post in the northwest.

In 1832 he became colonel of the 1st infantry, with headquarters at Fort Crawford, Prairie du Chien. The barracks were unfinished, and his practical mind and conscientious attention to every duty were manifest in the progress and completion of the work. The second Black Hawk campaign occurred this year, and Col. Taylor, with the greater part of his regiment, joined the army commanded by Gen. Henry Atkinson, and with it moved from Rock Island up the valley of Rock river, following Black Hawk, who had gone to make a junction with the Pottawattamie band of the Prophet, a nephew of Black Hawk. This was in violation of the treaty he had made with Gen. Edmund P. Gaines in 1831, by which he was required to remove to the west of the Mississippi, relinquishing all claim to the Rock river villages. It was assumed that his purpose in returning to the east side of the river was hostile, and, from the defenceless condition of the settlers and the horror of savage atrocity, great excitement was created, due rather to his fame, as a warrior than to the number of his followers. If, as he subsequently declared, his design was to go and live peaceably with his nephew, the Prophet, rather than with the Foxes, of whom Keokuk was the chief, that design may have been frustrated by the lamentable mistake of some mounted volunteers in hastening forward in pursuit of Black Hawk, who, with his band—men, women, and children—was going up on the south side of the Rock river. The pursuers fell into an ambuscade, and were routed with some loss and in great confusion. The event will be remembered by the men of that day as "Stillman's run."

The vanity of the young Indians was inflated by their success, as was shown by some exultant messages; and the sagacious old chief, whatever he may have previously calculated upon, now saw that war was inevitable and immediate. With his band recruited by warriors from the Prophet's band, he crossed to the north side of Rock river, and, passing through the swamp Koshkenong, fled over the prairies west of the Four Lakes, toward Wisconsin river. Gen. Henry Dodge, with a battalion of mounted miners, overtook the Indians while they were crossing the Wisconsin and attacked their rear-guard, which, when the main body had crossed, swam the river and joined the retreat over the Kickapoo hills toward the Mississippi. Gen. Atkinson, with his whole army, continued the pursuit, and, after a toilsome march, overtook the Indians north of Prairie du Chien, on the bank of the Mississippi, to the west side of which they were preparing to cross in bark canoes made on the spot. That purpose was foiled by the accidental arrival of a steamboat with a small gun on board. The Indians took cover in a willow marsh, and there was fought the battle of the Bad Axe. The Indians were defeated, and dispersed, and the campaign ended. In the mean time, Gen. Winfield Scott, with troops from the east, took chief command and established his headquarters at Rock Island, and thither Gen. Atkinson went with the regular troops, except that part of the 1st infantry which constituted the garrison of Fort Crawford. With these Col. Taylor returned to Prairie du Chien. When it was reported that the Indians were on an island above the prairie, he sent a lieutenant with an appropriate command to explore the island, where unmistakable evidence was found of the recent presence of the Indians and of their departure. Immediately thereafter a group of Indians appeared on the east bank of the river under a white flag, who proved to be Black Hawk, with a remnant of his band and a few friendly Winnebagoes. The lieutenant went with them to the fort, where Col. Taylor received them, except the Winnebagoes, as prisoners. A lieutenant and a guard were sent with them, sixty in number—men, women, and children—by steamboat, to Rock Island, there to report to Gen. Scott for orders in regard to the prisoners. Col. Taylor actively participated in the campaign up to its close, and to him was surrendered the chief who had most illustrated the warlike instincts of the Indian race, to whom history must fairly accord the credit of having done much under the most disadvantageous circumstances. In 1836 Col. Taylor was ordered to Florida for service in the Seminole war, and the next year he defeated the Indians in the decisive battle of Okechobee, for which he received the brevet of brigadier-general, and in 1838 was appointed to the chief command in Florida. In 1840 he was assigned to command the southern division of the western department of the army. Though Gen. Taylor had for many years been a cotton-planter, his family had lived with him at his military station, but, when ordered for an indefinite time on field service, he made his family home at Baton Rouge, La.

Texas having been annexed to the United States in 1845, Mexico threatened to invade Texas with the avowed purpose to recover the territory, and Gen. Taylor was ordered to defend it as a part of the United States. He proceeded with all his available force, about 1,500 men, to Corpus Christi, where he was joined by re-enforcements of regulars and volunteers. Discussion had arisen as to whether the Nueces or the Rio Grande was the proper boundary of Texas. His political opinions, whatever they might be, were subordinate to the duty of a soldier to execute the orders of his government, and, without uttering it, he acted on the apophthegm of Decatur: "My country, right or wrong, my country." Texas claimed protection for her frontier, the president recognized the fact that Texas had been admitted to the Union with the Rio Grande as her boundary, and Gen. Taylor was instructed to advance to that river. His force had been increased to about 4,000, when, on 8 March, 1846, he marched from Corpus Christi. He was of course conscious of the inadequacy of his division to resist such an army as Mexico might send against it, but when ordered by superior authority it was not his to remonstrate. Gen. Gaines, commanding the western department, had made requisitions for a sufficient number of volunteers to join Taylor, but the secretary of war countermanded them, except as to such as had already joined. Gen. Taylor, with a main depot at Point Isabel, advanced to the bank of the Rio Grande, opposite to Matamoras, and there made provision for defence of the place called Fort Brown. Soon after his arrival, Ampudia, the Mexican general at Matamoras, made a threatening demand that Gen. Taylor should withdraw his troops beyond the Nueces, to which he replied that his position had been taken by order of his government, and would be maintained. Having completed the intrenchment, and being short of supplies, he left a garrison to hold it, and marched with an aggregate force of 2,288 men to obtain additional supplies from Point Isabel, about thirty miles distant. Gen. Arista, the new Mexican commander, availing himself of the opportunity to interpose, crossed the river below Fort Brown with a force estimated at 6,000 regular troops, 10 pieces of artillery, and a considerable amount of auxiliaries. In the afternoon of the second day's march from Point Isabel these were reported by Gen. Taylor's cavalry to be in his front, and he halted to allow the command to rest and for the needful dispositions for battle. In the evening a request was made that a council of war should be held, to which Gen. Taylor assented. The prevalent opinion was in favor of falling back to Point Isabel, there to intrench and wait for re-enforcements. After listening to a full expression of views, the general announced: "I shall go to Fort Brown or stay in my shoes," a western expression equivalent to "or die in the attempt." He then notified the officers to prepare to attack the enemy at dawn of day. In the morning of 8 May the advance was made by columns until the enemy's batteries opened, when line of battle was formed and Taylor's artillery, inferior in number but otherwise superior, was brought fully into action and soon dispersed the mass of the enemy's cavalry. The chaparral, dense copses of thorn-bushes, served both to conceal the position of the enemy and to impede the movements of the attacking force. The action closed at night, when the enemy retired, and Gen. Taylor bivouacked on the field. Early in the morning of 9 May he resumed his march, and in the afternoon encountered Gen. Arista in a strong position with artillery advantageously posted. Taylor's infantry pushed through the chaparral lining both sides of the road, and drove the enemy's infantry before them; but the batteries held their position, and were so fatally used that it was an absolute necessity to capture them. For this purpose the general ordered a squadron of dragoons to charge them. The enemy's gunners were cut down at their pieces, the commanding officer was captured, and the infantry soon made the victory complete. The Mexican loss in the two battles was estimated at a thousand; the American, killed, forty-nine. The enemy precipitately recrossed the Rio Grande, leaving the usual evidence of a routed army. Gen. Taylor then proceeded to Fort Brown. During his absence it had been heavily bombarded, and the commander, Maj. Brown, had been killed. The Mexicans evacuated Matamoras, and Gen. Taylor took peaceable possession, 18 May.

The Rio Grande, except at time of flood, offered little obstacle to predatory incursions, and it was obviously sound policy to press the enemy back from the border. Gen. Taylor, therefore, moved forward to Camargo, on the San Juan, a tributary of the Rio Grande. This last-named river rose so as to enable steamboats to transport troops and supplies, and by September a sufficiently large force of volunteers had reported at Gen. Taylor's headquarters to justify a further march into the interior, but the move must be by land, and for that there was far from adequate transportation. Hiring Mexican packers to supplement the little transportation on hand, he was able to add one division of volunteers to the regulars of his command, and with a force of 6,625 men of all arms he marched against Monterey, a fortified town of great natural strength, garrisoned by 10,000 men under Gen. Ampudia. On 19 Sept. he encamped before the town, and on the 21st began the attack. On the third day Gen. Ampudia proposed to surrender, commissioners were appointed, and terms of capitulation agreed upon, by which the enemy were to retire beyond a specified line, and the United States forces were not to advance beyond that line during the next eight weeks or until the pleasure of the respective governments should be known. By some strange misconception, the U. S. government disapproved the arrangement, and ordered that the armistice should be terminated, by which we lost whatever had been gained in the interests of peace by the generous terms of the capitulation, and got nothing, for, during the short time that remained unexpired, no provision had been or could be made to enable Gen. Taylor to advance into the heart of Mexico. Presuming that such must be the purpose of the government, he assiduously strove to collect the means for that object. When his preparations were well-nigh perfected, Gen. Scott was sent to Mexico with orders that enabled him at discretion to strip Gen. Taylor of both troops and material of war, to be used on another line of operations. The projected campaign against the capital of Mexico was to be from Vera Cruz, up the steppes, and against the fortifications that had been built to resist any probable invasion, instead of from Saltillo, across the plains to the comparatively undefended capital. The difficulty on this route was the waterless space to be crossed, and against that Gen. Taylor had ingeniously provided. According to instructions, he went to Victoria, Mexico, turned over his troops, except a proper escort to return through a country of hostiles to Monterey, and then went to Agua Nueva, beyond Saltillo, where he was joined by Gen. John E. Wool with his command from Chihuahua.

Gen. Santa-Anna saw the invitation offered by the withdrawal of Gen. Taylor's troops, and with a well-appointed army, 20,000 strong, marched with the assurance of easily recovering their lost territory. Gen. Taylor fell back to the narrow pass in front of the hacienda of Buena Vista, and here stood on the defensive. His force was 5,400 of all arms; but of these, only three batteries of artillery, one squadron of dragoons, one mounted company of Texans, and one regiment of Mississippi riflemen, had ever been under fire. Some skirmishing occurred on 22 Feb., and a general assault along the whole line was made on the morning of the 23d. The battle, with varying fortune, continued throughout the day; at evening the enemy retired, and during the night retreated by the route on which he had advanced, having suffered much by the casualties of battle, but still more by desertions. So Santa-Anna returned with but a remnant of the regular army of Mexico, on which reliance had been placed to repel invasion, and thenceforward peace was undisturbed in the valley of the Rio Grande. At that time Gen. Taylor's capacity was not justly estimated, his golden silence being often misunderstood. His reply to Sec. Marcy's strictures in regard to the capitulation of Monterey exhibited such vigor of thought and grace of expression that many attributed it to a member of his staff who had a literary reputation. It was written by Gen. Taylor's own hand, in the open air, by his camp-fire at Victoria, Mexico.

Many years of military routine had not dulled his desire for knowledge; he had extensively studied both ancient and modern history, especially the English. Unpretending, meditative, observant, and conclusive, he was best understood and most appreciated by those who had known him long and intimately. In a campaign he gathered information from all who approached him, however sinister their motive might be. By comparison and elimination he gained a knowledge that was often surprising as to the position and designs of the enemy. In battle he was vigilantly active, though quiet in bearing; calm and considerate, though stern and inflexible; but when the excitement of danger and strife had subsided, he had a father's tenderness and care for the wounded, and none more sincerely mourned for those who had bravely fallen in the line of their duty.

Before his nomination for the presidency Gen. Taylor had no political aspirations and looked forward to the time when he should retire from the army as the beginning of a farmer's life. He had planned for his retreat a stock-farm in the hills of Jefferson county, behind his cotton-plantation on the Mississippi river. In his case, as in some other notable instances, the fact of not desiring office rather increased than diminished popular confidence, so that unseeking he was sought. From early manhood he had served continually in the U. S. army. His duties had led him to consider the welfare of the country as one and indivisible, and his opinions were free from party or sectional intensity. Conscious of his want of knowledge of the machinery of the civil service, he formed his cabinet to supplement his own information. They were men well known to the public by the eminent civil stations they had occupied, and were only thus known to Gen. Taylor, who as president had literally no friends to reward and no enemies to punish. The cabinet was constituted as follows: John M. Clayton, of Delaware, secretary of state; William M. Meredith, of Pennsylvania, secretary of the treasury; George W. Crawford, of Georgia, secretary of war; W. Ballard Preston, of Virginia, secretary of the navy; Reverdy Johnson, of Maryland, attorney-general; Alexander H. H. Stuart, of Virginia, secretary of the interior. All these had served in the U. S. senate or the house of representatives, and all were lawyers. Taylor was the popular hero of a foreign war which had been victoriously ended, bringing to the United States a large acquisition of territory with an alluring harvest of gold, but, all unheeded, bringing also a large addition to the elements of sectional contention. These were soon developed, and while the upper air was calm and the sun of prosperity shone brightly on the land, the attentive listener could hear the rumbling sound of approaching convulsion. President Taylor, with the keen watchfulness and intuitive perception that had characterized him as a commander in the field, easily saw and appreciated the danger; but before it had reached the stage for official action he died. His party and local relations, being a Whig and a southern planter, gave him the vantage-ground for the exercise of a restraining influence in the threatened contest. His views, matured under former responsibilities, were tersely given to confidential friends, and as none of his cabinet (except Attorney-General Stuart) survive, their consultations cannot be learned unless from preserved manuscript. During the brief period of his administration the rules that would govern it were made manifest, and no law for civil-service reform was needful for his guidance. With him the bestowal of office was a trust held for the people; it was not to be gained by proof of party zeal and labor. The fact of holding Democratic opinions was not a disqualification for the office. Nepotism had with him no quarter. Gen. Winfield Scott related to the writer an anecdote that may appropriately close this sketch. He said he had remarked to his wife that Gen. Taylor was an upright man, to which she replied: "He is not"; that he insisted his long acquaintance should enable him to judge better than she. But she persisted in her denial, and he asked: "Then what manner of man is he?" When she responded: "He is a downright man."

As president he had purity, patriotism, and discretion to guide him in his new field of duty, and had he lived long enough to stamp his character on his administration, it would have been found that the great soldier was equally fitted to be the head of a government. He was buried in the family cemetery, five miles from Louisville, Ky. Gen. Taylor's life was written by Joseph R. Fry and Robert T. Conrad (Philadelphia, 1848) and by John Frost (New York, 1848).—His wife, Margaret, b. in Calvert county, Md., about 1790; d. near Pascagoula, La., 18 Aug., 1852, was the daughter of Walter Smith, a Maryland planter. She received a home education, married early in life, and, until her husband's election to the presidency, resided with him chiefly in garrisons or on the frontier. During the Florida war she established herself at Tampa bay, and did good service among the sick and wounded in the hospitals there. Mrs. Taylor was without social ambition, and when Gen. Taylor became president she reluctantly accepted her responsibilities, regarding the office as a "plot to deprive her of her husband's society and to shorten his life by unnecessary care." She surrendered to her youngest daughter the superintendence of the household, and took no part in social duties.—Her eldest daughter, SARAH, became the wife of Jefferson Davis.—Another daughter, Elizabeth, b. in Jefferson county, Ky., in 1826, was educated in Philadelphia, married Maj. William W. S. Bliss in her nineteenth year, and, on her father's inauguration, became mistress of the White House. Mrs. Bliss, or Miss Betty, as she was popularly called, was a graceful and accomplished hostess, and, it is said, "did the honors of the establishment with the artlessness of a rustic belle and the grace of a duchess." After the death of her father in 1850, and her husband in 1853, she spent several years in retirement, subsequently marrying Philip Dan-dridge, of Winchester, Va., whom she survives.—His only son, Richard, soldier, b. in New Orleans, 27 Jan., 1826; d. in New York city, 12 April, 1879, was sent to Edinburgh, Scotland, when thirteen years old, where he spent three years in studying the classics, and then a year in France. He entered the junior class at Yale in 1843, and was graduated there in 1845. He was a wide and voracious though a desultory reader. From college he went to his father's camp on the Rio Grande, and he was present at Palo Alto, and Resaca de la Palma. His health then became impaired, and he returned home. He resided on a cotton-plantation in Jefferson county, Miss., until 1849, when he removed to a sugar-estate in St. Charles parish, Louisiana, about twenty miles above New Orleans, where he was residing when the civil war began. He was in the state senate from 1856 to 1860, was a delegate to the Charleston Democratic convention in 1860, and afterward to that at Baltimore, and was a member of the Secession convention of Louisiana. As a member of the military committee, he aided the governor in organizing troops, and in June, 1861, went to Virginia as colonel of the 9th Louisiana volunteers. The day he reached Richmond he left for Manassas, arriving there at dusk on the day of the battle. In the autumn he was made a brigadier-general, and in the spring of 1862 he led his brigade in the valley campaign under "Stonewall" Jackson. He distinguished himself at Front Royal, Middletown, Winchester, Strasburg, Cross Keys, and Port Republic, and Jackson recommended him for promotion. Taylor was also with Jackson in the seven days' battles before Richmond. He was promoted to major-general, and assigned to the command of Louisiana. The fatigues and exposures of his campaigns there brought on a partial and temporary paralysis of the lower limbs; but in August he assumed command. The only communication across the Mississippi retained by the Confederates was between Vicksburg and Port Hudson; but Taylor showed great ability in raising, organizing, supplying, and handling an army, and he gradually won back the state west of the Mississippi from the National forces. He had reclaimed the whole of this when Vicksburg fell, 4 July, 1863, and was then compelled to fall back west of Berwick's bay. Gen. Taylor's principal achievement during the war was his defeat of Gen. Nathaniel P. Banks at Sabine Cross-Roads, near Mansfield, De Soto parish, La., 8 April, 1864. With 8,000 men he attacked the advance of the northern army and routed it, capturing twenty-two guns and a large number of prisoners. He followed Banks, who fell back to Pleasant hill, and on the next day again attacked him, when Taylor was defeated, losing the fruits of the first day's victory. These two days' fighting have been frequently compared to that of Shiloh—a surprise and defeat on the first day, followed by a substantial victory of the National forces on the second. In the summer of 1864 Taylor was promoted to be a lieutenant-general, and ordered to the command of the Department of Alabama, Mississippi, etc. Here he was able merely to protract the contest, while the great armies decided it. After Lee and Johnston capitulated there was nothing for him, and he surrendered to Gen. Edward R. S. Canby, at Citronelle, 8 May, 1865. The war left Taylor ruined in fortune, and he soon went abroad. Returning home, he took part in politics as an adviser, and his counsel was held in special esteem by Samuel J. Tilden in his presidential canvass. During this period he wrote his memoir of the war, entitled "Destruction and Reconstruction" (New York, 1879).—His brother, Joseph Pannel, soldier, b. near Louisville, Ky., 4 May, 1796; d. in Washington, D. C., 29 June, 1864, served in the ranks on the Canadian frontier during the war of 1812, was appointed a lieutenant of U. S. infantry on 20 May, 1813, served through the war with Great Britain, and was retained on the peace establishment as lieutenant of artillery, becoming a captain in July, 1825. He was appointed commissary of subsistence in 1829, and thenceforth served in that department, becoming assistant commissary-general, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel, in 1841. On 30 May, 1848, he was brevetted colonel for his services in prosecuting the war with Mexico, during which he was chief commissary of the army on the upper line of operations. In September, 1861, he was made colonel and commissary-general, and on 9 Feb., 1863, was promoted brigadier-general. His wife was a daughter of Justice John McLean.—Their son, John

McLean, soldier, b. in Washington, D. C., 21 Nov., 1828; d. in Baltimore, Md., 21 Nov., 1875, entered the U. S. army as 2d lieutenant in the 3d artillery on 3 March, 1848, and was promoted 1st lieutenant on 30 June, 1851, and captain and commissary of subsistence on 11 May, 1851. He served faithfully in his department during the civil war, becoming major on 9 Feb., 1863, and receiving the brevets of lieutenant-colonel and colonel to date from 13 March, 1865.—Another son, Joseph Hancock, soldier, b. in Kentucky, 26 Jan., 1836; d. in Omaha, Neb., 13 March, 1885, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1856, and commissioned 2d lieutenant of cavalry on 16 Jan., 1857. He served in Kansas, in the Utah expedition, and in a campaign in 1860 against the Kiowa and Comanche Indians of Colorado. He was promoted 1st lieutenant on 22 April, 1861, and captain on 14 May, and was appointed acting adjutant-general of Gen. Edwin V. Sumner's division on 27 Nov., 1861. During the peninsula campaign, and subsequently in the Maryland campaign, he served as acting assistant adjutant-general of the 2d corps, winning the brevet of major at Fair Oaks, and that of lieutenant-colonel at the Antietam. He was assistant adjutant-general at Fredericksburg, and assistant inspector-general of cavalry in Stoneman's raid. On 1 June, 1863, he was assigned to duty as assistant adjutant-general of the department at Washington. He was appointed a major on the staff on 30 March, 1866, and on 13 Aug. was brevetted colonel for faithful services during the war. He was on duty in different military departments till his death, which was due to disease that he had contracted in the line of duty.

TAZEWELL, Henry, senator, b. in Brunswick county, Va., in 1753; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 24 Jan., 1799. He was educated at William and Mary, studied law with his uncle, John, was admitted to practice, and in 1775 was elected to the house of burgesses. In the convention of 1776 he was placed on the committee that reported the declaration of rights and the constitution. He continued a member of the legislature, taking an active part in its deliberations till 1785, when he was appointed to a seat on the supreme bench of Virginia. He served as a member of the court of appeals, and in 1793, when a separate appellate court was constituted, he was chosen one of the judges. In the following year he resigned in order to take his seat in the U. S. senate, of which he was a member till his death. In 1795 he was elected president, pro tempore. During the discussion of John Jay's English treaty he was the leader of the Republican opposition.—His son, Littleton Waller, statesman, b. in Williamsburg, Va., 17 Dec., 1774; d. in Norfolk, Va., 6 March, 1860, was graduated at William and Mary in 1792, studied law, was admitted to the Richmond bar in 1796, and entered on the practice of his profession in James City county. He was elected in 1796 a member of the Virginia house of delegates and served in that body, by re-election, for four years. As an adherent of the Jefferson party he supported the famous resolutions of 1798, and James Madison's report of 1799. In 1800 he was elected to succeed John Marshall as a member of the U. S. house of representatives, and participating in the presidential election that devolved on that body he supported Thomas Jefferson against Aaron Burr. Declining a re-election to congress he removed in 1802 to Norfolk, where he soon took rank among the foremost lawyers of that commercial port, then noted for its able bar. He gained special distinction in criminal and in admiralty law. Though sharing, in politics, the general views and constitutional opinions of Jefferson, he frankly dissented from the chief measures of the administration—its gun-boat system of defence, its non-intercourse act, and the embargo. He was equally opposed to the wrongs that were committed by England and by France against our commerce during the Napoleonic wars, and, favoring at an early stage a declaration of war against both alike, he avowed his readiness to make the attack of the "Leopard" on the cruiser "Chesapeake" in 1807 a cause of immediate war against Great Britain, and offered his military services at the head of a cavalry troop. But he finally broke with the administration at all points on the ground of its incapacity for either war or peace, and in 1808 opposed the election of Madison as president for a like reason. In 1809 he supported the Federalist candidate for congress in the Norfolk district, and, on grounds of public policy, continued in steadfast opposition to war with England; but when war was declared in 1812 he gave to it his hearty support. The close of the war left Norfolk to deal with a new set of economical and fiscal questions, and, as Mr. Tazewell was known to be specially versed in such matters, he was elected a member of the Virginia legislature in 1816, and took an active part in its deliberations. He was appointed by President Monroe as one of the commissioners of the United States under the treaty with Spain for the purchase of Florida in 1819. In 1824 he was elected to the U. S. senate, and he was re-elected in 1830. As a member of the committee on foreign relations, of which for several years he was chairman, he wrote the celebrated report on the Panama mission, while his speeches on the piracy act, the bankrupt act, the prerogatives of the president in the appointment of foreign ministers, and the tariff, were greatly admired. Though antagonizing the general policy of the administration of John Quincy Adams, he soon arrayed himself, with equal independence, against the financial measures of President Jackson. In 1832 he favored a reduction of the tariff of 1828. While showing himself no zealot of the Bank of the United States, when the question of its recharter arose in 1832, he publicly denounced the act of the president in removing the deposits. He opposed the nullification measures of South Carolina, but at the same time dissented from the high Federal doctrines of Jackson's proclamation. When he was elected president of the senate in 1831, he refused to accept the honor, and in 1833 resigned his seat in that body from pure disgust of Federal politics. In the following year he was chosen governor of the state, and after his term of office had expired he withdrew entirely from all connection with politics. While serving in the U. S. senate, he was elected a member of the convention that was called in 1829 to revise the constitution of Virginia, and distinguished himself in that body among men like Madison, Monroe, and Marshall by the solidity of his counsels, and the weight of his influence. In standard English literature Tazewell was deeply read; in familiarity with English and American history he had few equals; in knowledge of law he had no superior; in politics he exhibited the traits of a Cato as much by the impracticability of his principles as by the severity of his virtues. The character of "Sidney," in William Wirt's "Old Bachelor," is a sketch of Tazewell drawn from life by his friend and compeer at the bar. He was the author of "Review of the Negotiations between the United States and Great Britain respecting the Commerce of the Two Countries" (London, 1829), and contributed under the pen-name of Senex to the Norfolk "Herald" in 1827. See a discourse on his life by Hugh Blair Grigsby, LL. D. (Norfolk, 1860).

TEALL, Francis Augustus, editor, b. in Fort Anne, Washington co., N. Y., 16 Aug., 1822. He entered a printing-office in 1836, afterward supplemented his common-school education by the study of languages, and in 1841 went to New York city. Here he worked at the case, with Walt Whitman as a fellow-compositor, and was soon advanced to the place of proof-reader. In this capacity he has rendered much critical service of an editorial character on a large variety of works. Among other interesting things that received his attention were the original proofs of Edgar A. Poe's "Raven" and "Bells." He assisted Ephraim G. Squier in preparing his "Ancient Monuments of the Mississippi Valley" (Washington, 1848), and John R. Bartlett in the first edition of his "Dictionary of Americanisms," and made the analytical index to the American edition of Napier's "Peninsular War." For some time he was on the editorial staff of the "American Whig Review," and in 1853 succeeded Mr. Whitman as editor of a newspaper at Huntington, L. I. He acted as proof-reader, contributor, and associate editor on the different editions of the "American Cyclopædia," and noted the pronunciation of the titles in the volume of index to the second edition and in the text of the condensed edition. Since 1882 he has been employed in the compilation of the "Century Dictionary." The University of Rochester gave him the degree of A. M. in 1875.

TECHOTLATZIN (tetch-ot-lah-lah-tseen'), king of Texcoco, d. in 1409. He was the youngest son of King Quinatzin, whom he succeeded on the throne in 1357. During his reign one of his dependent chiefs, Tzompan, cacique of Xaltocan, revolted against his rule; but he asked assistance from King Huitzilhuhtl of Mexico, and with his aid routed the rebel. From that date a mutual alliance began between the monarchies of Texcoco, Tlaltelolco, and Chapultepec. He was succeeded by his son Ixtlilxochitl I.

TECTO, Juan de, Flemish missionary, b. in Ghent in 1468; d. in Honduras in 1526. He was graduated as D. D. in Paris, and was for several years professor of theology in the Sorbonne university, and afterward chaplain of Emperor Charles V., and guardian of a convent of Franciscans at Ghent. In 1522 he obtained from Charles V., who was much attached to him, permission to go to the New World, and fixed his residence at Texcoco, where he founded missions for the Indians and learned their language. He accompanied Cortes in his expedition to Hibueras in 1525, and as, owing to the rebellion of Cristobal de Olid, no provisions were obtainable, Tecto, exhausted, fell behind the army, and was found later by a patrol leaning against a tree, where he had died of hunger. According to Bernal Diaz del Castillo, he was sent by Cortes to report to the emperor about the conquest of Hibueras, and died at sea, off the coast of Spain. Tecto is the author of two valuable works: "Primeros rudimentos de la doctrina Cristiana en lengua Mexicana," a manuscript which was utilized by Fray Pedro de Gante for his "Catecismo Mexicano"; and "Apología del bautismo administrado á los gentiles Mexicanos con sola el agua y la forma Sacramental," which is cited by Torquemada in his "Monarquía Indiana."

TECUMSEH, or TECUMTHA, Shawnee chief, b. near the site of Springfield, Ohio, about 1768; killed in the battle of the Thames, Canada, 5 Oct., 1813. His father, Puckeshinwa, or Pukeesheno, a Shawnee brave, fell in battle when the son was a child. The latter first appears in a fight with Kentucky troops on Mad river when he was about twenty years old, and is said to have run at the first fire, yet in the campaign that ended in the treaty of Greenville in 1795 he was a bold and active warrior. About 1805, with his brother, Ellskwatawa, the "prophet," he projected the union of all the western tribes of Indians against the whites. He claimed that the treaties by which large tracts of Indian land had been ceded to settlers were illegal, as the land was the common property of all the tribes, and therefore could be alienated only by common consent. The general discontent was increased by the action of speculators in ejecting Indians from lands, and by British emissaries; and the brothers soon had a large following. They visited the tribes from the Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico, and, in spite of the warnings of Gen. William Henry Harrison, who was then governor of the Northwest territory, they continued to follow out their scheme. In August, 1810, in response to an invitation to a "quiet talk" with the governor, Tecumseh, with 400 fully armed warriors, encamped in a grove near Vincennes, Ind. He was invited to the portico of the governor's house, but replied: "Houses were built for you to hold councils in; Indians hold theirs in the open air." He opened the conference in a speech of great eloquence, and at its close, being invited to sit near his "father," Gen. Harrison, said, boastingly: "The sun is my father, and the earth is my mother; on her bosom I will repose," suiting the action to the word. In the discussion that followed he boldly demanded the return of treaty lands, and his violent and threatening manner put an end to the council. On the next day Tecumseh expressed regret for his violence, and the conference was resumed, but was productive of no results. William

Clark, of Clarks-ville, Pa., was probably the last survivor of those that were present at this interview between Harrison and Tecumseh. In the following year Indian depredations increased, and another conference was held, at which Tecumseh, awed by a militia force, professed peaceful intentions, while insisting on the vacation of ceded lands; yet a few days later he set out on a journey to secure the Creeks, Choctaws, and Cherokees for his proposed league. He was not in the battle of Tippecanoe. (See HARRISON, WILLIAM HENRY.) That defeat ruined his plans, yet he continued his efforts among the southern tribes, and in the autumn of 1812 attended a great council at Toockabatcha, Ala., which had been called by the U. S. Indian agent, Col. Hawkins. Here he made a passionate speech, telling the Creeks that they would know when to begin war on the whites by the appearance of the arm of Tecumseh stretching across the heavens like pale fire. He had been told by the British that a comet would soon appear. To the chief Tustinugee-Thlucco, who opposed him, he said: "You do not believe that the Great Spirit has sent me. You shall believe it. I will go straight to Detroit, and when I get there I will stamp my foot upon the ground and shake down every house in Toockabatcha." In the following December there was an earthquake shock, and the affrighted Creeks ran from their dwellings shouting: "Tecumseh is at Detroit!" This, and the appearance of the promised sign in the heavens, caused the Creek nation to rise in arms, and brought about their speedy ruin. Tecumseh now joined the English, and commanded the Indian allies in the campaigns of 1812-'13. He refused to meet the American commanders in council, was in the action on Raisin river, and, after being wounded at Maguaga, was made a brigadier-general in the royal army. He led 2,000 warriors in the siege of Fort Meigs, where he saved American prisoners from massacre. After the battle of Lake Erie he urged Gen. Henry Proctor to engage Gen. William Henry Harrison when he landed, but took part in the British retreat, and was wounded while holding the passage of a stream. He aided Proctor in selecting the battle-ground at the Thames, and commanded the right wing, laying aside his sword and uniform and putting on his hunting-dress, in the conviction that he must fall. His Indians were driven back, and he fought desperately till he was killed. His death was unknown to the Americans for several days. Afterward it was claimed for Col. Richard Malcolm Johnston, who had killed a powerful Indian in hand-to-hand combat, that his antagonist was Tecumseh, and the claim occasioned a long controversy, but the fact has not been established satisfactorily. Tecumseh possessed great executive ability, and with proper training would have been distinguished as a general. Says a Canadian historian: "No one can fully calculate the inestimable value of those devoted red men, led on by the brave Tecumseh during the struggle of 1812. But for them it is probable that we should not now have a Canada; and if we had we would not enjoy the liberty and privileges which we possess in so eminent a degree." See "Life of Tecumseh, and his Brother, the Prophet, with an Historical Sketch of the Shawnee Indians," based on the accounts of various persons that knew the chief personally (Cincinnati, 1841), and "Tecumseh and the Shawnee Prophet," by Edward Eggleston (New York, 1878).

TECUM-UMAN (tay-coom), last king of Quiche, d. near Quetzaltenango, Guatemala, in 1524. He was the son of King Kicab-Tanub, who died during a war with his neighbors the Zutuhiles and Mames, and Tecum-Uman, hearing of the approach of the Spaniards, tried to form an alliance with his former enemies against the invaders. Only the Mames accepted his offer, and with their auxiliary troops Tecum-Uman is said, by the Spanish chroniclers, to have gathered an army of 230,000 warriors; but they could not resist the superior arms and discipline of Alvarado's army of 450 Spaniards and about 5,000 auxiliary Mexican Indians. The first battle, in the ford of the river Tilapa, 24 Feb., 1524, was sharp and not decisive, but a few days afterward Tecum-Uman was totally defeated on Olinztepeque river, and it was afterward called Xequigel, or river of blood. Tecum-Uman retired with the rest of his army, but was overtaken in a valley between Quezaltenango and Totonicapan, where he made the last desperate stand, and was killed by the lance of Alvarado.

TEEDYUSCUNG, Delaware chief, b. near Trenton, N. J., about 1700; d. in Wyoming valley, Pa., 16 April, 1763. He was also known as Honest John and War Trumpet. His father, "Old Captain Harris," and his brothers and half-brothers, "Captain John," "Young Captain Harris," "Tom," "Joe," and "Sam Evans" (names given them by the English), were all high-spirited men. In 1730 he settled in the forks of the Delaware, and he united in 1749 with the Moravian Indian mission at Gnadenhuetten, Carbon co., Pa., where, on 12 March, 1750, he was baptized by Bishop Cammerhoff, receiving the name of Gideon. Aware of how his countrymen were being injured by the whites and oppressed by the Six Nations, in 1754, when the Delawares and their allies appealed to him to lead them and be their king, he deserted the Moravian mission. Henceforward his name is conspicuous in the provincial history of Pennsylvania. After the repulse of Braddock in July, 1755, he assembled the Delawares, Mohicans, and Shawnees in the Wyoming valley, and in the winter began to wage war among the whites that resided within the "Walking Purchase." In 1756 the government sought the pacification of the Delaware king, which, through treaties at Easton in July and November, 1756, and November, 1757, was accomplished. In the following spring, agreeably to his request and the conditions of the treaty, a town was built for him and his followers in the Wyoming valley. One of the objects of his life was to recover for the Lenni Lenape that dignity which the Iroquois had treacherously wrested from them in 1742. He was burned to death with his house while asleep under the influence of liquor, the incendiary being instigated by his enemies. Teedyuscung was a fine-looking man, endowed with good sense, quick of comprehension, ambitious, and a patriot.

TEFFT, Benjamin Franklin, clergyman, b. in Floyd, Oneida co., N. Y., 20 Aug., 1813; d. in Brewer, Penobscot co., Me., 16 Sept., 1885. He was graduated at Wesleyan university in 1835, taught four years in Maine Wesleyan seminary, and then, entering the ministry of the Methodist Episcopal church, was pastor at Bangor, Me., in 1839-'41. He then taught in East Greenwich, R. I., and in 1842 accepted a charge in Boston, but his health failed in 1843, and after travelling in the south and west he was for three years professor of Greek and Hebrew in Indiana Asbury (now De Pauw) university. In 1846 he became editor of the books and magazines of the Methodist book concern in Cincinnati, where he conducted the "Ladies' Repository" in 1846-'52, and in 1851-'4 he was president of Genesee college, Lima, N. Y., also editing in 1852-'4 the "Northern New Yorker," published at Canandaigua. He was pastor of different churches in Bangor, Me., from 1858 till 1861, when he was made U. S. consul at Stockholm and acting minister to Sweden, and in 1864 he was commissioner of immigration from the north of Europe for the state of Maine. In 1866 he became pastor of a church in Portland, and from 1873 till 1878 he edited "The Northern Border," published at Bangor, Me. During the last two years of his life he was in feeble health. Ohio Wesleyan university gave him the degree of D. D. in 1846, and Madison university that of LL. D. in 1852. Besides pamphlets, lectures, addresses, and contributions to current literature, Dr. Tefft was the author of "Prison Life," based on data furnished by Rev. James B. Finley (Cincinnati, 1847); "The Shoulder-Knot, a Story of the Seventeenth Century" (New York, 1850); "Hungary and Kossuth" (Philadelphia, 1852); "Webster and his Masterpieces" (2 vols., Auburn, N. Y., 1854); "Methodism Successful, and the Internal Causes of its Success," with an introductory letter by Bishop Janes (New York, 1860); "Our Political Parties" (Boston, 1880); and "Evolution and Christianity" (1885). He edited Erwin House's "Sketches, Literary and Religious" (Cincinnati, 1847), and Dr. Charles Elliott's "Sinfulness of American Slavery" (1850).

TEFFT, Thomas Alexander, architect, b. in Richmond, R. I., 3 Aug., 1826; d. in Florence, Italy, 12 Dec., 1859. He was graduated in the scientific course at Brown in 1851, and after studying architecture in Providence furnished designs for many private and public buildings. In 1856 he went to Europe in order to study art and to announce his ideas of a uniform currency for all nations, on which subject he read a paper before the British institute of social science. After his death the principal features of his scheme were incorporated in the plan that was agreed upon by an international conference at Paris in 1867, at which nineteen nations were represented. He contributed papers on architecture to the "New York Crayon," and "Letters from Europe" to the "New York Times" in 1857-'8, and published "Our Deficiency in Art Education" (Providence, 1852), and "Universal Currency: a Plan for obtaining a Common Currency in France, England, and America, based on the Decimal System" (London, 1858). See "Memoir" by the Rev. Edwin Martin Stone (Boston, 1869).

TEGAKOUITA, Catharine, Indian convert, b. in Gandahouague, or Gandawague, in northern New York, in 1656; d. in Caughnawaga, Canada, 17 April, 1680. The name Tegakouita means "who puts things in order," and is still in use at Caughnawaga. Her father was a heathen Iroquois, and her mother a Christian Algonquin. Her parents died when she was a child, and she was brought up by her uncle, who was a chief. Her first knowledge of Christianity appears to have been obtained from Jacques Fremin and two other missionaries, whom she entertained in her cabin. She embraced the new creed with fervor, resolved to remain single, and suffered much ill treatment from her relatives because of her refusal to marry; but she was not baptized until 1676. Her refusal to work on Sundays increased the hostility of her tribe toward her, and she had on one occasion a narrow escape from death. Calumnies were spread about her character, and she finally resolved to escape to the Christian village of La Prairie, which she reached in October, 1677, after many dangers. The rest of her life was spent in prayer, labor, and mortifications of the severest kind. She enrolled herself in the Confraternity of the Holy Family, and began to be regarded both by the French and Indians as a great saint. After death her grave became a place of pilgrimage, and, although an effort was made by the priests of the neighboring parishes to check devotion to her, she was invoked as a saint throughout Canada. Numerous miracles are said to have been wrought at her tomb, or by her relics. The third plenary council of Baltimore petitioned the holy see to take steps toward her canonization in 1884. See "Life of Catharine Tegakouita," by Father Claude Chauchetiere (New York, 1886); her life by Cholonek, in vol. xii. of "Lettres édiifiantes" (Paris, 1727); and Kipp's "Jesuit Missions" (New York, 1847).

TEGANAKOA, Stephen, Indian convert, d. in Onondaga, N. Y., in 1690. While still a pagan he was noted for the innocence of his life and manners and his attachment to his wife and children. He went with his family to the mission of Caughnawaga, or Sault Ste. Louis, when he was about thirty-five years old, applied for baptism, and after the usual probation was received with his wife and six children. He was afterward considered a model of every virtue. In August, 1790, he went on a hunting expedition with his wife and another Indian. In the following September the party was attacked by a band of seventeen Cayugas and brought to Onondaga. One of his captors said to Stephen that he might attribute his death to his having left his tribe to live among "the dogs of Christians at the Sault." Stephen replied: "Do what you will with me, I fear neither your outrages nor your fires. I willingly give my life for a God who shed his blood for me." The savages then put him to death with slow tortures. He bore his sufferings calmly, and died praying for his murderers.

TEGANISSORENS, Indian chief, b. in Onondaga, N. Y.; d. in Sault St. Louis, or Caughnawaga, on Lake Champlain, after 1711. He was strongly attached to the French, and in 1682 was placed at the head of a deputation of Iroquois chiefs that was sent to Montreal to make terms with Frontenac and his Indian allies. It was soon discovered that the Iroquois had sent Teganissorens as a blind, and were taking the field against the Illinois, while pretending to wish for peace. But the French governor dismissed him with honor, knowing that his influence did not extend to all the Iroquois tribes. He set out on a similar mission in 1688, and the preliminaries for a treaty were arranged between Denonville, the Canadian governor, and the Iroquois deputies. The Hurons were dissatisfied with the proposed treaty, and, on the return of Teganissorens and his party, they were attacked by Kondiaronk, a Huron chief. Some were killed and others taken prisoners, among the latter Teganissorens, who, on complaining of this attack on an ambassador and a friend of the French, was told by Kondiaronk that the latter themselves had sent him. To show that he spoke sincerely, he at once released the Iroquois ambassador. Teganissorens, however, remained loyal, and continued to render such services that he ranked with Oureouharé and Garaconthié as one of the three Indians to whom the French colony in Canada was most indebted. He became a Christian in 1693, and in May, 1694, arrived in Quebec with eight deputies. He was received with kindness by Frontenac, the governor, who gave him many presents. He proposed the restoration of Fort Catarocouy (Kingston), and that it should be strengthened and made the bulwark of the colony. The suggestion was eagerly adopted by Frontenac, who prepared a large escort which was to conduct to that port a garrison, mechanics, and all necessary stores, but he was obliged to countermand the expedition, owing to an order from the French court. He excited the displeasure of the governor afterward by not returning to Montreal at a fixed date with the submission of some of the Iroquois tribes who were holding back. But the reason of his delay was that he found his efforts to bring about a general reconciliation between the Iroquois and the French abortive. He remained at Onondaga, where he received three French ambassadors that had been sent to make a treaty with the Iroquois on 10 Aug., 1700. He afterward received both French and English agents and declared his intention of remaining neutral. Hearing in 1703 that some of the Iroquois were concerting with Vaudreuil (who had then succeeded Callières in the government of the colony) an attack on the English settlements, Teganissorens went to Montreal and protested angrily against this breach of neutrality and declared that his tribe would take part for neither side. As the neutrality of the Iroquois was what the French governor wanted, he assured the chief that he would not send any parties against the English in New York. Teganissorens, on his part, pledged himself to retain the missionaries that were in his country. In 1711 he informed Vaudreuil that preparations were made at New York, Albany, and Boston for an invasion of Canada.

TEJEDA, Juan de (teh-hay'-dah), Spanish soldier, lived in the second half of the 16th century. In 1589 he held the rank of major-general, and was sent to govern the island of Cuba, being the first ruler that had the title of captain-general. Under his government the three fortresses that protect Havana were built under the direction of the engineer Juan Antonelli, the aqueduct, conveying water from Chorrera to Havana, was finished, and in 1592 Havana received the title of city and a coat of arms. In 1595 he returned to Spain, being superseded by Maldonado Barnuevo.

TELFAIR, Edward, statesman, b. in Scotland in 1735; d. in Savannah, Ga., 17 Sept., 1807. He was educated at Kirkcudbright grammar-school, came to this country in 1758 as agent of a commercial house, and resided for some time in Virginia, but removed to Halifax, N. C., and in 1766 to Savannah, where he engaged in business. He actively espoused the patriot cause at the opening of the Revolution, served on many committees, and was one of the party that broke open the magazine at Savannah and removed the powder. He was a delegate to the Continental congress in 1778 and 1780-'3, and in the latter year was a commissioner to treat with the Cherokees. In 1786, and again in 1790-'3, he was governor of Georgia.—His son, THOMAS, was graduated at Princeton in 1805, served in the National house of representatives in 1813-'17, and died in 1818.

TELLER, Henry Moore, senator, b. in Granger, Allegany co., N. Y., 23 May, 1830. He was educated at Alfred university, N. Y., studied law, was admitted to the bar in Binghamton, N. Y., in 1858, and removed to Illinois in the same year, and to Colorado in 1861. He was major-general of Colorado militia in 1862-'4, but held no political office till, on the admission of Colorado as a state in 1876, he was chosen U. S. senator as a Republican, and took his seat, 4 Dec., 1876. He was re-elected for the term that ended in 1883, and in 1877-'8 served as chairman of a special committee on election frauds, that was known as the Teller committee. On 17 April, 1882, he resigned, on his appointment by President Arthur to the portfolio of the interior, which he held till the close of the latter's administration. He was then re-elected to the senate for the term that will end in 1891. Alfred university gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1886.

TELLIER, Remigius Joseph, Canadian clergyman, b. in Soissons, France, in 1796; d. in Montreal, Canada, 7 Jan., 1866. He entered the Society of Jesus on 11 Oct., 1818, and became rector of the College of Chambéry, and in 1842 was sent with five colleagues to Canada, where the Roman Catholic bishop of Montreal had requested the pope to send members of the order. From the death of the last of the native Canadian Jesuits, Father Cazot, in 1800, there had been no establishment of the order in that country until the arrival of these six priests. For eight years after their arrival they had charge of the parish of La Prairie, where Father Tellier officiated for two years. Afterward he was employed among the Irish emigrants at St. Charles Point during the prevalence of ship-fever. He founded the Church of St. Patrick in Montreal, for three years was stationed in Upper Canada, and subsequently was sent to the United States, where he was at first prefect of studies and president of St. Francis Xavier college; and afterward at St. John's college, Fordham, N. Y. He was made superior of his order in 1859, and returned to Montreal, where he passed the remainder of his life.

TELLKAMPE, Johann Ludwig, German scholar, b. in Germany, 28 Jan., 1808; d. there, 10 Feb., 1876. He came to the United States in 1838, engaged in teaching, and in 1843-'7 was professor of the German language and literature in Columbia. He then returned to Germany as professor in Breslau. In 1848 he was elected to the Frankfort parliament, in 1849 to the Prussian chamber of deputies, in 1855 to the herrenhaus, and in 1871 to the first German reichstag. He wrote "Political Economy" with Alonzo Potter (New York, 1840); "Ueber die Besserungsgefängnisse in Nord-Amerika und England" (1844); with his brother, Theodore, "Essays on Law Reform and Commercial Policy" (London, 1859); "Ueber Arbeiterverhältnisse und Erwerbsgenossenschaften in England und Nord-Amerika" (1870); and "Selbstverwaltung und Reforme der Gemeinde und Kreisordnungen in Preussen, und Self-Government in England und Nord-Amerika" (1872).

TELLO DE PORTUGAL, José de Espinosa, Spanish geographer; b. in Seville in March, 1763; d. in Madrid, 6 Sept., 1815. He was a younger son of Count del Aguila, entered the navy as a cadet in 1778, served in the West Indies, and assisted in the capture of Yorktown in October, 1781, and in the expedition to Tobago under Bouillé. After the conclusion of peace in 1783 he was employed in the naval observatory at Cadiz, and made charts of the Spanish coast from Fuenterrabia to Ferrol. In 1790 he joined the expedition of Alejandro Malaspina, determined the geographical position of Acapulco and other points, and with Malaspina explored the Straits of Nootka on the northwest coast of California. He afterward made astronomical observations in the Chilean Andes, and travelled through Peru and the La Plata provinces in 1792-'4. On his return to Spain he was promoted adjutant of Gen. Mazarredo, and in 1796 was made secretary of the board of hydrography, in which capacity he was charged in 1797 with the correction of the plates of the great naval atlas of Spain that had been prepared under the direction of Vicente Tofiño. He was promoted commodore and president of the board of hydrography in 1800, and secretary to the admiralty, with the rank of minister, in 1807. At the accession of Joseph Bonaparte he retired to London, where he lived till the restoration of Ferdinand VII. in 1814, when he returned to Spain. His works include "Carta esférica que comprende las Costas del Seno Mejicano" (Madrid, 1799; revised ed., 1805); "Memorias sobre las observaciones astronómicas, hechas por los navegantes Españoles en distintos lugares del Globo" (2 vols., 1809); "Carta de las Antillas y de Tierra Firme" (London, 1811); and "Carta del Oceano Atlántico" (1812).

TEMBLEQUE, Francisco (tem-blay'-keh), Spanish architect, b. in Tembleque, province of Toledo, in the first half of the 16th century; d. in Puebla, Mexico, near the end of that century. He entered the Franciscan order, came to New Spain about 1550, and soon learned the Aztec language, being venerated by the natives as their best friend. Having studied architecture and hydraulics in Spain, he made use of his knowledge to remedy the want of potable water in the towns of Otumba and Cempoala, and constructed an aqueduct that carried the water of a mountain-stream for the distance of fifty miles to Otumba. Notwithstanding the opposition of experts, who declared the work impossible, Tembleque persisted in his course, and at the end of sixteen years finished the work, which contains more than thirty miles of solid masonry and crosses three valleys on bridges, of which the longest has sixty-seven arches, the middle one being 128 feet in height and 70 feet span. This work, called the Arches of Cempoala, is still the admiration of engineers.

TEMPLE, Daniel, missionary, b. in Reading, Mass., 23 Dec., 1789; d. there, 9 Aug., 1851. He learned the shoemaker's trade, and labored at it in his native place till he had attained his majority, but afterward entered Dartmouth, was graduated there in 1817, and at Andover theological seminary in 1820. He was ordained as an evangelist in 1821, and went to Malta as a missionary in 1822 where he labored till his return to this country in September, 1828. He sailed again for Malta in 1830, and from 1833 till 1844 was stationed at Smyrna. After this he was an agent for the American board in this country, and in 1847 assumed a pastoral charge at Phelps, N. Y., which failing health obliged him to relinquish in 1849. He published many works in modern Greek, Italian, and Armenian, including several biographies of Bible characters, and edited a monthly magazine in Greek. See his "Life and Letters" by his son, the Rev. Daniel H. Temple, with an introduction by the Rev. Richard S. Storrs, D. D. (Boston, 1855).

TEMPLE, Jackson, jurist, b. in Heath, Franklin co., Mass., 11 Aug., 1827. He was graduated at Williams in 1851, studied law, and, removing to California, practised there with success. He was appointed to the bench of the state supreme court to fill a vacancy in 1887, and then continued in his seat by re-election. He has also served as district judge and judge of the superior court of Sonoma county. While occupying the last-named post, Judge Temple was selected to try the "débris suits," and by his decision of the first case prevented hydraulic mining from injuring farming lands.

TEMPLE, William Grenville, naval officer, b. in Rutland, Vt., 23 March, 1824. He entered the navy as a midshipman, 18 April, 1840, was graduated at the naval academy in 1846, and was attached to the "Boston" when she was wrecked at Eleuthera, Bahama islands, 15 March, 1846, taking charge of the sick men from the wreck in the schooner "Volant." In February, 1847, he was ordered to the steamer "Scourge," in which he participated in the bombardment and capture of Vera Cruz and in the engagements at Alvarado, Tuspan, and Tabasco, sometimes having command of batteries and landing parties in operations on shore against the Mexicans. He assisted in the survey of the interoceanic canal and railroad across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec in 1850-'2, was promoted to master, 21 July, 1854, and to lieutenant, 18 April, 1855. After cruising in the frigate "Lancaster" on the Pacific station in 1859-'61, he commanded the steamer "Flambeau" at New York for one month, and was on duty as ordnance-officer there for seven months. He was promoted to lieutenant-commander, 16 July, 1862, and commanded the gun-boat "Pembina," in the Western Gulf blockading squadron.

From November, 1862, he was fleet-captain of the Eastern Gulf blockading squadron until 19 Sept., 1864. While he was fleet-captain he at times commanded the "San Jacinto" on special service, and in July, 1864, he led a force of sailors in defence of the approaches to Washington. He commanded the steamer "Pontosuc" from November, 1864, till May, 1865, participating in both attacks on Fort Fisher, in the capture of Wilmington, N. C., in the bombardment of forts on James river, at Dutch gap, and at the capture of Petersburg and Richmond. He was promoted to commander, 3 March, 1865, had the steamer "Tacony" in the North Atlantic squadron in 1865-'6, and was on ordnance duty in 1866-'70. He was made captain, 28 Aug., 1870, and in December, 1884, was delegated to escort King Kalakaua, of the Sandwich islands, in his visit to this country, for which service congress allowed him to accept the decoration of knight commander of the royal order of Kamehameha I. He was promoted to commodore, 5 June, 1878, was a member of the examining and retiring board in 1879-'81, and became its president in June, 1881. He was promoted to rear-admiral, 22 Feb., 1884, and voluntarily retired from active service on 29 Feb., 1884.

TEN BROECK, Abraham, soldier, b. in Albany, N. Y., 13 May, 1734; d. there, 19 Jan., 1810. His father, Dirck, was for many years recorder of Albany, and its mayor in 1746-'8. The son became a merchant in 1753, and married Elizabeth, daughter of Gen. Stephen Van Rensselaer. From 1760 till 1765 he was in the colonial assembly, where he was an active upholder of popular rights. In 1775 he sat in the Provincial congress, and in 1776 he presided over the convention that organized a state government. He was made a colonel of militia early in the Revolution, and on 25 June, 1778, became brigadier-general of militia, commanding the forces in Dutchess and Ulster counties, and to the north and west. He did good service during Burgoyne's invasion, and led a brigade at the battle of Bemis Heights in October, 1777. He was mayor of Albany in 1779-'83, a member of the state senate in 1780-'3, and judge of the court of common pleas in 1781-'4. Gen. Ten Broeck was also for several years a director and president of the Albany bank.

TEN EYCK, Abraham S., naval officer, b. in New Jersey in 1785; d. in New Brunswick, N. J., 28 March, 1844. He entered the navy as a midshipman, 1 Sept., 1811, and served in the "Wasp" when she captured the British sloop "Frolic," 18 Oct., 1812. The British ship "Poitiers" recaptured the prize the same day, and he was taken to Bermuda, where he was paroled. He was included in the vote of thanks and received a silver medal from congress by act of 29 Jan., 1813, for the victory over the "Frolic." After the war he served in the frigate "United States" in 1815-'17 in the Mediterranean. He was promoted to lieutenant, 27 April, 1816, served at the New York navy-yard in 1818, in the "Ontario," in the Mediterranean and West Indies, in 1819-'24, in the receiving-ship at New York in 1825, and in the "Delaware" in 1827-'30 in the Mediterranean. He was promoted master-commandant, 9 Feb., 1837, commanded the store-ship "Erie" in the West Indies in 1838, and was commissioned captain, 10 Dec., 1843.

Wm. C. Temple

TEN EYCK, Henry James, journalist, b. in Albany, N. Y., 25 July, 1856; d. there, 29 Nov., 1887. He was graduated at Yale in 1879, third in a class of 131, and entered the office of the Albany "Evening Journal," where he remained until his death. In October, 1883, he became its managing editor, and in 1885 city editor. He was an occasional contributor to the magazines, more particularly the "Century" and the "Popular Science Monthly," an article from his pen in the latter magazine in 1886 on "Some Tendencies in Taxation" having attracted much attention.

TEN EYCK, John Conover, senator, b. in Freehold, N. J., 12 March, 1814; d. in Mount Holly, N. J., 24 Aug., 1879. He received his education from private tutors, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1835, and practised in Mount Holly, N. J. He served as prosecuting attorney for Burlington county in 1839-'49, and was a delegate to the State constitutional convention in 1844. Mr. Ten Eyck was a Whig till 1856, when he joined the Republican party, and he was afterward chosen to the U. S. senate, where he held his seat from 5 Dec., 1859, till 3 March, 1865. In the senate Mr. Ten Eyck took part in various debates, including that on the electoral vote of Louisiana in 1865, but his principal services were performed on the judiciary and other committees. On 24 April, 1875, he was appointed a member of a commission to revise the New Jersey constitution, and on the death of Abram O. Zabriskie he became its president.

TENNENT, William, educator, b. in Ireland in 1673; d. in Neshaminy, Pa., 6 May, 1746. He received a liberal education in his native country, being graduated probably at Trinity college, Dublin, entered the ministry of the Episcopal church of Ireland in 1704, and became chaplain to an Irish nobleman. Wishing for more liberty of conscience, he came to this country with his family in 1718, and on application was received as a minister of the Presbyterian church by the synod of Philadelphia. After brief pastorates in Westchester county, N. Y., and in Bucks county, Pa., he was called in 1726 to Neshaminy, Pa., where he remained till the close of his life. Here, on land that was given him by his kinsman, James Logan, in 1728, he erected a small building, and opened a school for the instruction of candidates for the ministry. In this academy, which became known as the Log college, were trained many that became eminent in the Presbyterian church. The name was probably bestowed at first in contempt by its opponents. It was the first literary institution higher than a common school within the bounds of the Presbyterian church in this country, and is regarded as the germ from which sprang Princeton college and several lesser institutions of learning. Tennent had a rare gift of attracting youths of genius and imbuing them with his own zealous spirit. About 1742 he withdrew from active labor. The "Log college" has long since disappeared. It is described by George Whitefield, who visited it in 1739, as "a log-house about twenty feet long, and near as many broad, and to me it seemed to resemble the school of the old prophets, for their habitations were mean." About 1840 part of one of the logs that formed the building was discovered, and from it a cane was made, which was presented to Rev. Dr. Samuel Miller, then one of the oldest professors in Princeton seminary. See Rev. Dr. Archibald Alexander's "History of the Log College" (1846).—William's eldest son, Gilbert, clergyman, b. in County Armagh, Ireland, 5 Feb., 1703; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 23 July, 1764, came to this country with his father, was educated by him, and taught for some time in the Log college. After studying medicine for a year, he abandoned it for divinity, and in May, 1725, was licensed to preach by the Philadelphia presbytery. In the same year he received the honorary degree of A. M. from Yale. After preaching at New Castle, Del., and receiving a call there, he left so abruptly that he was rebuked by the synod, and in 1726 was ordained as pastor at New Brunswick, N. J. He was much admired as a preacher, and in 1740-'1 made a tour with George Whitefield at the latter's request. He had much to do with the division in the Presbyterian church in 1741 by his indiscretion in denouncing those that were opposed to revivals, but seventeen years later he was no less active in healing the breach. In 1744 he became pastor of a new church in Philadelphia that had been formed by admirers of Whitefield. Shortly afterward he asked Benjamin Franklin's advice as to whom he should call upon for funds to erect a new church edifice. Franklin told him to "call on everybody," and, taking the sage at his word, Tennent soon obtained money for an expensive building. In 1753, at the request of the trustees of Princeton, he went abroad, with Rev. Samuel Davies, to secure funds for that institution. Mr. Tennent was one of the most conspicuous ministers of his day. He affected eccentricity in his pulpit, but his sermons were marked both by forcible reasoning and by passionate appeal. The controversies in which he engaged made him many enemies, and he was even accused of immorality. His published volumes are "XXIII. Sermons" (Philadelphia, 1744); "Discourses on Several Subjects" (1745); and "Sermons on Important Subjects adapted to the Perilous State of the British Nation" (1758). Among his many separate published discourses are "The Necessity of studying to be Quiet and doing our own Business" (1744); several on the lawfulness of defensive war (1747 et seq.); and "A Persuasive to the Right Use of the Passions in Religion" (1760). Mr. Tennent also wrote an "Account of a Revival of Religion" in Prince's "Christian History" (1744). See also a volume of "Sermons and Essays by the Tennents and their Contemporaries" (1855). President Samuel Finley, of Princeton, delivered his funeral sermon, which was published with an appendix and a "Funeral Eulogy" by a young gentleman in Philadelphia (1764).—Another son, William, clergyman, b. in County Antrim, Ireland, 3 Jan., 1705; d. in Freehold, N. J., 8 March, 1777, also came to this country with his father, with whom he followed a preparatory course, and then studied theology under his brother Gilbert in New Brunswick. He had nearly finished his course there when he fell into a remarkable trance or cataleptic fit, continuing for several days as if dead. His physician refused to permit his burial, and efforts to resuscitate him were finally successful, though his life was despaired of for weeks. He was obliged to learn anew to read and write, and had no recollection of his former life till on one occasion he felt a "shock in his head," after which his former knowledge began slowly to return. He subsequently asserted that during his trance he had thought himself to be in heaven, and that afterward the recollection of the glories that he had witnessed and heard was so intense as to blot out for a long time all interest in earthly things. Mr. Tennent was ordained at Freehold, N. J., 25 Oct., 1733, as successor to his brother John, and was pastor there forty-four years. He published several sermons. See a memoir of him by Elias Boudinot, with a detailed account of his trance (New York, 1847).—Another son, John, clergyman, b. in County Antrim, Ireland, 12 Nov., 1706; d. in Freehold, N. J., 23 April, 1732, also came to this country with his father, was educated at the Log college, and licensed to preach, 18 Sept., 1729, and from 1730 till his death was pastor at Freehold. A memoir of him was published by his brother Gilbert, with a discourse on "Regeneration" (1735), which warrants the belief that, had he lived, he would have become as eminent as his brother.—The second William's son, WILLIAM (1740-'77), was graduated at Princeton in 1758 with Jeremias Van Rensselaer, and from 1772 till his death was pastor of a church in Charleston, S. C., where he was elected to the Provincial congress.

TENNEY, Samuel, physician, b. in Byfield, Mass., 27 Nov., 1748; d. in Exeter, N. H., 6 Feb., 1816. He was graduated at Harvard in 1772, taught one year at Andover, Mass., and then, after studying medicine, went to practise at Exeter, N. H., but on the day of the battle of Bunker Hill joined the patriot army as a surgeon. After serving one year with Massachusetts troops, he entered the Rhode Island forces. At the battle of Red Bank he dressed the wounds of Count von Donop, the Hessian commander. Dr. Tenney served through the war, and at its close returned to Exeter, where he married, but did not resume practice. He was a delegate to the State constitutional convention in 1788, and judge of probate from 1793 till 1800, when he was elected to congress to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of William Gordon, and taking his seat on 8 Dec., served till 1807. Dr. Tenney wrote much for the press on political subjects, especially in 1788, in favor of the adoption of the constitution of the United States. To the "Memoirs" of the American academy, of which he was a member, he contributed an account of the mineral waters of Saratoga and a "Theory of Prismatic Colors"; to the Massachusetts historical society a notice of the so-called "dark day," 19 May, 1780, and an account of Exeter; and to the State agricultural society a treatise on orcharding, which was highly esteemed. He also wrote for the "New York Medical Repository" "An Explanation of Certain Curious Phenomena in the Heating of Water" (1811).—His wife, Tabitha, author, b. in Exeter, N. H., in 1762; d. there, 2 May, 1837, was the daughter of Samuel Gilman, who died in her infancy. She was educated by her mother, early began to take pleasure in reading, and became known for her facility and grace in conversation. She married Mr. Tenny in 1788. Mrs. Tenney was the author of "Female Quixotism: exhibited in the Romantic Opinions and Extravagant Adventures of Dorcasina Sheldon" (2d ed., Newburyport, 1807; 2 vols., Boston, 1829; many other editions). She also compiled "The new Pleasing Instructor," a selection from the poets and other classical writers, for the use of young ladies.

TENNEY, Sanborn, naturalist, b. in Stoddard, N. H., 13 Jan., 1827; d. in Buchanan, Mich., 9 July, 1877. He was graduated at Amherst in 1853, and then taught natural history in the New England normal institute in Lancaster, Mass., for two years. In 1855 he became lecturer before the Massachusetts state teachers' institute, meanwhile studying natural history under Louis Agassiz, in Cambridge, and delivering courses of lectures in various parts of the country. He was appointed professor of natural history in Vassar college in 1865, and continued there until 1868, when he accepted a similar chair in Williams. In 1873 he delivered a course of lectures on "Physical Structure and Natural Resources of the United States" before the Lowell institute in Boston, and two years later a course on "Geology" before the same institute. At the time of his death, Prof. Tenney was on his way west to act as leader of the Williams Rocky mountain expedition. Besides contributions to "The Popular Science Monthly" and other similar periodicals, he published "Geology for Teachers, Classes, and Private Students" (Philadelphia, 1859); "A Manual of Zoölogy" (New York, 1865); "Elements of Zoölogy" (1875); and, with Mrs. Tenney, "Natural History of Animals" (1866).—His wife, Abby Amy Gove, was the author of "Pictures and Stories of Animals for the Little Ones at Home" (6 vols., New York, 1868), and a "New Game of Natural History" (Philadelphia, 1870). She also contributed to scientific journals.

TENNEY, William Jewett, author, b. in Newport, R. I., in 1814; d. in Newark, N. J., 20 Sept., 1883. He was graduated at Yale in 1832, and studied medicine in Boston, but abandoned it for law, which he studied in New Haven, Conn. After his admission to the bar he opened an office in New York city, but was connected with the "Journal of Commerce" in 1841 and with the "Evening Post" in 1842-'3 and 1847-'8. In 1853 he edited the "Mining Magazine," and in the same year entered the employ of the firm of D. Appleton and Co., whose "Annual Cyclopædia" he edited from its inception till his death (1861-'82). He resided for a long time in Elizabeth, N. J., where he was several times chosen a freeholder, and was for fourteen years in the city council. He prepared the plan for organizing the public-school system there, was president of the school board, and during Buchanan's administration collector of the port. For two years he was presiding judge of one of the criminal courts in Brooklyn, N. Y., and he was usually known as Judge Tenney. He became a convert to Roman Catholicism. He added a sixteenth volume to Thomas H. Benton's "Abridgment of the Debates of Congress," and indexed the work (16 vols., New York, 1857-'60), edited "The Queens of England" (1852), and was the author of a "Military and Naval History of the Rebellion in the United States" (1865) and a work on "Grammatical Analysis" (1866).—His wife, Sarah Brownson, author, b. in Chelsea, Mass., 7 June, 1839; d. in Elizabeth, N. J., 30 Oct., 1876, was the only daughter of Dr. Orestes A. Brownson, and inherited much of her father's power of analysis. She was the author of "Marian Elwood, or How Girls Live" (New York, 1859); "At Anchor" (1865); and "Life of Demetrius Augustine Gallitzin, Prince and Priest" (1873).

TENOCH, or TENOX (ten-oss'), Aztec priest, lived in the 14th century. When the Aztecs settled in Chapultepec and were subdued by the king of Culhuacan, Tenoch was the high-priest of his nation. Later the Culhuas were defeated in a war with their neighbors of Xochimilco and solicited the aid of their slaves, the Mexicans. By the advice of Tenoch the Mexicans consented, and under the former's leadership showed themselves so brave that the Culhuas, partly from gratitude, partly from fear, gave them freedom. Looking for a safe place of retreat until the nation should become stronger, Tenoch led them to a small island in the lake of Texcoco, where, according to his prediction, they found an eagle on a nopal-tree devouring a snake. There they laid in 1327, or, according to others, in 1325, the foundation of a city called Tenochtitlan, and Tenoch built a hut as a temple for their god Huitzilopochtli, dedicating it by the sacrifice of some Culhua prisoners.

TEPANCAITZIN (tay-pan-cal-tseen'), Mexican king, d. in 1103. He was the ninth monarch of Tollan, becoming the successor on the throne of Queen Xiutlatzin in 1042. During his reign the national beverage of "pulque," prepared from the fermented sap of the maguey-plant, was discovered by the Princess Xochitl, whom he afterward married. His son and successor was TOPILTZIN, to whom he ceded the crown in 1092, as, according to a Toltec superstition, a reign of more than fifty years would bring misfortune to the nation. Notwithstanding this change of ruler, continued drought caused famine and pestilence, followed by internal commotions. Both rulers died in a battle against the insurgents, and the kingdom remained in a state of anarchy till it was conquered by Xolotl the Great, king of the Chichimecs.

TERHUNE, Edward Payson, clergyman, b. in New Brunswick, N. J., about 1825. He was graduated at Rutgers in 1850, and, after the completion of his theological studies at New Brunswick seminary in 1854, was ordained to the ministry of the Presbyterian church in Virginia, becoming pastor of the congregation at Charlotte Court-House (now Smithville). In 1859 he removed to Newark, N. J., and took charge of the 1st Reformed church. He was the American chaplain at Rome, Italy, in 1876-'7, returned to the United States in 1878, and was pastor of a Congregational church in Springfield, Mass., from 1879 till 1884, when he took charge of a Reformed church in Brooklyn, N. Y. Rutgers gave him the degree of D. D. in 1869.—His wife, Mary Virginia, author, b. in Amelia county, Va., about 1830, is a daughter of Samuel P. Hawes, a native of Massachusetts, who became a merchant in Virginia. She began to contribute to a weekly paper in Richmond at the age of fourteen, and two years later sent to a magazine a sketch entitled "Marrying through Prudential Motives," which was reprinted in England, translated for a French journal, retranslated into English for a London magazine, and then reproduced in its altered form in this country. In 1856 she married Mr. Terhune. She has been a large contributor of tales, sketches, and essays to magazines, edited a monthly called "Babyhood" for two years, besides conducting special departments in "Wide Awake" and "St. Nicholas," and in 1888 established a magazine called the "Home-Maker."

Her first novel was

"Alone: a Tale of Southern Life and Manners" (Richmond, 1853), which was issued under the pen-name of "Marian Harland," and attained great popularity. Her other works of fiction, some of which were also very successful, bear the titles of "The Hidden Path" (New York, 1855); "Moss Side" (1857); "Miriam" (1860); "Nemesis" (1860); "Husks" (1863); "Husbands and Homes," a series of stories (1865); "Sunnybank" (1866); "Helen Gardner's Wedding-Day" (1867); "The Christmas Holly" (1868); "Ruby's Husband" (1868); "Phemie's Temptation" (1869); "At Last" (1870); "The Empty Heart" (1871); "Eve's Daughters" (1881); "Judith" (1883); and "A Gallant Fight" (1888). She is the author also of a popular manual of domestic economy entitled "Common Sense in the Household" (1871); "Breakfast, Luncheon, and Tea" (1875); "The Dinner Year-Book" (1878); "Our Daughters, and What Shall We Do with Them: a Talk with Mothers" (1880); and "Loiterings in Pleasant Paths," containing sketches of travel in Europe (1880).—Their daughter, CHRISTINE, b. in Newark, N. J., 13 June, 1859, was educated abroad and at Smith college, and married James F. Herrick in 1884. She has published "Housekeeping Made Easy" (New York, 1888).

TERNANT, Jean Baptiste, Chevalier de (tair-nong), French soldier, b. in Sez, Normandy, in 1750; d. in Couches in 1816. He was a lieutenant in the French army, but, resigning his commission, came to the United States with Baron Steuben, and offered his sword to congress. In April, 1778, he was commissioned major, and appointed sub-inspector in Steuben's division, serving under that general till 25 Sept., 1778, when he was made lieutenant-colonel and inspector of the armies in Georgia and South Carolina. He was taken prisoner at Charleston in 1780, but was soon exchanged, and assumed command of Col. Armand de la Rouarie's regiment when the latter went to France in search of supplies. After the return of Col. La Rouarie, he was again sent to the south, where he served to the end of the campaign. Before returning to France after the conclusion of peace, he travelled for two years through the United States. Re-entering the French army in 1786 he rose to the rank of colonel, was in the battle of Valmy, and served in Germany under the Marquis de Custines. He was minister to the United States in 1790-'3, and showed ability in the difficult negotiations that almost culminated in a war with France in 1798. After the coup d'état of 18 Brumaire, 1799, he settled at Conches, and refused Napoleon's offer of another commission.

TERNAUX, Henry (tair-no), better known as Ternaux-Compans, French historian, b. in Paris in 1807; d. there in December, 1864. After finishing his studies in Paris, he entered the diplomatic service and was secretary of the embassies at Madrid and Lisbon, and chargé d'affaires in Brazil, but resigned, and devoted several years to travel through Spain and South America, making researches in the state libraries. Toward the close of Louis Philippe's reign he was elected deputy, but he soon returned to his studies. Ternaux-Compans collected and published a valuable series of works concerning the discovery and early history of South America. They include "Bibliothèque Américaine, ou catalogue des ouvrages relatifs à l'Amérique depuis sa découverte en 1493, jusqu'en l'an 1700" (Paris, 1836); "Voyages, relations et mémoires originaux pour servir à l'histoire de la découverte de l'Amérique" (10 vols., 1836-'8; 2d series, 10 vols., 1839-'40); "Archives des voyages, ou collection d'anciennes relations inédites" (2 vols., 1840-'1); "Recueil de documents et mémoires originaux sur l'histoire des possessions Espagnoles dans l'Amérique à diverses époques de la conquête"

Mary Virginia Terhune

(1840); "Essai sur la théogonie Mexicaine" (1840); "Essai sur l'ancien Cundinamarca" (1862); "Notice historique sur la Guyane Française" (1863); and "Histoire du Mexique par Don Alvaro Tezozomac" (2 vols., 1849).

TERNAY, Charles Louis d'Arsae, Chevalier de, French naval officer; b. in the castle of Ternay, near Laudun, in 1722; died in Newport, R. I., 10 July, 1780. He was descended from an ancient family of Brittany, many of whose members had served with credit in the French navy. He entered the naval school in 1738, was in the siege of Louisbourg in 1757, and commanded afterward a division of gun-boats on St. Lawrence. After his promotion to captain, he was sent with two frigates to Newfoundland in 1762, and, landing at St. John on 2 June, reduced the place, captured several British merchant-vessels, and ruined the cod-fisheries along the coast. He was attached after the conclusion of peace to the station of the Leeward islands, and later was promoted brigadier-general of the naval forces, retiring in 1772 with the brevet of chef d'escadre. He was appointed governor-general of the island of Bourbon, which post he held till 1779, when he re-entered active service. Early in 1780 he armed a division in Brest, and was charged with conveying Rochambeau's army to the United States. After defeating a British force in the West Indies he arrived safely at Newport on 10 July, and died there a few days later.

TERRAZAS, Francisco de (ter-rah'-thas), Mexican poet, b. in Mexico about 1520; d. there in 1575. He was the son of a companion of Cortes, and served for several years in the army. Afterward he secured a post in the household of the archbishop of Mexico, and later retired to his estate, devoting himself to poetry. He composed elegies and cantatas, deriving inspiration from ancient Indian recitatives, and gained great popularity not only in the New World, but also in Europe. His poems were never published, but the Spanish poet, Miguel Cervantes, has inserted with words of high praise some of Terrazas's verses in his "Galatea."

TERRELL, William, congressman, b. in Fairfax county, Va., about 1778; d. in Sparta, Ga., 4 July, 1855. During his infancy his parents removed to Wilkes county, Ga. He received a good English education, studied medicine in Philadelphia, Pa., and practised in Sparta, Ga. He served in the legislature for several terms, and in 1816 and 1818 was elected to congress, but declined reelection in 1820. About 1819 he abandoned the practice of his profession, and henceforth was much interested in cotton-culture. He took much interest in the promotion of agricultural science, and in 1853 gave $20,000 for the establishment of the agricultural professorship that bears his name in the University of Georgia.

TERRILL, William Rufus, soldier, b. in Covington, Va., 21 April, 1834; d. near Perryville, Ky., 8 Oct., 1862. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1853, assigned to the 3d artillery, was assistant professor of mathematics there in 1853-'4, on duty in Kansas in 1854-'5, and assistant in the U. S. coast survey from 1855 till 1861. He was appointed captain in the 5th artillery, 14 Aug., 1861, and took part with great credit in the battle of Shiloh. He was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers, 9 Sept., 1862, and was killed in the battle of Perryville in the following month.—His brother, James Barbour, soldier, b. in Warm Springs, Bath co., Va., 20 Feb., 1838; d. near Bethesda Church, Va., 31 May, 1864, was graduated at Virginia military institute, Lexington, in 1858, and after attending the law-school of Judge Brockenborough began practice in the courts of his native county in 1860. In May, 1861, he was appointed major of the 13th Virginia infantry. He was promoted to the colonelcy, and was with his regiment at the first and second battles of Bull Run, Fredericksburg, Cross Keys, Port Republic, Cedar Run, the Wilderness, and Spottsylvania, and was killed at Bethesda Church. His commanding general said his regiment, "the 13th, was never required to take a position that they did not take it, nor to hold one that they did not hold it." His nomination as brigadier-general was confirmed by the Confederate senate on the day of his death.

TERRY, Adrian Russell, physician, b. in Hartford, Conn., 29 Sept., 1808; d. in Chicago, Ill., 3 Dec., 1864. He was graduated at the medical department of Yale in 1831, and subsequently settled in Hartford. For several years he held the chair of chemistry and natural philosophy in Bristol college, Pa. The degree of A. M. was conferred on him by Trinity in 1836. Dr. Terry published "Travels in the Equatorial Regions of South America in 1832" (Hartford, 1834).

TERRY, Alfred Howe, soldier, b. in Hartford, Conn., 10 Nov., 1827; d. in New Haven, Conn., 16 Dec., 1890. He studied at the Yale law-school, but, having been already admitted to the bar, he was not graduated.

He began the practice of his profession in 1849, and was clerk of the superior and supreme courts of Connecticut from 1854 till 1860. He had been an active member of the Connecticut militia, and was in command of the 2d regiment of state troops when the civil war began. In response to President Lincoln's call for three months' troops, he was appointed colonel of the 2d Connecticut volunteers, and with that regiment was present at the first battle of Bull Run. At the expiration of the term of service he returned to Connecticut, organized the 7th Connecticut volunteers, of which he was appointed colonel, and on 17 Sept. was again mustered into the National service. He was present in command of his regiment at the capture of Port Royal, S. C., and also at the siege of Fort Pulaski, of which he was placed in charge after its capitulation. On 25 April, 1862, he was promoted brigadier-general of volunteers, and he served as such at the battle of Pocotaligo and in the operations against Charleston. He commanded the successful demonstration up Stono river during the descent on Morris island, and at the action on James island. His force was then withdrawn, and he was assigned by Gen. Quincy A. Gillmore to the command of the troops on Morris island, which post he held during the siege of Forts Wagner and Sumter. After the reduction of Fort Wagner he was assigned to the command of the northern district of the Department of the South, including the islands from which operations against Charleston had been carried on. Gen. Terry commanded the 1st division of the 10th army corps, Army of the James, during the

Alfred S. Terry

Virginia campaign of 1864, and at times the corps itself. He was brevetted major-general of volunteers on 20 Aug., 1864, became permanent commander of the 10th corps in October, and held that place until the corps was merged in the 24th in the following December, when he was assigned to lead the 1st division of the new corps. He commanded at the action of Chester Station, and was engaged at the battle of Drewry's Bluff, the various combats in front of the Bermuda Hundred lines, the battle of Fussell's Mills, the action at Deep Bottom, the siege of Petersburg, the actions at Newmarket heights on the Newmarket road, the Darbytown road, and the Williamsburg road. On 2 Jan., 1865, after the failure of the first attempt to take Fort Fisher, which commanded the sea-approaches to Wilmington, N. C., Gen. Terry was ordered to renew the attack with a force numbering a little over 8,000 men. On the 13th he debarked his troops about five miles above the fort, and, finding himself confronted by Gen. Robert F. Hoke's Confederate division, proceeded to throw a line of strong intrenchments across the peninsula between the sea and Cape Fear river, facing toward Wilmington, and about two miles north of the fort. After the landing of the troops, the co-operating fleet, under Admiral David D. Porter, numbering 44 vessels and mounting upward of 500 guns, opened fire upon the work, and from 4.30 to 6 p. m. four shots a second, or 20,000 in all, were fired. This was the heaviest bombardment of the war. On the 14th the line of intrenchment was completed, and Gen. Charles J. Paine's division of infantry was placed upon it. While this was in progress, Gen. Terry made a reconnoissance of the fort, and, in view of the difficulty of landing supplies for his troops and the materials for a siege upon an open, unprotected beach in midwinter, he determined to carry the work by assault the next day, and the plan of attack was arranged with Admiral Porter. At 11 a. m. on the 15th the entire fleet opened fire, silencing nearly every gun in the fort. Gen. Newton M. Curtis's brigade of Gen. Adelbert Ames's division was then pushed forward by regiments to a point 200 yards from the fort, where it sheltered itself in shallow trenches, and the remainder of the division was brought up within supporting distance. Admiral Porter had landed 2,000 sailors and marines, and their commander pushed a line of skirmishers up within 200 yards of the eastern extremity of the northern face of the work, the attack of the troops being upon the western extremity of that face. At 3.30 p. m., on a signal from Gen. Terry to Admiral Porter, the fire of the fleet was diverted from the points of attack, and the leading brigade rushed upon the work and gained a foothold upon the parapet. The column of sailors and marines followed the example of the troops, but, having to advance for a distance of about 600 yards along the open beach, they were unable to stem the fire of the work. Some of them reached the foot of the parapet, but the mass of them, after a display of great gallantry, was forced to fall back. After Gen. Curtis had gained the parapet, Gen. Ames ordered forward in succession the second and third brigades of his division, and they entered the fort. This was constructed with a series of traverses, each of which was stubbornly held. Hand-to-hand fighting of the most obstinate character ensued, the traverses being used successively as breastworks, over the tops of which the opposing parties fired into one another's faces. By five o'clock nine of these traverses had been carried. Gen. Terry then ordered up re-enforcements, consisting of a brigade and an additional regiment from the intrenched line, the sailors and marines taking their places there; by nine o'clock two more traverses were carried, and an hour later the occupation of the work was complete. The Confederate force fell back disorganized to a small work near the point of the peninsula, where, being immediately pursued, it surrendered unconditionally. The garrison originally numbered 2,500 men, of whom 1,971 men, with 112 officers, were captured; the others were killed or wounded. The fall of the fort was followed by the abandonment of Fort Caswell and the other defences of the Cape Fear river. In these works were captured 169 pieces of artillery, 2,000 small arms, and a considerable quantity of ammunition and commissary stores. The National loss was 681 men, of whom 88 were killed. For this Gen. Terry was promoted to be brigadier-general in the regular army and major-general of volunteers, and congress passed a vote of thanks "to Brevet Maj.-Gen. A. H. Terry and the officers and soldiers under his command for the unsurpassed gallantry and skill exhibited by them in the attack upon Fort Fisher, and the brilliant and decisive victory by which that important work has been captured from the rebel forces and placed in the possession and under the authority of the United States, and for their long and faithful service and unwavering devotion to the cause of the country in the midst of the greatest difficulties and dangers." Gen. Terry was engaged in the capture of Wilmington, N. C., and commanded at the combat at Northeast creek, which followed. In April, 1865, the 10th army corps was reconstituted, and Gen. Terry was assigned to its command, and with it took part in the subsequent operations under Gen. William T. Sherman in North Carolina. He was brevetted major-general in the regular army on 13 March, 1865, for his services at the capture of Wilmington. Since the close of the war he commanded in succession the Departments of Virginia, Dakota, and the South, and again the Department of Dakota. He was promoted to the rank of major-general, 3 March, 1886, and was in charge of the division of the Missouri, with headquarters at Chicago, until his voluntary retirement from the army in April, 1888.

TERRY, Eli, clock-maker, b. in East Windsor, Conn., 13 April, 1772; d. in Terryville, Conn., 24 Feb., 1852. He was apprenticed to Thomas Harland, a maker of brass clocks in Norwich, Conn., and there acquired the rudiments of his trade. In 1792 he made his first wooden clock, which is still preserved in the family, and is one of the first that was made in this country. A year later he settled in Plymouth, Conn., and there began the manufacture of wooden and brass clocks, but soon ceased to make the latter, as the former, being much cheaper than the metal ones and quite as good time-keepers, proved far more salable. About 1797 Mr. Terry invented a clock that registered the difference between mean and apparent time, but its cost prevented it from becoming popular. Mr. Terry worked alone until 1800, when he hired two men to assist him, and then for several years frequently travelled on horseback through the country selling his clocks. The business increased, and in 1807 he contracted to deliver 4,000 movements to a Waterbury firm, which order took him three years to complete. The success of this undertaking marks the beginning of the making of wooden clocks as an industry. Mr. Terry had in his employ at this time Silas Hoadley and Seth Thomas, who in 1810 purchased his business, then the largest of its kind in the United States. In 1814 he produced the Terry shelf-clock, also of wood, features of which are retained in clocks that are now made, and in 1816 he began the manufacture of this clock, in which he was successful. He continued active as an inventor, and made many new designs, including a peculiar form of gravity-escapement (1830).

TERRY, Henry Dwight, soldier, b. in Hartford, Conn., 16 March, 1812; d. in Washington, D. C., in June, 1869. He early settled in Michigan, where he entered the legal profession, and settled in Detroit. Although he was in active practice, he had for many years devoted considerable attention to military matters, and when the first call was made for troops in June, 1861, at the beginning of the civil war, he raised the 5th Michigan infantry, of which he was appointed colonel. The regiment was mustered into service on 28 Aug., 1861, and ordered to the Army of the Potomac. He soon gained the command of a brigade, and on 17 July, 1862, was commissioned brigadier-general of volunteers. He served through the war in the Army of the Potomac, and when he was mustered out of service, in 1865, resumed the practice of his profession in Washington, D. C.

TERRY, John Orville, poet, b. in Orient, N. Y., 13 Aug., 1796; d. in Greenport, N. Y., 7 April, 1869. He was educated in Orient, and then studied medicine, but never practised. In early manhood he made several voyages to South America and taught for a time after his return. His life was passed chiefly in farming, and his rural experiences were put into verse as "The Poems of J. O. T., consisting of Song, Satire, and Pastoral Descriptions, chiefly depicting the Scenery and illustrating the Manners and Customs of the Ancient and Present Inhabitants of Long Island" (New York, 1850).

TERRY, Luther, painter, b. in Enfield, Conn., 18 July, 1813. He studied for a short time under a portrait-painter in Hartford, and in 1838 went to Italy. He spent a year at the Accademia delle belle Arti in Florence, and in 1839 went to Rome, where he has since resided. At first he devoted much time to making copies from the works of Raphael. The first important work from his easel was one that had for its subject Christ disputing with the doctors in the temple, which is now in the Wadsworth athenæum, Hartford, Conn. Other paintings by Mr. Terry are "The Loves of the Angels," from Byron's "Heaven and Earth" (1843-4); "Columbus before Ferdinand and Isabella"; "Jacob's Dream," several times repeated; "Angel announcing the Birth of Christ to the Shepherds" (1853); several subjects from Shakespeare; "Toby and the Angel"; and "Solomon's Choice." In 1846 he was made an honorary member of the National academy, and like honors were conferred upon him by the academies of Philadelphia, and Providence, R. I. He married in 1861 Louisa, widow of Thomas Crawford, the sculptor.

TERRY, Milton Spenser, clergyman, b. in Coeymans, N. Y., 22 Feb., 1840. He was graduated at the Charlotteville, N. Y., seminary in 1859, and at Yale divinity-school in 1862. After being ordained a clergyman in the Methodist Episcopal church he held various pastorates from 1863 till 1884, when he was elected to the chair of Hebrew and Old Testament exegesis in Garrett biblical institution, Evanston, Ill. The degree of S. T. D. was conferred on him in 1879 by Wesleyan university, and he was elected to the American Oriental society in 1871, and in 1883 to the Society of biblical literature and exegesis. He was graduated at the University of Virginia in 1848, studied law, and in 1851 was admitted to the bar. Settling in Wytheville, he practised his profession and was one of the editors and owners of "The Telegraph," published in that place. In April, 1861, he became a lieutenant in the 4th Virginia infantry, in Gen. Thomas J. Jackson's brigade. In 1862 he was promoted major, and in February, 1864, became colonel. He was commissioned brigadier-general on 20 May, 1864. At the close of the civil war he returned to practice in Wytheville, and in 1868 was nominated for congress, but, being under political disabilities, withdrew. He was afterward elected to congress from Virginia as a Conservative, and served from 4 March, 1871, till 3 March, 1873, and again from 6 Dec., 1875, till 3 March, 1877. Subsequently he resumed his legal business. He was drowned while trying to ford Reed creek, near his home.

TERRY, William Richard, soldier, b. in Liberty, Va., 12 March, 1827. He was graduated at the Virginia military institute in 1850, and then turned his attention to commercial pursuits. At the beginning of the civil war he entered the Confederate service as captain of Virginia cavalry, and was soon promoted and given command of the 24th Virginia regiment. On 20 May, 1864, he was made brigadier-general, and given a command in Gen. George E. Pickett's division in the Army of Northern Virginia, which was known as Kemper's brigade. After the war he served as a member of the Virginia senate for eight years, and for some time was superintendent of the penitentiary in Richmond. At present he is superintendent of the Lee camp soldiers' home in Richmond.

TESCHEMACHER, James Englebert, scientist, b. in Nottingham, England, 11 June, 1790; d. near Boston, Mass., 9 Nov., 1853. He began a commercial career in 1804 by entering a foreign mercantile house in London, where he showed business talents of a high order. In 1830 he accepted a lucrative offer to go to Cuba, but it proved unsatisfactory when he reached Havana, and he returned to England. He then determined to come to the United States, and reached New York in February, 1832, after which he settled in Boston, where he engaged in commercial pursuits until his death. Mr. Teschemacher devoted his leisure to science, and during his residence in this country published about thirty papers on various subjects in chemistry, mineralogy, geology, and botany. These appeared chiefly in the transactions of scientific societies of which he was a member. Besides several addresses, he published "Concise Application of the Principles of Structural Botany to Horticulture" (Boston, 1840); "Essay on Guano" (1845); and a translation of Julius A. Stockhardt's "Chemical Field Lectures" (Cambridge, 1852).

TESSIER, Ulric Joseph, Canadian jurist, b. in Quebec, 4 May, 1817. He was admitted to the bar as an advocate in 1839, was mayor of Quebec in 1851, entered the parliament of Canada the same year, became a member of the legislative council in 1858, and was its speaker in 1863. He was appointed a member of the executive council in 1862, was senator in 1867, puisne judge of the supreme court of the province of Quebec in 1873, and in 1875 of the court of queen's bench. He founded "La banque nationale" in 1859, and is dean of the faculty of law in Laval university.—

Malaspina in 1789-'95, during which time he studied everywhere the geological formations and formed valuable collections. After his return to Vienna he became an assistant professor of geology in the university, and subsequently a corresponding member of the Academy of sciences. He was appointed in 1805 professor in the University of Milan, and in 1815 was sent to Brazil, where great geological discoveries had been made. He explored the environs of Rio Janeiro and visited Bahia; but his health failed, and he returned to Europe. His works include "Observations géologiques faites en Asie et en Amérique par un des membres de l'expédition autour du monde du Capitaine Malaspina, 1789-1795" (2 vols., Geneva, 1798); "Geologischer Atlas der ganzen Erde" (Vienna, 1800); "Dialoge und kleine Aufsätze über die Geologie und Geognostie" (1802); "Bemerkungen über die Geologie von Südamerika" (2 vols., 1805); and "Entwurf eines Systems der geognostischen und geologischen Beschreibung der Erde" (1815).

TETINCHOUA, Miami chief, lived in the 17th century. He is described by Nicolas Perrot, who met him in 1671 at Chicago, as being the most powerful of Indian chiefs. According to the French traveller, he could control four or five thousand warriors, never marched without a guard of forty men, who patrolled night and day around his tent when he camped, and seldom held any direct communication with his subjects, but conveyed his orders to them by subordinates. Perrot was received with great honor as an envoy from the French governor. Tetinchoua sent out a detachment to meet him, which, after performing some remarkable military evolutions, escorted Perrot and his Pottawattamie guard into the principal town of the Miamis. Tetinchoua then assigned him a guard of fifty men, regaled him splendidly after the manner of the country, and ordered a game of ball to be played for his diversion. He was unable, owing to his age and infirmities, to accompany Perrot to Sault Ste. Marie, at the mouth of Lake Superior, where the French took formal possession of all the country on the lakes. He did not even send deputies to the assembly that was held on the occasion, but he gave the Pottawattamies power to act in his name. In 1672 Father Claude Dablon is said to have met him with his army of 3,000 Miamis. But, although the missionary was received with marks of friendship, he did not succeed in making any conversions.

TETLEPANQUETZAL (tet-lay-pan - ket - sal'), Mexican king, d. in 1525. He was the fourth Tecpanec king of Tlacopan, and reigned after 1503 as a tributary of the Mexican emperor Montezuma II., whom he assisted in the first defence of Mexico. Afterward he was one of the principal auxiliaries of Cuauhtemotzin (q. v.), and when the city was finally taken, 13 Aug., 1521, he was made prisoner and tortured, together with the emperor, by the Spaniards that he might reveal the hiding-place of the imperial treasure. When Cortes marched in 1525 to Honduras to subdue the revolt of Cristobal de Olid, he carried the emperor and three kings with him, and, under the pretext that he had discovered a conspiracy, all four were strangled.

TÊTU, Louis David Henri (tay-tew), Canadian clergyman, b. in Rivière Ouelle, province of Quebec, 24 Oct., 1849. He was educated at the College of Sainte Anne de la Pocatiere and at the Seminary of Quebec, was assistant secretary to the archbishop of Quebec from 1870 till 1878, and in the latter year became almoner. He was named chamberlain and domestic prelate to the pope in 1887. He has published "Notice biographique; Monseigneur de Laval, premier évêque de Quebec" (Quebec, 1887), and "Mandements, lettres, pasteurs et circulaires des évêques de Quebec" (3 vols., 1888, to be completed in seven volumes).

TETZOTZOMOC (tet-so-tso-mok'), king of Atzacotzalco, d. in 1427. He ascended the throne in 1353 and exercised suzerainty over the monarchs of Mexico, but approved the choice of King Huitzilihuitl II. in 1403 and gave him his daughter Miahuaxochitl in marriage, notwithstanding the opposition of his son Maxtla. He declared war against the king of Texcoco, Techotlalatzin, and being defeated sued for peace; but after the latter's death he continued the war against his successor, Ixtlilxochitl I., whom he defeated and assassinated in 1419, usurping the crown of Texcoco.

THACHER, George, jurist, b. in Yarmouth, Me., 12 April, 1754; d. in Biddeford, Me., 6 April, 1824. He was graduated at Harvard in 1776, and afterward studied law, being admitted to the bar in 1778. He was a delegate from Massachusetts to the Continental congress in 1787-'8, and from 4 March, 1789, to 3 March, 1801, he represented the Maine district of Massachusetts in congress. He served as judge of the supreme court of Massachusetts, and afterward of that of Maine, from 1800 till 1824, and was a delegate to the Maine constitutional convention in 1819.

THACHER, James, physician, b. in Barnstable, Mass., 14 Feb., 1754; d. in Plymouth, Mass., 26 May, 1844. He began the study of medicine under Dr. Abner Hersey, in his native town, about 1771, applied for a place in the medical department of the Continental army in 1775, and was appointed surgeon's mate in the hospital at Cambridge, of which Dr. John Warren was the senior attending surgeon. In February, 1776, he was made surgeon's mate in one of the regiments that occupied Prospect Hill. He marched with his regiment to Ticonderoga, and was surgeon's mate in the general hospital of that fort as long as it was held by the Continental army. He then retired with the sick and wounded to Fort Edward, and subsequently to Albany. He was transferred from the hospital to the field service by his own desire, was appointed chief surgeon to the 1st Virginia regiment in 1778, and to a New England regiment in 1779. Dr. Thacher was present at nearly all the important movements of the Continental army until the surrender of Cornwallis, and became known for his patriotism and self-sacrificing devotion to his patients, as much as for his skill in his profession. After his retirement from the army he practised in Plymouth, at the same time engaging in literary and scientific pursuits. He was a member of the Pilgrim society of Plymouth, and of the Massachusetts medical society. Besides publishing works of a purely professional or scientific character, he wrote extensively on general literature, especially on that of his profession. He published "American New Dispensatory" (Boston, 1810); "Observations on Hydrophobia" (Plymouth, 1812); "American Modern Practice" (Boston, 1817); "Military Journal during the American Revolutionary War," which is one of the most reliable authorities on the Revolution, and completely vindicates the conduct of Washington toward André, from the aspersions of contemporary English writers (1823); "Practical Treatise on the Management of Bees" (1829); "American Medical Biography" (2 vols., 1828); "Essay on Demonology, Ghosts, Apparitions, and Popular Superstitions" (1831); "History of the Town of Plymouth" (1832); and "Observations relative to the Execution of Major John André as a Spy in 1780" (1834).

THACHER, John Marshall, commissioner of patents, b. in Barre, Vt., 1 July, 1836. He was graduated at the University of Vermont in 1859, and studied law. At the beginning of the civil war he entered the National forces and served as captain in the 13th Vermont regiment. He was appointed assistant examiner in the patent-office in 1864, and was promoted through the different grades until 1 Nov., 1874, when he became commissioner, which office he held until 1 Oct., 1875. Meanwhile, in 1870, he had been admitted to the bar in Virginia, and on his resignation he removed to Chicago, where he has since practised his profession.

THACHER, Thomas, clergyman, b. in Salisbury, England, 1 May, 1620; d. in Boston, Mass., 15 Oct., 1678. He was carefully educated by his father, a minister at Salisbury, who prepared him for entrance to one of the English universities, but the son declined to subscribe to the religious tests that were then a condition of matriculation, and resolved on settling in New England. He reached Boston on 4 June, 1635, and soon afterward entered the family of Rev. Charles Chauncy at Scituate, under whose guidance he studied mental philosophy and theology, and attained a remarkable knowledge of the oriental languages. He was especially noted for the great beauty of his transcriptions of Syriac and other oriental characters, and also acquired a knowledge of medicine, practising occasionally with success. He was ordained at Weymouth on 2 Jan., 1644, and shortly afterward took charge of the congregation of that village. Here he remained till 1664, when he removed to Boston, possibly because the relatives of his second wife resided there, although he is said to have been dismissed by his congregation in Weymouth a little before that time. He practised as a physician in Boston for the next two years, but preached occasionally. On 16 Feb., 1699, he was installed pastor of the Old South church. He is mentioned in terms of high praise by Cotton Mather in the "Magnalia," who quotes an elegy, written partly in Latin and partly in Greek by Eleazar, an Indian student at Harvard, in which the virtues of Mr. Thacher are celebrated. He wrote "A Brief Rule to Guide the Common People of New England how to order Themselves and Theirs in the Small Pocks or Measels," which is supposed to have been the first work on medicine that was published in Massachusetts (Boston, 1677; 2d ed., 1702), and "A Fast of God's Chusing; Fast Sermon" (1674).—His son,

Peter, clergyman, b. in Salem, Mass., in 1651; d. in Milton, Mass., 17 Dec., 1727, was graduated at Harvard in 1671, and was tutor there for several years afterward, having Cotton Mather as one of his pupils. He spent some time in England, where ineffectual efforts were made to induce him to conform to the established church. After his return he was ordained pastor of the church in Milton in 1681, and labored there for the remainder of his life. He attained note as a preacher and was called on to speak on many important public occasions. His "Convention Sermon" (1711) is preserved in manuscript in the library of the Massachusetts historical society. He published "Unbelief Detected and Condemned, to which is added the Treasures of the Fathers Inheritable by their Posterity" (1708); "Election Sermon" (1711); "Christ's Forgiveness a Pattern: A Sermon" (1712); "A Sermon on the Death of Samuel Man" (1719); "A Divine Riddle: He that is Weak is Strong" (1723); and "The Perpetual Covenant."—Peter's grandson, Oxenbridge, lawyer, b. in Milton, Mass., in 1720; d. in Boston, Mass., 8 July, 1765, was graduated at Harvard in 1738, and afterward studied divinity, but abandoned it for law on account of his health. He was successful at the bar, and took an active part in opposition to the English government during the early stages of the Revolution, being at that time one of the four representatives of Boston in the general court. He published "Considerations upon reducing the Value of the Gold Coins within the Province" (1760) and "Sentiments of a British-American, occasioned by an Act to lay Certain Duties in the British Colonies and Plantations" (Boston, 1764). In the latter pamphlet he assailed the navigation act with great vigor.—Peter, eldest son of Oxenbridge, clergyman, b. in Milton, Mass., 21 March, 1752; d. in Savannah, Ga., 16 Dec., 1802, was graduated at Harvard in 1769, and, after serving as principal of a grammar-school for a few months, was ordained pastor of Malden on 19 Sept., 1770. His gifts as an orator at once made him popular, and his active patriotism during the Revolution was of great benefit to the cause of American liberty. He published a "Narrative of the Battle of Bunker Hill," at the request of the Massachusetts committee of safety, and delivered at Watertown an oration against standing armies, which has been frequently republished. He was a delegate in 1780 to the convention that met at Cambridge and Boston to frame a constitution for Massachusetts, supported a motion for abolishing the office of governor, and took an active part in all the deliberations of the assembly. He was called to the Brattle street church on 12 Jan., 1785, and continued in this pastorate for the rest of his life. In 1791 he received the degree of D. D. from the University of Edinburgh. Dr. Thacher was for some time secretary of the Society for propagating the gospel among the Indians of North America. He was one of the earliest members of the Massachusetts historical society, a member of the American academy of arts and sciences, and actively engaged in humanitarian and religious movements. He was chaplain to one or both branches of the general court for fifteen years. He published about twenty-two of his sermons between 1776 and 1800. Dr. Thacher preached funeral sermons for three governors of the state of Massachusetts—Bowdoin, Hancock, and Sumner, all of whom belonged to his congregation during the seventeen years of his pastorate. He published a work entitled "Observations on the State of the Clergy in New England, with Strictures on the Power of dismissing them, Usurped by some Churches" (Boston, 1783), and "Memoirs of Dr. Boylston" (1789).—Thomas, another son of Oxenbridge, b. in Boston, Mass., 24 Oct., 1756; d. in Dedham, Mass., 19 Oct., 1812, was graduated at Harvard in 1775, and ordained minister of the 3d church in Dedham, 7 June, 1780. In 1788 he was elected a member of the convention that ratified the Federal constitution, of which he was an earnest supporter. He was a member of the Academy of arts and sciences, and published several discourses between 1804 and 1811.—The second Peter's son, Samuel Cooper, clergyman, b. in Boston, Mass., 14 Dec., 1785; d. in Moulins, France, 2 Jan., 1818, was graduated at Harvard in 1804, and began his preparation for the ministry under William Ellery Channing. In 1805 he acted for a time as head-master of the Boston Latin-school, and he subsequently conducted a private school of his own. In 1807 he was appointed librarian of Harvard, entering on the duties of the office in the following year. He was ordained and installed minister of the New South church (Unitarian), at Boston, on 15 May, 1811, but his health failed rapidly, and in 1815 he went to England, where he was advised to winter in the Cape of Good Hope. He resided for some time at Cape Town, but his health improved very slowly, and he returned to England and subsequently went to the south of France, where he died. Dr. Thacher was a member of the Anthology club, and he published articles in nearly all the volumes of its magazine, the "Monthly Anthology." Many of his lectures and sermons were devoted to the exposition of the Unitarian system, and were considered to embody a more vigorous and formal defence of Unitarianism than any that had appeared previously. His works are "Apology for Rational and Evangelical Christianity" (Boston, 1815); "Unity of God" (Liverpool, 1816; Worcester, Mass., 1817); "Sermons, with a Memoir by Rev. Francis W. P. Greenwood" (Boston, 1824); and "Evidences necessary to establish the Doctrine of the Trinity" (1828). He also published a volume of sermons of Rev. Joseph S. Buckminster, to which he prefixed a memoir (1814).—Samuel Cooper's brother, THOMAS CUSHING (1771–1837), was graduated from Harvard in 1790, and was pastor at Lynn in 1794–1813. He published "Eulogy on Washington" (Boston, 1800), and sermons (1794–1801).—The first Thomas's grandson, Peter, clergyman, b. in Boston, Mass., 1, 1677; d. there, 26 Feb., 1738, was graduated at Harvard in 1696, and for some time afterward taught at Hatfield, Mass. He was ordained pastor of the church at Weymouth on 26 Nov., 1707, where he remained until 1720, when he was called to the pastorate of the New North church, Boston. He was a noted preacher, and published several sermons, etc., between 1711 and 1730.

THACHER, Thomas Antony, educator, b. in Hartford, Conn., 11 Jan., 1815; d. in New Haven, Conn., 7 April, 1886. He was graduated at Yale in 1835, and after teaching for three years in Connecticut and Georgia was appointed tutor there in 1838, and professor of Latin in 1842, which post he retained to the end of his life. He went to Germany in the following year, and for some time taught English to the crown prince of Prussia and his cousin, Prince Frederick Charles. He returned in 1845, and, although often in feeble health, was actively interested in the management of Yale until his death, at which time he was the member of the faculty that had been longest in continuous service. He was a fine classical scholar, and contributed many articles to periodicals on classical subjects, especially to the "New Englander." He also assisted in the compilation of Webster's Dictionary. He edited many classical works, among others Cicero's "De Officiis," with notes (New York, 1850), and an English translation and adaptation of Madvig's "Latin Grammar," which was long in use at Yale. In his introduction to this work he earnestly upholds the English system of pronouncing Latin. He also wrote "Sketch of the Life of Edward C. Herrick" (New Haven, 1862).

THARIN, Robert Seymour Symmes (tha'-rin), lawyer, b. at Magnolia, near Charleston, S. C., 10 Jan., 1830. The family-seat at Magnolia was also the birthplace of Robert's father, William Cunningham Tharin, grandson of its founder, Col. William Cunningham, an officer on Gen. Francis Marion's staff. Robert was graduated at the College of Charleston in 1857 and at the law-school of the University of New York in 1863. He began practice in Wetumpka, Ala., in 1859. During the political excitement of this time, he became known for his Union sentiments and his sympathy with non-slaveholders. He advocated the establishment of small farms and factories, the emigration of the blacks to Africa, the representation of non-slaveholders, who were in the majority, in legislatures, conventions, and congress, and the repeal of the ordinance of secession. His Union sentiments led to an attack on him by a mob in 1861, and he fled to Cincinnati, Ohio. Mr. Tharin then settled in Richmond, Ind., and enlisted as a private in the Indiana volunteers, but was mustered out in 1862. While he was in the service he wrote a letter to the London "Daily News," denouncing his former law-partner, William L. Yancey, who was then commissioner from the southern Confederacy to England. This letter, Mr. Yancey afterward confessed, was worth an army corps to the Union, as it defeated recognition. He returned to the south after the war, and in 1884 was corporation counsel of Charleston, S. C. In February, 1888, he was tendered, by the Industrial conference at Washington, a nomination for president of the United States, but declined on the ground that the body was not a convention, and that presidential conventions are dangerous to the people who are not represented therein. He is now employed in the auditor's office in Washington. He is the author of "Arbitrary Arrests in the South" (New York, 1863), and "Letters on the Political Situation" (Charleston, S. C., 1871).

THATCHER, Benjamin Bussey, author, b. in Warren, Me., 8 Oct., 1809; d. in Boston, 14 July, 1840. His father, Samuel, a graduate of Harvard in 1793 and a lawyer, represented Massachusetts in congress in 1802–'5, serving afterward eleven years in the legislature. He was a trustee of Harvard and a founder of Warren academy. The son, upon his graduation at Bowdoin in 1826, studied law and was admitted to the bar in Boston, but devoted himself to literature. In 1836–'8 he travelled in Europe for his health, contributing during the time to British and American periodicals. He wrote for the "North American Review" in 1831, and contributed to the "Essayist" several critiques on American poets which attracted notice. He edited the "Boston Book" in 1837, the "Colonizationist," a periodical in the interests of the Liberian cause, which he further aided by eloquent speeches, and a volume of Mrs. Hemans's poems, to which he contributed a preface. He left in manuscript an account of his residence in Europe. His poems, some of which are in Griswold's "Poets and Poetry of America" (1842), and his reviews and essays, have never been collected. He published "Biography of North American Indians" (2 vols., New York, 1832; new ed., 1842); "Memoir of Phillis Wheatley" (Boston, 1834); "Memoir of S. Osgood Wright" (1834); "Traits of the Boston Tea-Party" (1835); "Traits of Indian Manners, etc." (1835); and "Tales of the American Revolution" (1846).

THATCHER, Henry Knox, naval officer, b. in Thomaston, Me., 26 May, 1806; d. in Boston, Mass., 5 April, 1880. He was a grandson of Gen. Henry Knox. He received his early education in the schools of Boston, and in 1822 was admitted as a cadet at the U. S. military academy. The records of the academy show that he was absent on sick-leave from 28 Nov., 1822, till April, 1823, when his resignation is recorded. He had exchanged his cadetship for the appointment in the navy, which he entered as a midshipman, 4 March, 1823. He became a passed midshipman, 23 March, 1829, and was commissioned lieutenant, 28 Feb., 1833. After serving in various parts of the world, he was promoted to commander by action of the naval retiring board, 14 Sept., 1855. He commanded the sloop "Decatur," Pacific station. Early in 1862 he was ordered to command the sailing-sloop "Constellation" on the Mediterranean station, and he was thereby prevented from engaging in active operations during the first years of the civil war. He was promoted to the grade of commodore, 16 July, 1862, without having had any commission as a captain. In July, 1863, he returned from the Mediterranean and took charge of the steam frigate "Colorado" on the North Atlantic blockade, and in her commanded the first division of Com. David D. Porter's fleet in both attacks on Fort Fisher. He was then appointed acting rear-admiral in advance of his regular promotion to that grade, and was ordered to succeed Vice-Admiral Farragut in command of the Western Gulf squadron at Mobile. There he conducted combined operations with Gen. Edward R. S. Canby which resulted in the surrender of the city and the Confederate fleet after its flight and pursuit up Tombigbee river. The navy department sent him congratulations on the successful results at Mobile. Other points on the Gulf were quietly surrendered, and on 2 June, 1865, Galveston, Tex., was occupied by Thatcher's squadron without opposition, and the entire coast was restored to the Union. He was placed in command of the consolidated Gulf squadrons until May, 1866, after which he commanded the North Pacific squadron until August, 1868. He was commissioned rear-admiral, 25 July, 1866, and was placed on the retired list, 26 May, 1868. After his return home he was port-admiral at Portsmouth, N. H., in 1869-'71, after which he was unemployed until his death. Upon his death the secretary of the navy published an obituary order and directed salutes of thirteen minute-guns to be fired in his honor, and flags to be displayed at half-mast. He was a member of the Massachusetts Society of the Cincinnati and the military order of the Loyal Legion. While in command of the North Pacific squadron he was presented with a medal and made a knight of the order of Kamehameha I. by the king of the Hawaiian islands, which honors he was allowed to accept by act of congress.

Devoting himself to literature, he was for seven years dramatic and literary critic of the "Boston Evening Gazette," from which his health finally compelled him to withdraw, and he contributed to many periodicals. He was the author of a poem that he read before a Harvard society (Cambridge, 1850) and "The Grotto Nymph" (Boston, 1859), and produced some successful plays, among which are "Olympia," "The Sculptor," "The Painter of Naples," "The Regicide," "Mary Tudor," and "Birds of a Feather."

THAXTER, Celia, poet, b. in Portsmouth, N. H., 29 June, 1836. Her father, Thomas B. Loughton, took her when she was a child to the Isles of Shoals, where she has spent most of her life at Appledore. She married there Levi Lincoln Thaxter, of Watertown, Mass., in 1851. She has published "Among the Isles of Shoals" (Boston, 1873); "Poems" (1871); "Driftweed" (1878); "Poems for Children" (1884); and "The Cruise of the Mystery, and other Poems" (1886). THAYER, Abbott Henderson, artist, b. in Boston, Mass., 12 Aug., 1849. He studied in the Brooklyn academy of design and the National academy, under Lemuel E. Wilmarth. In 1875 he went to Paris, where for a year he was a student at the École des beaux arts under Charles E. R. H. Lehmann, and three years with Jean L. Gérôme. He painted chiefly animals until he had been two years abroad. Since that time he has devoted himself principally to figure-painting. He has also essayed landscapes with success. At the Paris salon of 1877 he exhibited "Le sommeil," and in the following year he sent a portrait. He is a member of the Society of American artists, to whose exhibitions he has contributed, besides several portraits, "Child and Cats" (1884); "Woman and Swan" (1886); and "An Angel" (1888).

THAYER, Alexander Wheelock, author, b. in South Natick, Mass., 22 Oct., 1817. He was graduated at Harvard in 1843, and at the law-school in 1848. He contributed musical and other letters to the Boston "Courier" in 1857-'8 under the pen-name of "A Quiet Man," and to "Dwight's Journal of Music" under the name of "A Diarist," wrote many articles for Grove's "Dictionary of Music and Musicians," and was musical critic of the New York "Tribune." Brown," a collection of his own contributions (Berlin, 1862); "The Hebrews and the Red Sea" (Andover, 1883); and "Life of Beethoven," which is valued for its accuracy and extent of research (3 vols., Berlin, 1866-'87).

He was graduated at Brown in 1845, was subsequently principal of the Worcester academy, and in 1848 founded the Oread institute, a collegiate school for young ladies, in Worcester, Mass., of which he is treasurer. He was for several years a member of the school board of Worcester, and in 1853 an alderman of the city. In 1853-'4 he was a representative in the legislature, and while there originated and organized the Emigrant aid company, laboring till 1857 to combine the northern states in support of his plan to send anti-slavery settlers into Kansas. Lawrence, Topeka, Manhattan, and Ossawatimie were settled under the auspices of his company. Gov. Charles Robinson, at the quarter-centennial celebration of Kansas, at Topeka, said: "Without these settlements Kansas would have been a slave state without a struggle; without the Aid society these towns would never have existed; and that society was born of the brain of Eli Thayer." Charles Sumner also said that he would rather have the credit that is due to Eli Thayer for his Kansas work than be the hero of the battle of New Orleans. In 1857-'61 Mr. Thayer sat in congress as a Republican, serving on the committee on militia, and as chairman of the committee on public lands. In 1860 he was a delegate for Oregon to the National Republican convention at Chicago and labored for the nomination of Lincoln. He has patented many inventions, which cover a wide field. Among these are a hydraulic elevator in use in this country and in Europe, a sectional safety steam boiler, and an automatic boiler-cleaner, or sediment-extractor. He has published a volume of congressional speeches (Boston, 1860); several lectures (Worcester, 1886); and is now writing a history of the Emigrant aid company that he organized and its influence on our national history.

THAYER, Elihu, clergyman, b. in Braintree, Mass., 29 March, 1747; d. in Kingston, N. H., 3 April, 1812. At the organization of the New Hampshire missionary society he was elected its president, holding office till 1811. The degree of D. D. was conferred upon him in 1807 by Dartmouth. In 1865-'6 he studied in Europe under Carl Haupt and others. While in Boston he edited the "Organist's Journal" and the "Choir Journal," and was director of the Boston choral union, the New England church-music association, and other societies. He has given organ recitals in the United States and Europe. Since 1881 he has resided in New York, following his profession as an organist and teacher. The degree of Mus. Doc. was conferred on him by Wooster university, Ohio, in 1883.

THAYER, John, clergyman, b. in Boston, Mass., about 1755; d. in Limerick, Ireland, 5 Feb., 1815. He was the minister of a Protestant church in Boston, when, in 1781, he went to Europe, where, after visiting France, England, and Italy, he united with the Roman Catholic church in 1783. He studied for the priesthood in Paris, was ordained in 1784, and returned to Boston, where he held weekly conferences on the doctrines of the Roman Catholic church, attracting crowds by his learning and eloquence. He was sent to Kentucky in 1799, and remained there till 1803, when he went to England and engaged in missionary work for about a year. John Thayer, Catholic Missionary of Boston, and the Rev. George Leslie, Pastor of a Church in Washington, N. H." (Boston, 1793), and "An Account of the Conversion of the Rev. Mr. John Thayer, lately a Protestant Minister at Boston in North America, who embraced the Roman Catholic Religion at Rome, on the 25th of May, 1783, written by Himself" (5th ed., reprinted from the London edition, Baltimore, 1788; French translation, Paris 1788; Spanish translation, from the French, Valencia, 1788). Previous to his civil appointments he had been made brigadier-general of militia, and organized and commanded several expeditions against the Indians. In the civil war, as colonel of the 1st regiment of Nebraska infantry, he led a brigade at Donelson and Shiloh, and was made brigadier-general of volunteers, 4 Oct., 1862. He resigned, 19 July, 1865, and, returning to Nebraska, he served as U. S. senator in 1867-'71, having been chosen as a Republican, and was then appointed by Gen. Grant governor of Wyoming territory. In 1886 he was elected governor of Nebraska by a majority of about 25,000, which office he still holds (1888). He was department commander of the Grand army of the republic in the state of Nebraska in 1886.

The son was graduated at Harvard in 1789, studied theology, and became a pastor at Wilkesbarre, Pa. In 1795 he was installed over the Unitarian society at Lancaster, Mass., where he remained for nearly fifty years. He received the degree of D. D. from Harvard in 1817. On account of Dr. Thayer's tact and sagacity he was, perhaps more than any other man of his day, selected for the settlement of ecclesiastical difficulties, and he frequently drew up the decisions of church councils. He died while on a journey for the benefit of his health. He published twenty-three occasional sermons in 1795-1831.—His son, Nathaniel, capitalist, b. in Lancaster, Mass., 11 Sept., 1808; d. in Boston, Mass., 7 March, 1883, for many years constituted, with his deceased brother, the firm of John E. Thayer and Brother, in Boston, which was active in the development of railroads in the west, of several of which he was a director. He was a fellow of Harvard in 1868-'75, and one of its largest benefactors. He contributed to a Commons hall, erected Thayer hall in 1870 as a memorial of his father and brother, bore the expenses of Prof. Louis Agassiz's expedition to South America, which was known as the Thayer expedition, built a fire-proof herbarium at the Botanic garden, and gave much in aid of poor students of the college, and was one of the most generous citizens of Boston.

S. military academy in 1808, and assigned to the corps of engineers. During the next four years he was employed on engineer service on the eastern coast, and as instructor of mathematics at the academy, receiving promotion as 1st lieutenant, 1 July, 1812. Being called to the field in the latter year, he served as chief engineer under Gen. Henry Dearborn, on the Niagara frontier; in 1813 under Gen. Wade Hampton's division on Lake Champlain, receiving promotion to captain of engineers, 13 Oct., 1813, and in 1814 under Gen. Moses Porter's forces in defence of Norfolk, Va., being brevetted major, 20 Feb., 1815, for distinguished services. In 1815 he was sent to Europe to examine military works and schools, and study the operations of the allied armies before Paris, but he was recalled in 1817 to the superintendency of the academy at West Point, which he assumed on 28 July of that year, and held till his resignation, 1 July, 1833. During the sixteen years of his administration he organized the school on its present basis, and raised it from an elementary condition to the same grade with the best military schools in the world. During his term of office he was brevetted lieutenant-colonel, 3 March, 1823, made major, 24 May, 1828, and brevetted colonel, 3 March, 1833. Five years after his resignation he was again offered the charge of the academy, with almost absolute control, but he did not accept. On leaving West Point he was made a member of the board of engineers, of which he was president from 7 Dec., 1838, and for thirty years following he was engaged in the construction of defences in and about Boston harbor, which are models of his engineering skill and standards of economy and stability of construction. On 7 July, 1838, he was made lieutenant-colonel of engineers, and he became colonel, 3 March, 1863. On 1 June, 1863, he was retired from active service, after receiving the brevet of brigadier-general the day before. The degree of A. M. was conferred on him by Dartmouth in 1810, and by Harvard in 1825, and that of LL. D. by St. John's college, Md., in 1830, by Kenyon and Dartmouth in 1846, and by Harvard in 1857. He was also a member of various scientific associations. Gen. His body was reinterred at West Point, 8 Nov., 1877, and his statue was unveiled there, 11 June, 1883, Gen. George W. Cullum making the presentation. It bears the inscription, "Colonel Thayer, Father of the United States Military Academy," and is represented in the accompanying illustration. A fine full-length portrait by Robert W. Weir is in the library at West Point. He was the author of "Papers on Practical Engineering" (1844).—His cousin, Martin Russell, jurist, b. in Petersburg, Va., 27 Jan., 1819, was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1840, admitted to the Philadelphia bar in 1842, and began to practise in that city. In 1862-'7 he sat in congress, having been elected as a Republican, serving in the committee on the bankrupt law and as chairman of the committee on private land claims. In 1862 he was appointed a commissioner to revise the revenue laws of Pennsylvania, and in 1867, declining re-election to congress, he was appointed one of the judges of the district court of the county of Philadelphia, and he has recently been re-elected. In 1873 he was appointed on the board of visitors to West Point, and wrote the report. In the succeeding year he became president-judge of the court of common pleas of Philadelphia. He is the author of "The Duties of Citizenship" (Philadelphia, 1862); "The Great Victory: its Cost and Value" (1865); "The Law considered as a Progressive Science" (1870); "On Libraries" (1871); "The Life and Works of Francis Lieber" (1873); and "The Battle of Germantown" (1878).

THAYER, Thomas Baldwin, clergyman, b. in Boston, Mass., 10 Sept., 1812; d. in Roxbury, Mass., 12 Feb., 1886. He entered Harvard at an early age, but left after the first year and began to teach, at the same time studying divinity. He was ordained in 1832, and in 1833-'45 was pastor of the 1st Universalist society in Lowell, where his ministry was important in the history of Universalism in New England. During the crusade against Universalism, in 1840-'2, he established and edited in its defence the "Star of Bethlehem," and with his co-worker, Rev. Abel C. Thomas, wrote the "Lowell Tracts" in the same interest. Mr. Thayer was called to a pastorate in Brooklyn, N. Y., in 1845, where he edited the "Golden Rule" in the interest of the fraternity of Odd-Fellows. After six years he returned to his old parish in Lowell. In 1859 he became pastor of the Shawmut avenue church, Boston, which charge he resigned in 1867. In 1862 Dr. Thayer assumed the editorship of the "Universalist Quarterly," which contains some of his most important literary work. He continued these labors, with an interval of travel in Europe and the East, until his last illness. He received the degree of D. D. from Tufts college in 1865, and he was for many years on the board of overseers of Harvard. Dr. Thayer was a biblical scholar of rare breadth, and a pioneer in Universalist literature. He wrote much verse that has never been collected, and published "Christianity against Infidelity" (Boston, 1833; enlarged, Cincinnati, 1849); "Bible Class Assistant" (Boston, 1840); "History of the Origin of Endless Punishment" (1855); "Theology of Universalism" (1862); and "Over the River" (1864).

THAYER, William Makepeace, author, b. in Franklin, Mass., 23 Feb., 1820. He was graduated at Brown in 1843, studied theology, and was settled over the orthodox Congregational church at Ashland, Mass., in 1849-'57. In consequence of a throat trouble he relinquished his pastorate, and on his return to Franklin in 1858 devoted himself to literary work. In 1857 and 1863 he was a member of the legislature, and in 1860-'76 he was secretary of the Massachusetts temperance alliance. He has written many religious and juvenile books, the first of which was published in 1852. In "The Bobbin Boy" (Boston, 1859) he originated the conversational style, and its success was so great that he wrote his succeeding biographies in dialogue. After "The Pioneer Boy" (1863) was published, the same style was adopted by other writers. His most popular works are a series of biographies (10 vols., Boston, 1859-'63); "Youth's History of the Rebellion" (4 vols., 1863-'5); "White House Series" (1880-'5); and "Marvels of the New West" (Norwich, 1887). Nearly 1,000,000 copies of his works have been sold, "From Log-Cabin to the White House" exceeding 300,000 copies, two thirds of them being sold in Europe. "The Poor Boy and Merchant Prince" (Boston, 1858), "The Good Girl and True Woman" (1859), "The Pioneer Boy," "Tact, Push, and Principle" (Boston, 1880), "From Pioneer Home to the White House" (Norwich, 1882), and "From Tannery to the White House" (Boston, 1885), have each reached 50,000 copies. Many have been republished in England, and some have been translated into German, French, Italian, Greek, Swedish, and Hawaiian. Mr. Thayer has also edited the "Home Monthly" and "Mother's Assistant" (Boston).

THEAKER, Thomas Clarke, commissioner of patents, b. in York county, Pa., 1 Feb., 1812; d. in Oakland, Md., 16 July, 1883. He received a good English education, removed to Bridgeport, Ohio, in 1830, and was principally occupied as a machinist and millwright. He served in congress as a Republican in 1859-'61, and was an unsuccessful candidate for the ensuing congress. He was made a member of a board of commissioners who were appointed to investigate the workings of the patent-office, and was afterward made by President Johnson commissioner of patents, serving from 17 Aug., 1865, till 6 June, 1868.

THÉBAUD, Augustine J. (tay-bo), clergyman, b. in Brittany in 1807; d. in Fordham, N. Y., 17 Dec., 1885. He studied for the priesthood, and after his ordination was for several years engaged in missionary work in Brittany. He afterward went to Rome and entered the Society of Jesus. In 1838 he came to the United States and was appointed professor in St. Mary's college, Ky., where he remained until that institution passed from the control of the Jesuits in 1845. He then taught physics and mathematics in St. John's college, Fordham, of which he was president in 1846-'52. He was then made pastor of St. Joseph's church, Troy, where he began his investigations in Irish history. He was afterward transferred to New York, where he continued the same line of research, the result of which was the publication of "The Irish Race," a work that placed him in the first rank as a philosophic historian, and of which Dr. Orestes A. Brownson wrote that it had caused him to change life-long opinions on questions of paramount importance in the philosophy of history. Father Thébaud went to Canada, where he remained a year, and then returned to New York. The rest of his life was spent in missionary labors and literary pursuits. He was a frequent contributor to Roman Catholic periodicals. Besides the work already mentioned he published "Gentilism"; "The Church and the Moral World"; and "Twit-Twatso."

THEKAKISQUI, Iroquois chief, b. in central New York in 1756; d. in 1802. Owing to his bravery and skill in the use of arms and in hunting, he became a chief at the age of twenty. He made several raids on the Spanish colonies, and rendered considerable assistance to the English in the wars of the Revolution. He led a body of Indians into the Carolinas, devastated the country with fire and sword, and brought back numerous slaves into the Iroquois territory. He gave up part of the lands of his tribe to the government of the United States in 1794. Under his sway his people turned their attention to agriculture, and made some advances in civilization.

THELLER, Edward Alexander, journalist, b. in Canada East about 1810; d. in Honitas, Cal., in 1859. He was graduated as a physician, and, having actively participated in the Canadian rebellion of 1837, was arrested, tried, convicted, and sentenced to death. Escaping from prison, he came to this country, and, after residing in New York in 1841-'2, went to California in 1853, and was editor of several newspapers. He was at one time superintendent of public schools in San Francisco. He published "Canada in 1837-'8: Showing the Causes of the Late Attempted Revolution and its Failure" (2 vols., Philadelphia, 1841).

THEONDECHOREN, Joseph, Indian convert, d. near Tadoussac, Canada, 26 June, 1652. Previous to his conversion it is related that he could take live coals and red-hot pebbles in his hands and mouth without sustaining any injury, and plunge his arm into boiling water, and he attributed this power to satanic influence. He became a Christian in 1641, and endeavored to imitate the missionaries in everything and conform to their mode of life. The Jesuit relations contain extracts from sermons that he preached, which are remarkable for fervor and rude eloquence. He went with Father Jogues in 1643, accompanied by his two brothers and his son. One of his brothers and his son were killed, but he escaped, during a hunting expedition of the Iroquois, and reached Three Rivers, where he preached some remarkable discourses to his countrymen, who had come to congratulate him on his escape. After his return to his own country he formed one of a convoy of 100 warriors who went down to Quebec. He was wounded in an attack that was made on the town by the Iroquois, but succeeded in escaping to the woods. He was discovered by a band of hostile Indians, who were so touched by his discourse that they saved his life and nursed him. When the Hurons were driven from their country in 1649 he went to live in St. Joseph's island, and afterward took a large part of his tribe to Quebec. They formed a settlement close to the city, where Theondechoren edified both the Indians and French by the sanctity of his life, and astonished the latter by his eloquence.

THÉVENARD, Antoine Jean Marie (tay-veh-nar), Count, French naval officer, b. in Saint Malo, 7 Dec., 1733; d. in Paris, 9 Feb., 1815. He entered the service of the East India company as a cabin-boy in 1747, assisted in three combats with the English, and rose rapidly in rank. In 1754 he was sent with a sloop-of-war to Newfoundland, and destroyed all the establishments and fisheries along the northern coast of that colony. After the conclusion of peace, he became a naval engineer. He was a commodore in the East India fleet in 1767, but in 1769 joined the royal navy, was made captain of a frigate in 1770, and promoted first captain and knight of Saint Louis in 1773. When France sent aid to the United States in 1778, he was given command of a squadron, and carried troops and supplies to the Antilles and to this country. He made successful cruises along the coast of New England, and for his services was promoted brigadier-general of the naval forces in 1782, and chef d'escadre in 1784. Assuming command of the station of South America in 1785, he was made vice-admiral in 1792, and he was successively maritime prefect at Brest, Toulon, and Rochefort in 1792-'3, and again at Toulon in 1801. He was created a senator and a count in 1810, and made a peer of France, 4 June, 1814. He was a member of several learned societies of Europe and America, of the Royal academy of marine in 1773, and of the Paris academy of sciences after 1785. He published "Mémoires relatifs à la marine" (4 vols., Paris, 1800), which is still a standard work.

THÉVENAU, Charles Étienne (tay-vay-no), West Indian naturalist, b. in St. Lucia in 1758; d. in Paris in 1820. He took part as an ensign in the war of 1778-'83 in the West Indies, and after the conclusion of peace held an office in the magistracy of St. Lucia. At the beginning of the French revolution he went to Paris, where he became noted as a journalist; but he strongly opposed the enfranchisement of the slaves, and for his attacks against the club called "Les amis des noirs" was imprisoned during the reign of terror. Being released after the reaction of 1794, he returned to St. Lucia and devoted himself to agriculture and science. After the restoration of Louis XVIII. he settled in Paris. His works include "Observations sur des poissons recueillis dans un voyage à la Baie de Samana, et description des espèces nouvelles et peu connues" (St. Lucia, 1788); "Monographie des ignames" (Paris, 1790); "Historia naturalis plantarum quas in insulâ Santa Lucia crescent" (3 vols., 1802-'9); "Enumeratio plantarum cellularium quas in insula Santa Lucia a Thévenau collectas describit" (3 vols., 1807-'12); "Fasciculus plantarum riarum et exoticarum" (1813); "Essai sur les simples vénéneux des Antilles" (1814); and "Traité des arbres fruitiers des Antilles" (2 vols., 1816).

THÉVET, André (tay-vay), French historian, b. in Angoulême in 1502; d. in Paris, 23 Nov., 1590. He united with the Gray Friars, and in 1555 accompanied Admiral Villegaignon to Brazil, but returned to France in the following year and was appointed in 1558 chaplain to Queen Catherine de Medicis and historian and cosmographer to the king. He enjoyed royal favor under Charles IX. and his successors, and composed for their amusement several works which have since been held in high esteem. They include "Les singularitez de la France antarctique, autrement nommé Amérique, et de plusieurs terres et isles découvertes de notre temps" (Paris, 1558); "Cosmographie universelle, illustrée de diverses figures des choses plus remarquables vues par l'auteur" (2 vols., 1771); and "Vrais portraits et vies des hommes illustres, Grecs, Latins et Païens" (2 vols., 1584). The last is a curious work, containing the biography and portraits of several Indian caciques, emperors of Mexico, and incas of Peru, and, although some doubts have been expressed as to their authenticity, they have never been proved spurious. Thévet's work had many editions and has been translated into several languages. He wrote also "Histoire naturelle et générale des Indes Occidentales" and "Voyage dans les Indes Australes," which are preserved among the manuscripts in the National library at Paris.

THIBAUD, Pierre (tee-bo), French scientist, b. in Pithiviers in 1739; d. there in 1804. He was for many years a professor in Paris, and was also employed by the French academy of literature in making linguistic researches. In 1788 he was elected secretary of the Academy of Caen, but retired to his native city during the revolution. Thibaud devoted himself principally to the study of the migrations of men, to the descent of nations, and their travels through the world; he was also the first to advance the theory that the Indians of America migrated from Asia in remote antiquity, and through patient research was enabled to give a nearly complete history of the Aztec nation since their first appearance in the basin of Mexico about 500 B. C. Thibaud's works contain some errors, but he was a pioneer in the field of Indian history. He published "Origine des Indiens de l'Amérique du Nord, contenant une description de leurs manières, avec une étude sur leur religion, leur langage, et leur manière de se vêtir" (Caen, 1787); "Histoire et migrations de la nation Aztec ou Mexicaine depuis le cinquième siècle de notre ère jusqu'à la chute de la dynastie de Montezuma" (1796); and "Origine des Indiens de l'Amérique du Sud" (Pithiviers, 1801).

THIBAUDIN, Gaston Louis (tee-bo-dang), French explorer, b. in Dunkirk in 1727; d. in Lima, Peru, in 1796. He studied botany in Paris under Buffon, was employed afterward by the Academy of sciences, and at the request of that body was given by Louis XVI. in 1776 a mission to South America. His instructions were to collect in Chili, Peru, and Cuba specimens of medicinal plants that could be naturalized in France. He landed in Concepcion early in February, 1777, journeyed for months through the pampas and the mountains, and formed a rich herbarium. After visiting Santiago and the large cities, he went to Callao, making also a voyage to the island of Juan Fernandez. Toward the end of 1780 his herbarium numbered about 1,500 specimens, including many new ones, when he left for the West Indies, but, owing to the war that then raged in the Gulf of Mexico between France and England, he remained at Carthage occupied in arranging his collections till the truce of 1782. Then he resumed his voyage and went to Havana, where he formed a nearly complete collection of the flora of the island. On his return to France in 1785 he was elected a corresponding member of the Academy of sciences, and that body undertook also the publication of his works. He had made many friends in Peru, and, feeling insecure in Paris during the revolution, he returned in 1792 to Lima, where he taught mathematics till his death. Thibaudin's works include "Description des plantes recueillies dans un voyage au Pérou et au Chili" (2 vols., Paris, 1786); "Mémoire sur la flore de l'île de Cuba" (1786); "Prodrome de la flore du Chili avec herbier explicatif" (4 vols., 1788); and "Prodrome de la flore du Pérou avec herbier explicatif" (4 vols., 1790).

THIENPONT, Émanuel, clergyman, b. in Belgium in 1803; d. in Logan, Hocking co., Ohio, 19 Oct., 1873. He came to the United States at an early age, studied for the priesthood, and was ordained in Cincinnati on 20 Jan., 1833. He spent the following year in preparing candidates for the priesthood, was then sent to take charge of the missions along the Miami canal, and for some time had entire charge of all the Roman Catholics in the state of Ohio. He was appointed pastor of St. Mary's, Tiffin, in 1835, and afterward of the German Catholics of Dayton, and then had charge of congregations at Portsmouth, Steubenville, and other places. He was afterward sent to Logan, and formed a new congregation in the neighborhood at Straitville. Father Thienpont was the pioneer secular priest of Ohio, and was the first to build Roman Catholic churches in Dayton, Portsmouth, Steubenville, and other places in the state.

THIÉRY DE MÉNONVILLE, Nicolas Joseph, French botanist, b. in Saint-Mihiel, France, 18 June, 1739; d. in Port au Prince, Santo Domingo, in 1780. He studied law, and for some time practised his profession in his native city, but he soon abandoned the bar for botany, of which he was passionately fond. He formed a plan to naturalize the cochineal insect in the Franco-American colonies, and after landing in Santo Domingo in 1776, in order to learn how to cultivate it, he penetrated to Mexico in the disguise of a Catalonian physician, at great personal risk, as the Spaniards kept the knowledge of this branch of commerce jealously from strangers. With great difficulty he reached Oaxaca, which, he had learned, produced a finer specimen of cochineal than could be found elsewhere, learned the art of planting and raising the nopal on which the insect feeds, bought a large quantity of branches and insects, filling eight chests with them, and succeeded in forwarding them by different routes to Santo Domingo. He sent a part of his cochineals to France, and was successful in rearing and multiplying those that he retained, in the Jardin du roi, which he founded at Port au Prince. He received the title of botanist of the king soon after his return to Mexico. Shortly after his death the cochineal insect disappeared from Santo Domingo. The club of "The Philadelphes" at Cape François published a manuscript that he left, entitled "Traité de la culture du nopal et de l'éducation de la cochenille dans les colonies françaises de l'Amérique, précédé d'un voyage à Oaxaca" (Cape François, 1786).

THOBURN, James Mills, M. E. bishop, b. in St. Clairsville, Ohio, 7 March, 1836. He was graduated at Alleghany college, Pa., in 1857, and began preaching in Ohio as a Methodist minister in the same year. In 1859 he went to India as a missionary, where he was stationed successively at Nynsee Tal, Moradabad, Lucknow, and Calcutta. He preached in both the native and European languages, and built the largest church in India. He was presiding elder of the Indian conference, preached for some time at Simla, the summer capital of India, and was for five years editor of the "Indian Witness." In consequence of an injury that resulted from an accident, he returned to this country in 1886. At the general conference of the Methodist Episcopal church in New York city in 1888 he was elected missionary bishop of India and Malaysia. He has published "My Missionary Apprenticeship," being a history of twenty-five years' experience in India (New York, 1884), and "Missionary Sermons" (1888).

Thom was continuously employed on engineer and other duty on the staff of Gen. Henry W. Halleck till April, 1865, being present during the siege of Corinth. He was also present at the battle of Cedar Creek, Va. He was promoted lieutenant-colonel of engineers in 1866, and was thereafter in charge of river and harbor improvements in the New England states till 20 Feb., 1883, when, having been forty years in service, he was, at his own request, retired from active service. He became colonel of engineers in 1880, and was brevetted brigadier-general U. S. army, "for faithful and meritorious services during the rebellion."

THOM, James Crawford, artist, b. in New York, 22 March, 1835. He studied at the National academy, and in 1859 went abroad, where he studied with Édouard Frère, and then with Henri Pierre Picou and Jean Baptiste Camille Corot. His works were frequently exhibited in London, where he gained several medals and other honors at various times. Since his return to the United States in 1872 many of his pictures have found their way into private galleries in this country. Among the paintings that he executed while abroad are "By the River-Side," "Returning from the Wood," "Tired of Waiting," "Going to School," and "The Monk's Walk." The last three were exhibited at the Royal academy, London. He has shown more recently at the Academy of design,

He was first established for ten years over the Lombard street church in Philadelphia, to which, after a few years in Lowell, Mass., Brooklyn, N. Y., and Cincinnati, Ohio, he returned, remaining for seventeen years. With the Rev. Thomas B. Thayer he wrote the "Lowell Tracts," in 1840-'42, during the crusade against Universalism in Lowell, and organized "The Lowell Offering," whose sole contributors and editors were the mill-operatives. Ely (New York, 1835), and he was connected editorially with many papers of his denomination.—His wife, M. Louise Palmer, b. in Mount Holly, N. J., about 1830, is a daughter of Judge Strange N. Palmer, of Pennsylvania. She received a classical education and read Blackstone with her brother, Robert M. Palmer, who was U. S. minister to the Argentine Republic in 1861-'2. For many years, owing to the failing health of her husband, Mrs. Thomas managed a large estate near Philadelphia. This gave her an opportunity to educate eighteen children, eleven being taken from the colored orphan asylum of New York city. She has been president of the Woman's centenary association of the Universalist church since 1880, and in 1886 was elected president of Sorosis, a woman's club in New York. In 1863 he received a similar appointment in the School of design for women. During the civil war he volunteered and served as army surgeon. In 1867 he connected himself with the Hahnemann medical college of Philadelphia, of which he is now the dean. He has contributed numerous papers to medical literature, is the author of "Post-mortem Examinations and Morbid Anatomy" (Philadelphia, 1870), and general editor of the "Homœopathic Materia Medica."

He was employed in the business of manufacturing iron after 1812, and in 1839 came to this country and built the first of the furnaces of the Lehigh Crane iron company. He remained with this company till 1854, when, with his sons and others, he organized the Thomas iron company, and built two blast-furnaces at Hokendauqua. They were at the time the largest and most productive anthracite blast-furnaces in the country. Afterward other furnaces were built by the company, and successfully operated. He was one of the proprietors of the Catsauqua manufacturing company which was organized to roll plate and bar-iron, for many years served as its president, and was an owner of the Lehigh fire-brick works at Catsauqua. Mr. Thomas was the first in this country to make the manufacture of anthracite pig-iron commercially successful, and was the first person in the world fully to realize the value of powerful blowing engines in the working of blast-furnaces. He supported the cause of the Union during the civil war. In 1866 he was an unsuccessful Republican candidate for congress.

THOMAS, Edith Matilda, author, b. in Chatham, Medina co., Ohio, 12 Aug., 1854. She was educated at Geneva (Ohio) normal institute, has contributed largely to periodicals, and has published in book-form "A New Year's Masque, and other Poems" (Boston, 1885); "The Round Year" (1886); and "Lyrics and Sonnets" (1887).

THOMAS, Edward Harper, clergyman, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 11 April, 1811; d. in Lancaster, Pa., 18 Sept., 1869. He was apprenticed at the age of nine years, but succeeded by self-application under great difficulties in his early life in securing a good education. In 1830, having become a member of the Church of God, a religious denomination organized by Rev. John Winebrenner, he was ordained to the work of the ministry, and for more than twenty years served as an itinerant. In 1854 he took editorial charge of the "Church Advocate," the official paper of his church, and removed to Lancaster, Pa., where he resided until his death.—His son, Robert Harper, journalist, b. in Philadelphia, 28 Jan., 1834, received a good English education, served as aide with the rank of colonel on the staff of Gov. Andrew G. Curtin, and was commissioner of internal revenue from 1862 till 1866. In 1870 he purchased the "Valley Democrat," of Mechanicsburg, changing the name to the "Independent Journal," and subsequently to the "Farmer's Friend and Grange Advocate." He was commissioner from Pennsylvania to the World's industrial and cotton centennial exhibition at New Orleans in 1884-'5, and also to the American exposition at London in 1887.

THOMAS, Elisha Smith, P. E. Bishop, b. in Wickham, Mass., 2 March, 1834. He was graduated at Yale in 1858, and at Berkeley divinity-school, Middletown, Conn., in 1861, was ordered deacon in June, 1861, and priest soon afterward. He was at once put in charge of St. Paul's church, New Haven, where he remained three years. In 1864 he was elected rector of Seabury Hall, Fairbault, Minn., and professor of Old and New Testament exegesis there. On the resignation and removal of Dr. James L. Breck, he succeeded him in the secretaryship of the Seabury mission. He spent the year 1869 abroad, studying the Semitic languages and attending lectures on New Testament exegesis. On his return he was elected rector of St. Mark's church, Minneapolis, Minn., where he remained five years. On 1 July, 1876, he became rector of St. Paul's church, St. Paul, Minn. He was deputy from the diocese to three successive general conventions, and also a member, and for several years president, of the diocesan standing committee, trustee of the Bishop Seabury mission, and of St. Mary's Hall and the Breck mission and farm. He was instrumental in founding two missions in connection with his own parish, and built mission churches at Warsaw and Morristown. He was consecrated assistant bishop of Kansas, in St. Paul's church, St. Paul, Minn., 4 May, 1887, and received the degree of D. D. from Yale the same year.

THOMAS, Francis, governor of Maryland, b. in Frederick county, Md., 3 Feb., 1799; d. near Frankville, Md., 22 Jan., 1876. He was graduated at St. John's college, Annapolis, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1820, and began practice in Frankville. He was a member of the state house of representatives in 1822, 1827, and 1829, being speaker the last year, was elected to five consecutive congresses, serving from 5 Dec., 1831, till 3 March, 1841, was president of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal company in 1839-'40, and governor of Maryland in 1841-'4. During his canvass for the governorship he fought a duel with William Price. He was a member of the State constitutional convention in 1850, and was instrumental in having a measure adopted that weakened the power of the slave-holding counties. He was again in congress from 1861 till 1869. During the civil war Mr. Thomas supported the Union cause, raised a volunteer brigade of 3,000 men, but he refused a command. He was a delegate to the Loyalist convention of 1866, and subsequently opposed President Johnson. He was appointed collector of internal revenue for the Cumberland district, and served from April, 1870, till he was appointed minister to Peru, 25 March, 1872. He held this post till 9 July, 1875, and afterward retired to his farm near Frankville, where he was killed by a locomotive while walking on the railroad-track.

THOMAS, Gabriel, author, lived in the 17th century. He was a member of the Society of Friends, and resided in Pennsylvania and western New Jersey from 1682 till 1697. He wrote "An Historical and Geographical Account of the Province and County of Pennsylvania and of West New Jersey" (London, 1698). A lithographed fac-simile of the book was printed privately by James Austin Brady (New York, 1848).

THOMAS, Sir George, bart., royal governor of Pennsylvania, b. in England about 1705; d. in London, England, 11 Jan., 1775. He was a wealthy planter of Antigua and a member of the council of that island, and in 1737 was appointed governor of Pennsylvania. He was detained in England in defending the proprietary rights against the claims that were raised by Lord Baltimore to the jurisdiction over the lower counties of the province, and did not assume the governorship till 1738. The territorial dispute with Maryland was provisionally arranged by each governor's assuming jurisdiction over the people from his own province who were settled in the debatable district until the boundary-line should be drawn. At first he was unpopular in consequence of his arbitrary administration, especially when he attempted to use his authority to organize the militia at the beginning of the Spanish war, although the legislature had refused to vote supplies for the purpose. He roused the intense opposition of the Quakers by refusing to sign bills, but afterward he adopted a conciliatory policy, and in the end became very popular, and his resignation of the office in 1747 was received with general regret. From 1752 till 1766 he was captain-general and governor-in-chief of the Leeward and Caribbee islands. He was created a baronet, 6 Sept., 1766.

THOMAS, George Henry, soldier, b. in Southampton county, Va., 31 July, 1816; d. in San Francisco, Cal., 28 March, 1870. He was descended, on his father's side, from Welsh ancestry, and, on his mother's, from a French Huguenot family. Not much is known of his youth. He was early distinguished for the thoroughness with which he mastered everything he undertook. His home life was pleasant and genial, and he was carefully educated in the best schools and academies of the region. At the age of nineteen he began the study of law, but the next year he received an appointment as cadet at the U. S. military academy. At the academy he rose steadily in rank, from 26th at the end of the first year to 12th at graduation. He was nicknamed, after the fashion of the place, "George Washington," from a fancied resemblance in appearance and character to the great patriot. He was graduated and commissioned 2d lieutenant in the 3d artillery, 1 July, 1840, and entered upon duty at New York, but was soon sent to Florida to take part in the Indian war, where, in 1841, he gained a brevet for gallantry. After a short stay at various posts on the south Atlantic coast, he was, in the autumn of 1845, sent to Texas. When the Mexican war began, he accompanied the column under Gen. Zachary Taylor, distinguishing himself at Monterey, where he was brevetted captain, and at Buena Vista, 22 and 23 Feb., 1847, bore a more decisive part. The success of that battle was largely due to the artillery. "Without it," says Gen. John E. Wool in his report, "we would not have maintained our position a single hour." Capt. Thomas W. Sherman said: "Lieut. Thomas more than sustained the reputation he has long enjoyed as an accurate and scientific artillerist." He was again brevetted for gallantry, thus earning three brevets in a little more than six years after entering the service. The citizens of his native county in the following July presented him with a superb sword. He remained on duty in Mexico and Texas till 1849, and was again sent to Florida. In 1851 he was detailed as instructor of artillery and cavalry at the military academy, where he remained until 1 May, 1854. Soon afterward two cavalry regiments were added to the army, and of one of them, the 2d, brevet Maj. Thomas was, on 12 May, 1855, appointed junior major. In the composition of this new regiment unusual care was taken in the selection of officers. Jefferson Davis was secretary of war, and the choice was dictated not merely by ability but also by locality. Of the fifty-one officers that served in it prior to the beginning of the civil war, thirty-one were from the south, and of these twenty-four entered the Confederate service, twelve of whom became general officers. Among these were Albert Sidney Johnston, Robert E. Lee, William J. Hardee, Earl Van Dorn, E. Kirby Smith, John B. Hood, and Fitzhugh Lee.

In the seclusion of garrison life in Texas during the exciting period from 1855 to 1861, Major Thomas watched with increasing apprehension the gradual approach of the inevitable conflict. In affection for and pride in his native state he was a Virginian of the Virginians; but he never for a moment doubted where his duty lay. Early in November, 1860, he left Texas on a long leave of absence. Before its expiration he was ordered, 11 April, 1861, to take charge of his regiment, which had been treacherously surrendered in Texas, and was now arriving in New York. He obeyed the order with alacrity and conducted the regiment to Carlisle, Pa., barracks. On his way there, he heard of the assault on Fort Sumter, and on reaching the place he renewed his oath of allegiance to the United States. On the 17th the Virginia convention adopted the ordinance of secession, and Robert E. Lee, colonel of his regiment, tendered his resignation on the 20th. Hardee, Van Dorn, Kirby Smith, and Hood had already resigned. Thomas, unmoved, continued with ardor the preparations necessary to sustain the cause of his country. At the head of a brigade he soon crossed the Potomac into Virginia, where, on 2 July, he met and put to flight an insurgent militia force of his own state, under command of Col. Thomas J. Jackson, drawn up to resist his movements. From that day till the end of the war he did not have or seek a single hour's respite from exacting labors in the field. He led the advance of Patterson's column toward Winchester prior to the battle of Bull Run, and at the close of that campaign he was appointed, 17 Aug., 1861, brigadier-general of volunteers, and assigned to duty in the Department of the Cumberland, which included Kentucky and Tennessee. He found the whole of Kentucky in a turmoil, when, on 10 Sept., he entered upon his work at Camp Dick Robinson, 100 miles south of Cincinnati. The Confederate army had occupied Columbus in spite of the formal protest of legislature and governor, and Thomas was menaced with personal violence. The camp was swarming with unorganized Kentucky regiments and crowds of refugees from east Tennessee, eager to be armed and led back to drive the enemy from their homes. For the first few months Gen. Thomas was fully occupied in instructing the raw recruits. It required infinite patience to work over these independent backwoodsmen into any semblance to soldiers. Little by little the task was accomplished, and the troops so organized became the first brigade of the Army of the Cumberland.

Gen. Robert Anderson was soon relieved from duty on account of failing health, and, after a short interregnum, Gen. Don Carlos Buell was placed in command of the department. Under his orders, Gen. Thomas continued his preparations for a movement in east Tennessee. Early in January, 1862, he placed the head of his column at Somerset, fifty miles south of Camp Dick Robinson, and on the night of the 18th encamped at Logan's Cross-Roads, ten miles from the enemy's position, with seven regiments of infantry, one squadron of cavalry, and two batteries. At early dawn the next morning he was attacked by a force consisting of nine regiments of infantry, two squadrons and two companies of cavalry, and two batteries. After a stout resistance Gen. Thomas succeeded in placing one of his regiments on the flank of the enemy's line, when a charge was ordered, and the whole Confederate force was driven in confusion from the field, with the loss of its leader, Gen. Felix K. Zollicoffer. Pursuit was continued till dark, when the enemy's works were reached. During the night that followed, most of the Confederate army escaped across the river, leaving guns, small-arms, and other spoils. This contest, which is known as the battle of Mill Springs, was the first real victory for the National cause since the disaster at Bull Run, six months before. The loss was 39 killed and 207 wounded on the National side, against 125 Confederates killed and 309 wounded. Immediately afterward the whole army entered upon the movements that culminated in the battle of Shiloh and the expulsion of the Confederate armies from the entire region between the Cumberland mountains and the Mississippi. Gen. Thomas shared in all these operations. On 25 April, 1862, he was made major-general, and was assigned to the command of Gen. Grant's army, the latter being made second in general command under Halleck, and thus virtually retired from active command for the time being. Soon after the occupation of Corinth, Gen. Thomas returned to his old command, and with it went through the exhausting campaign by which, at the end of September, Gen. Buell's whole army, save the isolated garrison at Nashville, was concentrated at Louisville, prepared to give battle to Gen. Bragg, who had audaciously led his army from Chattanooga to the Ohio river. At Louisville, on 29 Sept., the command of the National army was offered to Gen. Thomas, but he declined it. On 30 Oct. Gen. Buell was superseded by Gen. William S. Rosecrans, and Gen. Thomas was placed in command of five divisions, forming the centre of the army. On 31 Dec., 1862, the contending forces, under Rosecrans and Bragg, met in bloody conflict on the banks of Stone river, near Murfreesboro, Tenn. By an impetuous and overwhelming charge of the enemy at dawn, the whole right wing of the National army was swept back three miles, and its very existence was imperilled. But the centre, under Thomas, firmly held its ground and repelled every assault till nightfall. The contest was renewed on 2 Jan., 1863, when, by a bold and fiery attack of a part of Thomas's force on the enemy's right, the Confederate position was endangered, and Bragg, in the night of the 3d, retreated. The National army lay nearly motionless until June, when it entered on that series of brilliant flanking movements which, without any serious conflict, drove the enemy from Tennessee and compelled the abandonment of Chattanooga on 8 Sept. The terrible battle of Chickamauga followed, when, on 19 and 20 Sept., the Confederate army, re-enforced by Longstreet's corps from Virginia and some troops from Mississippi, put forth almost superhuman efforts to overwhelm the National forces in detail, and thus secure, once more, the prize of Chattanooga, the gateway to the heart of the Confederacy. Again, as at Stone river, the right was swept away, carrying with it the commander of the army and two corps commanders. Gen. Thomas was thus left with but little more than six out of thirteen divisions to maintain his ground against five corps flushed with seeming victory and eager with the hope of making him an easy prey. From noon till night the battle raged. Every assault of the enemy had been repelled, the National troops were full of confidence and ardor, and the final assault of the day was made by a National brigade following up with the bayonet a retreating Confederate division. In the night, by orders of the army commander, Gen. Thomas fell back to Ross-ville, five miles, and there awaited all the next day the expected attack; but the enemy was in no condition to make it. For the only time in its history, the Army of the Cumberland left the enemy to bury its dead. Gen. Daniel H. Hill, commanding a Confederate corps in that battle, who had served in both eastern and western armies, said: "It seems to me the élan of the southern soldier was never seen after Chickamauga. That barren victory sealed the fate of the southern Confederacy."

Following this great battle, Gen. Thomas on 19 Oct. was placed in command of the Army of the Cumberland. Its affairs were in a most critical condition. All communication with its base of supplies was cut off, an almost impassable river was in its rear, from the heights of Lookout mountain and Mission ridge the enemy looked down on the beleaguered force, slowly starving in its stronghold. Immediate measures were taken for its relief, and from every quarter troops were hurried toward Chattanooga, both to open communications and to re-enforce the army for active operations. Two corps from the Potomac and two from Mississippi were speedily forwarded, and all were placed under command of Gen. Grant. To his almost despairing message to Gen. Thomas to hold the place, came the cheering reply, "We will hold the town till we starve." Thomas had then in store six days' supply for 50,000 men. Preparations were at last completed, and on 23 Nov. the forces from Mississippi, aided by a division from Thomas, attacked the northern end of Mission ridge, and gained some ground. On the 24th Lookout mountain was captured by the forces from the Potomac, strengthened by two of Thomas's brigades. On the 25th, under Thomas's leadership, the Army of the Cumberland, released from its long imprisonment, stormed and carried the three lines of rifle-pits at the base, midway, and on the summit of Mission ridge, and drove the Confederate army, in utter rout, from the fortified position it had held so confidently for two months. As the jubilant National troops reached the summit of the ridge, the whistle of the first steamboat, loaded with supplies, told that the siege was indeed ended.

In the spring of 1864 Gen. Thomas entered upon the Atlanta campaign, at the head of 65,000 veterans, being two thirds of the grand army commanded by Gen. Sherman. He occupied the centre of the line. From Chattanooga to Atlanta it was an almost continuous battle of a hundred days. The relative amount of work done by each of the three armies is indicated by the losses. The Army of the Cumberland lost, in killed and wounded, 32 per cent., the Army of the Tennessee 26 per cent., the Army of the Ohio 16 per cent. On 1 Sept., at Jonesboro', the 14th army corps of Thomas's army made a successful assault, completely driving from the field the enemy's right, and on the 2d the 20th corps, also of Thomas's command, entered Atlanta, and the campaign was ended.

When Gen. Hood placed his whole force across the railroad north of Atlanta, and, turning his cavalry loose in Tennessee, threatened to cut off supplies from Sherman's army, Gen. Thomas was sent to Nashville, while Gen. Sherman prepared for his march to the sea. At the end of October the 4th and 23d corps were sent to Tennessee, with instructions to Gen. Thomas to use them in guarding the line of the river during Sherman's absence. It was supposed that Hood would follow Sherman's army through Georgia, but it was soon found that the entire force that had confronted Sherman on his way to Atlanta was now threatening Thomas. All the available troops were concentrated, and Hood's advance was resisted to the utmost. After a series of escapes from desperate hazards, a part of the two National corps under Gen. John M. Schofield, on the afternoon of 30 Nov., 1864, at Franklin, Tenn., signally defeated the repeated assaults of Hood's army, inflicting upon it irreparable losses, including six generals killed and a large number wounded. That night the National force retired to Nashville, where it was re-enforced by a corps from Missouri and a division from Chattanooga. Hood boldly advanced to the vicinity and fortified himself. Nearly all Thomas's mounted force had accompanied Sherman, leaving all the remaining cavalry to be re-mounted. The troops from Missouri and Chattanooga were destitute of transportation. Thus in midwinter, at 200 miles from the main base of supplies, and in the presence of a bold and active enemy, he had thrust upon him a task that at any time was almost overwhelming. Some called him "slow," yet, within two weeks from the day when his unsupplied and dismounted army reached Nashville, it was ready to take the field. But Gen. Grant at City Point grew so impatient over what he considered needless delay, that he issued an order dismissing Gen. Thomas from command, and directing him to report to one of the corps commanders. After a fuller explanation of the causes of the delay, this unexampled order was suspended, but Gen. Grant himself set out for the scene of operations. A terrible storm of sleet and rain, freezing as it fell, came up on 9 Dec., rendering all movement impossible. On the 14th a thaw began. On the 15th and 16th, in exact accordance with the detailed order of battle, the confident troops of Gen. Thomas, who had never lost faith in their leader, by skilful and energetic movements, completely overthrew the last organized Confederate army in the southwest. A feeble remnant, despoiled of guns and transportation, came together some weeks later at Tupelo, Miss., nearly 250 miles distant. As an army it never again took the field.

What Gen. Thomas accomplished in this campaign, and with what means, cannot be better told than in the words of his despatch to Gen. Halleck on 21 Dec.: "I fought the battles of the 15th and 16th with the troops but partially equipped; and notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather and the partial equipment, have been enabled to drive the enemy beyond Duck river, crossing two streams with my troops without the aid of pontoons, and with but little transportation to bring up supplies of provisions and ammunition. . . . Too much must not be expected of troops that have to be reorganized, especially when they have the task of destroying a force, in a winter campaign, which was enabled to make an obstinate resistance to twice its numbers in spring and summer." Following this great victory came the operations of the cavalry as organized by Gen. Thomas in Alabama and Georgia, resulting in the taking of Selma and the capture of Jefferson Davis. But the battle of Nashville was substantially the end of the rebellion in that quarter. For it he received the appointment of major-general in the U. S. army, accompanied by the assurance of the secretary of war that "no commander has more justly earned promotion by devoted, disinterested, and valuable services to his country." He also received the thanks of congress and of the legislature of Tennessee, together with a gold medal presented to him by the latter body on the first anniversary of the battle.

With the close of the war, Gen. Thomas bent all his energies to the restoration of peace and order throughout his command. In May, 1869, he was placed in command of the military division of the Pacific, and held it until his death. Though he had seen more continuous, varied, and active service than any officer of his age and rank in the army, Gen. Thomas was emphatically a lover of peace. His whole nature and disposition were orderly, gentle, and kindly. He abhorred war, not merely because of its cruelty, but also because of the turmoil and disorder it occasioned. Though a lover of home life, he never was allowed to remain long in one place, the average length of time that he was stationed at any one post being less than five months. He enjoyed the calm and peaceful life of nature, loving trees and flowers and the open air. His range of reading was not very wide, but he was well acquainted with natural science, was a good geologist, expert in woodcraft, and well versed in botany. The museums of the Smithsonian institution contain rare and curious specimens contributed by him. In his own profession he was thoroughly trained in all departments, so that, when he was placed in command of a corps, he had had personal experience of every arm of the service. When the war ended he was the only general officer of high rank and distinction (except Sheridan and Hancock) who had served uninterruptedly in the army. He had carefully studied military and international law, and especially the constitution of the United States, and was a thorough believer in the ideas on which the government was based. No man was ever more scrupulous to subordinate the military to the civil power. The general of the army, his classmate and life-long friend, in announcing his death, said: "The very impersonation of honesty, integrity, and honor, he will stand to posterity as the beau-idéal of the soldier and gentleman. Though he leaves no child to bear his name, the old Army of the Cumberland, numbered by tens of thousands, called him father, and will weep for him in tears of manly grief." He was buried with all the honors of his rank at Troy, N. Y., on 8 April, 1870. A fine equestrian statue, in bronze, by J. Q. A. Ward, erected by the soldiers of his old army, perpetuates his appearance and features in the capital of the country. (See illustration.) His biography has been written by Thomas B. Van Horne (New York, 1882).

THOMAS, Henry Goddard, soldier, b. in Portland, Me., 5 April, 1837. He was graduated at Amherst in 1858, studied law, and was admitted to the bar. He enlisted as a private in the 5th Maine volunteers in April, 1861, and was captain in that regiment from June till August, when he was given that rank in the 11th regular infantry. He was present at the first battle of Bull Run and the action at Snicker's Gap, Va., was appointed colonel of the 2d U. S. colored regiment in February, 1863, and engaged in the actions of Bristol Station, Rappahannock Station, and Mine Run, Va. He then organized the 19th U. S. colored regiment, and became its colonel in December, 1863. In February, 1864, he was in command at Camp Birney, Md., and he led a brigade in the 9th corps, Army of the Potomac, from May, 1864, till November, being engaged at the battles of the Wilderness, Spottsylvania, Petersburg, and Hatcher's Run. He was made brigadier-general of volunteers, 30 Nov., 1864, transferred to the Army of the James, led a brigade and division in the 25th corps of that army, and temporarily commanded the corps. During the war he received the brevets of major, 12 May, 1864, for gallant and meritorious services in the battle of Spottsylvania; lieutenant-colonel, 30 July, 1864, for services at Petersburg; and colonel, brigadier-general, and major-general of volunteers, 13 March, 1865, for services during the war. He was honorably mustered out of the volunteer service in 1866, but remained in the United States army, and is now paymaster, with the rank of major. Gen. Thomas was the first regular officer to accept a colonelcy of colored troops. —His brother, William Widgery, diplomatist, b. in Portland, Me., 26 Aug., 1839, was graduated at Bowdoin in 1860. He studied law, was admitted to the bar, appointed in 1862 U. S. vice-consul at Galatz, Moldavia, and the same year U. S. consul at Gothenburg, Sweden, where he remained in charge till 1865. He was one of the board of commissioners for the settlement of the public lands of Maine in 1869, and in 1870, as commissioner of emigration for Maine, went to Sweden to recruit a colony. On his return he founded New Sweden in the forests of northern Maine, which is now one of the most flourishing agricultural settlements of New England. He was a member of the house of representatives of the Maine legislature in 1873-'5, and its speaker in 1874-'5, became a member of the state senate in 1879, and was U. S. minister to Sweden and Norway in 1883-'5. On the occasion of his presentation he addressed the king in a speech in the Swedish language. He has published "The Last Athenian," translated from the Swedish of Victor Rydberg (Philadelphia, 1869), and has now almost completed "Sweden and the Swedes," which is to be issued simultaneously in New York and Stockholm, Sweden.

THOMAS, Isaac, scout, b. in Virginia about 1735; d. in Sevierville, Tenn., in 1819. He early engaged in trading with the Indians, and about 1755 located among the Cherokees, in the vicinity of Fort Loudon. He was a man of immense strength and courage, and these qualities secured him great respect among the Indians. It is related that he once interfered in a feud between two Cherokee braves who had drawn their tomahawks to hew each other in pieces. He wrenched the weapons from their hands, when both set upon him at once, and he cooled their heated valor by lifting one after the other into the air and tossing them into Tellico river. One of these braves subsequently saved his life at the Fort Loudon massacre, of which it is said that he and two others were the sole survivors. When peace returned he again settled among the Cherokees, having his home at their capital, Echota, where, in a log-cabin, he kept the trader's usual stock of powder and lead, guns, traps, and other articles of value to the Indians. He was in high favor with Nancy Ward, the Cherokee prophetess, who was very friendly to the white settlers. She informed him early in 1776 of the hostile designs of the Indians, and on the 30th of May said to him: "Send my white brothers word to be ready, for the bolt will fall very soon, and at midnight." He sent off at once a trusty messenger to John Sevier and James Robertson at Watauga, but remained behind till the actual outbreak of hostilities. At midnight on 7 July, 1776, Nancy Ward came again to his cabin to urge his immediate departure for the settlements. At the imminent risk of his life he made the journey, and a few days later was with the little garrison of forty that repelled the attack of Oconostota on the fort at Watauga. It is questionable if Sevier could have resisted the overpowering force that was brought against him if he had not received timely warning through Isaac Thomas. Soon afterward he piloted the expedition that laid waste the Indian country, and subsequently, for twenty years, he acted as guide to Gen. Sevier in nearly all of his many campaigns against the Creeks and Cherokees. Soon after the Revolution he relinquished trade with the Indians, and settled upon an extensive farm in Sevier county. He called the settlement which grew up about his station Sevierville, in honor of his general, and the place is now one of the most beautiful localities in the state of Tennessee.

THOMAS, Isaiah, printer, b. in Boston, Mass., 19 Jan., 1749; d. in Worcester, Mass., 4 April, 1831. At the age of six years he was apprenticed to Zachariah Fowles, a ballad-printer, and was employed setting type. After eleven years' apprenticeship he travelled from the West Indies to Nova Scotia, and, returning to Boston, entered in 1770 into partnership with his former master in the publication of the "Massachusetts Spy." In three months this relationship was dissolved, and he continued the paper alone, choosing for his motto "Open to all parties, but influenced by none."

As he was a Whig, the policy of the paper gradually changed, and it became the organ of that party, publishing many spirited attacks on the British government. In 1771 Gov. Thomas Hutchinson ordered the attorney-general to prosecute Thomas; but the grand jury failed to find cause for indictment. As the Tories became more incensed against the independence of the "Spy," a few days before the battle of Lexington, in which he participated, he packed his press and types and took them by night to Worcester. His other property was destroyed. On 18 April he engaged with Paul Revere and his associates in giving information of the march of the British, and he afterward resumed the publication of the "Spy" in Worcester, where it is still (1888) published. In the year 1776-'7 it was issued in Boston. Mr. Thomas was connected with the paper until 1801. In 1786 he procured from Europe the first font of music-type that was brought to this country, and he was the first printer here to use such type. He was engaged at Walpole, N. H., in book-publishing and printing the "Farmer's Museum," and in 1788 opened a book-store in Boston under the firm-name of Thomas and Andrews, also establishing branches of his publishing business in several parts of the United States. The "Massachusetts Magazine" was published by the firm in eight volumes, from 1789 till 1796. He printed at Worcester a folio edition of the Bible (1791), Watts's "Psalms and Hymns," and most of the Bibles and school-books that were used in this country at that date. In 1812 he founded the Antiquarian society of Worcester, of which he was president and a liberal patron. He gave from his important collection nearly 8,000 volumes to its library, besides tracts, and one of the most valuable files of newspapers in the country, and he presented land and a hall, with a provision equal to $24,000 for its maintenance. The library now contains about 90,000 volumes, including the Mather collection. William Lincoln, in his "History of Worcester" (1837), says of him: "His reputation in future time will rest, as a patriot, on the manly independence which gave—through the initiatory stage and progress of the Revolution—the strong influence of the press he directed toward the cause of freedom, when royal flattery would have seduced and the power of government subdued its action." Thomas also published the "New England Almanac," which had something of the flavor of Benjamin Franklin's "Poor Richard." It appeared in 1775, and was continued under several titles until 1817. Allèghany college, Pa., gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1818. He was the author of a valuable "History of Printing" (2 vols., Worcester, Mass.). See a memoir of him by his grandson, Benjamin F. Thomas (Boston, 1874).—His nephew, Ebenezer Smith, journalist, b. in Lancaster, Mass., in June, 1780; d. in Cincinnati, Ohio, in August, 1844, learned printing with his uncle in Worcester, and in 1795 established himself as a bookseller in Charleston, S. He was in congress from 4 July, 1861, till 3 March, 1863, serving on the judiciary committee and the special committee on the bankrupt law. In 1868 he was nominated by the governor for chief justice of Massachusetts, but the nomination was not confirmed by the council. He was president of the American antiquarian society, and received the degree of LL. D. from Brown in 1853 and from Harvard in 1854. Judge Thomas published a "Digest of the Laws of Massachusetts in Relation to the Powers, Duties, and Liabilities of Towns and of Town Officers" (Worcester, 1845), and several pamphlets, including, besides the memoir of his grandfather mentioned above, "A Few Suggestions upon the Personal Liberty Law and 'Secession,' in a Letter to a Friend" (1861).—Ebenezer Smith's son, Frederick William, journalist, b. in Charleston, S. C., in 1811; d. in Washington, D. C., 30 Sept., 1866, became a cripple at the age of four years. He was educated in Baltimore, Md., where he studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1828. He became an associate editor of the "Democratic Intelligencer" in 1834, and of the "Evening Post" in 1835. From 1841 till 1850 he was a clerk in the treasury department in Washington, D. C., for which he selected a library. In 1850 he returned to Cincinnati, entered the ministry of the Methodist Episcopal church and preached in that city. Subsequently he was professor of rhetoric and English literature in the University of Alabama, and in 1858 resumed the practice of law in Cambridge, Md. In 1860 he took charge of the literary department of the Richmond "Enquirer," and afterward became editorially connected with the "South Carolinian" of Columbia. He travelled extensively through the southern states, was a successful lecturer, and occasionally took part in politics. In addition to contributions to magazines, in prose and verse, he was the author of "The Emigrant, or Reflections when descending the Ohio, a Poem" (Cincinnati, 1833); "Clinton Bradshaw, a Tale" (Philadelphia, 1835); "East and West, a Novel" (1836); "Howard Pinckney, a Novel" (1840); "The Beechen Tree, a Tale told in Rhyme, and other Poems" (New York, 1844); "Sketches of Character, and Tales founded on Fact" (Louisville, 1849); and "John Randolph of Roanoke, and other Sketches of Character, including William Wirt; together with Tales of Real Life" (Philadelphia, 1853).—Another son of Ebenezer Smith, Lewis Foulke, poet, b. in Baltimore county, Md., in 1815; d. in Washington, D. C., 26 May, 1868, assisted his brother in conducting the "Commercial Advertiser," and the "Evening Post," in Cincinnati, and, after the latter was discontinued in 1838, studied law. He then edited the "Daily Herald" in Louisville, Ky., removed in 1841 to St. Louis, Mo., and subsequently to Washington, D. C., where he practised law until his death. He was the author of "Inda, and other Poems," the first book of poetry that was published west of the Mississippi (St. Louis, 1842) and two tragedies—"Osceola," which was successfully performed in Cincinnati, St. Louis, and New Orleans (1838), and "Cortez, the Conqueror" (Washington, 1857).—Ebenezer Smith's daughter, Martha McCannon, author, b. in Baltimore, Md., 15 Nov., 1823, is the author of "Life's Lesson" (New York, 1846), and "Capt. THOMAS, Jane, heroine, b. in Chester county, Pa., in the 18th century. She was the wife of John Thomas, colonel of the Spartan regiment of South Carolina. On hearing that a large party was approaching to seize the ammunition that Gov. John Rutledge had intrusted to his keeping, Col. Thomas fled with his band of twenty-five men, taking with him a part of the powder. Two men and two women were left in charge of the house, which was attacked by the Tories. Mrs. Thomas and her companion loaded the guns for the men, and a continual firing was kept up until the assailants withdrew. It is said that the ammunition that she saved through her courage was the main supply for Sumter's command in the skirmishes at Rocky Mount and Hanging Rock.

He afterward removed to Mount Vernon, Ohio, where he committed suicide.—His great-nephew, Jesse Burgess, clergyman, b. in Edwardsville, Ill., 29 July, 1832, is the son of Jesse Burgess Thomas (1806-1850), who was for many years a judge of the circuit and supreme courts of Illinois. In 1746 he was appointed surgeon to a regiment that was sent to Annapolis Royal, Nova Scotia, and in 1747 he served on the medical staff of Gen. William Shirley's regiment, but changed this post for that of lieutenant. In 1759 he became a colonel of provincials, and was employed with his corps in Nova Scotia. In 1760 he commanded a regiment under Gen. Jeffrey Amherst at Crown Point, headed the left wing of the detachment that Amherst sent under Col. William Haviland from Lake Champlain in August, 1760, to co-operate with the other division of the army moving against Montreal, and was present at the capture of that city. He then returned to his practice in Kingston, where he remained until the beginning of the Revolution. He joined the Sons of liberty, raised a regiment of volunteers, and on 9 Feb., 1775, was appointed a brigadier-general by the Provincial congress. Being overlooked in promotion, he withdrew, but, on the receipt of letters from Gen. Charles Lee and Gen. Washington and a resolution from congress that he should have precedence of all brigadiers in the army, Gen. Thomas returned to his command. Gen. Washington in his letter to congress, under date of 10 July, 1775, said: "Gen. Thomas is much esteemed, and most earnestly desired to continue in the service; and, as far as my opportunities have enabled me to judge, I must join in the general opinion that he is an able, good officer, and his resignation would be a public loss." During the siege of Boston he commanded a brigade on the Roxbury side, nearest the British lines. On the evening of 4 March, 1776, with 3,000 men and a supply of intrenching tools, he took possession of Dorchester heights, and before dawn formidable works had been thrown up, which movement caused the British to evacuate the town on 17 March, 1776. On 6 March, 1776, he was appointed major-general. After the death of Gen. James Montgomery he was intrusted with the command in Canada, and joined the army before Quebec on 1 May; but as he found the force less than 1,000 men, 300 of whom, being entitled to discharge, refused to serve, and as the small-pox was raging among the troops, and the enemy had been re-enforced, he determined that they were not in a condition to risk an assault. The disabled soldiers were removed to Three Rivers, and the American troops retreated from one post to another until by 18 June they had evacuated Canada. Before reaching Chambly, on the river Sorel, Gen. Thomas was fatally attacked by small-pox.

THOMAS, Theodore, musician, b. in Esens, Hanover, Germany, 11 Oct., 1835. He received his musical education principally from his father, who was a violinist of ability, and at the age of six years he played the violin in public concerts. at concerts in New York city. Subsequently he joined the orchestra of an Italian opera company, and visited most of the large cities of the country. He then became first violin in the orchestra that accompanied Jenny Lind in 1850, Henrietta Sontag in 1852, and Giulietta Grisi and Giuseppi Mario in 1854, and finally became conductor of both German and Italian operas. Mr. Thomas also led the orchestras that accompanied La Grange, Piccolomini, and Thalberg through the country. Meanwhile, in 1855, with himself as first violin, Joseph Mosenthal, second violin, George Matzka, viola, Carl Bergmann, violoncello, and William Mason as pianist, he began a series of chamber music soirées which were given at Dodworth's academy, and continued for several years. In 1866 he began his summer-night concerts in Terrace garden, which were continued at the Central park garden. In order to keep his orchestra together, he travelled with it during the winter season. The Brooklyn Philharmonic society has also been under his direction almost continuously since 1862. Mr. Thomas has conducted all of the Cincinnati May festivals since 1873, also that of Chicago in 1882, and the great festival of New York that was held in the 7th regiment armory in 1882. During the summer of 1888 he gave a series of concerts in Chicago, at the close of which he disbanded his orchestra, saying that, as New York city failed to provide a suitable hall, a permanent orchestra was impossible.

THOMPSON, Alexander Ramsay, soldier, b. in 1794; d. in Manatee county, Fla., 25 Dec., 1837. His father was Alexander Thompson, who served in the artillery during the Revolutionary war, was retained as captain in the peace establishment, and attached in 1794 to the artillery and engineer corps, and after his discharge in 1802 till his death, 28 Sept., 1809, was military store-keeper at West Point. The son was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1812, and during the war with Great Britain took part in Gen. James Wilkinson's expedition down the St. Lawrence and in the defence of Plattsburg and other operations on Lake Champlain, being promoted captain of infantry on 1 May, 1814. He was retained on the reduction of the army, promoted major on 4 April, 1832, served in the Black Hawk expedition, became lieutenant-colonel on 6 Sept., 1837, and in the war with the Seminole Indians was killed at the battle of Okeechobee while leading his regiment in a desperate charge.—His nephew, Alexander Ramsay, clergyman, b. in New York city, 16 Oct., 1822, was graduated at the University of the city of New York in 1842, and at Princeton theological seminary in 1845, and was ordained, and after holding various charges became pastor of the Presbyterian church in Stapleton, Staten island, in 1851-'9, the Reformed Dutch church, 21st street, New York city, in 1862-'73, first as colleague of the Rev. George W. Bethune, then as his successor, and the North Reformed Dutch church in Brooklyn, N. Y., from the latter date to 1884. In 1885 he became acting pastor of Bethany chapel in Brooklyn. He was chaplain of the New England hospital in 1863-'5 and of the Roosevelt hospital in New York from 1873 till 1884. The degree of D. D. was conferred on him by the University of the city of New York in 1865, which made him a member of its council in 1872. Among various sermons he published "Tribute to the Memory of the Rev. George W. Bethune"; "Casting down Imaginations," a sermon (1874); "Christian Patriotism: the Points of Similarity between the Struggle for Independence in America and that of our Holland Ancestors," in "Centennial Discourses" (1876). He also assisted in compiling "Hymns of the Church" (New York, 1869), and "Hymns of Prayer and Praise" (1874).

He first exhibited at the salon in 1865, and in 1868 returned to the United States, settling in New York. He was elected an associate member of the National academy in 1873, and an academician two years later, and in 1877 became a member of the Society of American artists. He has travelled at various times in all parts of Europe, Asia Minor, and northern Africa, and his pictures cover a wide range of subjects, Oriental and American, including landscapes, genre pieces and military scenes. They include "Desolation" and "Lost in the Forest" (1872); "Annapolis in 1776," owned by the Buffalo fine arts academy, and "A Twilight in Corsica" (1875); "Review at Philadelphia, 1777" (1878); "The Market-Place in Biskra" (1884); "The Hour of Prayer"; "Returning from a Boar Hunt, Tangier"; "The Advance of the Enemy" (1885); "The Departure for the War, 1776"; and "A Sabbath-Day in Troublous Times." To the Paris exposition of 1878 he sent "The School-House on the Hill."

THOMPSON, Augustus Charles, clergyman, b. in Goshen, Conn., 30 April, 1812. He entered Yale with the class of 1835, but feeble health compelled him to leave before graduation. The college gave him the honorary degree of A. M. in 1841. He was graduated at the Hartford theological seminary in 1838, studied in the University of Berlin in 1838-'9, and on 27 July, 1842, was ordained pastor of a Congregational church at Roxbury, Mass., where he still remains. He was associated with Rev. Dr. Rufus Anderson in a deputation to the missions of the American board in India in 1854-'5, and was a delegate to the London missionary conference of 1878. THOMPSON, Cephas artist, b. in Middleborough, Mass., 1 July, 1775; d. there, 6 Nov., 1856. His profession was that of a portrait-painter, and he made yearly tours in the south, painting in all the cities from Philadelphia to New Orleans. When about fifty years of age, he settled in his home in Middleborough. Among his portraits were those of John Marshall, Stephen Decatur, David Ramsay of South Carolina, John Howard Payne, and George Washington Parke Custis, who was his pupil.—His son, Cephas Giovanni, artist, b. in Middleborough, Mass., 3 Aug., 1809; d. in New York city, 5 Jan., 1888, had some instruction from his father, but was comparatively self-taught. At the age of nineteen he began to paint portraits in Plymouth, Mass., and two years later he was working in Boston. During 1837-'47 he was in New York, and in 1852 he went to Europe, where he spent seven years in Rome. During this period he painted numerous Italian subjects, and executed some admirable copies of the old masters, notably one of "Beatrice Cenci." While in Italy he was intimate with Nathaniel Hawthorne, who complimented him in the "Marble Faun." In 1860 he settled in New York, and he was elected an associate of the National academy the following year. Before going abroad he painted the portraits of Henry W. Longfellow, Charles Fenno Hoffman (owned by the New York historical society), William Cullen Bryant, and other well-known authors. His portrait of Hawthorne has been engraved. Other works by him are "The Guardian Angels," "Prospero and Miranda," "St. Peter delivered from Prison," and "Spring and Autumn."—His two sons, who died before him, were HUBERT OGDEN, commissioner of public works, New York city, and EDMUND FRANCIS, captain in the U. S. army.—Another son of Cephas, Jerome, b. in Middleborough, Mass., 30 Jan., 1814; d. in Glen Gardner, N. J., 1 May, 1886, had also little or no regular instruction in art. He displayed artistic tastes at an early age, painted portraits for several years at Cape Cod, and at the age of seventeen went to New York, where he afterward lived and always had his studio. In 1852 he went to Europe, where he remained two years. He painted both landscapes and figures with success, his best-known works being "Reminiscences of Mount Mansfield," "The Old Oaken Bucket," "Home, Sweet Home," "Woodman, spare that Tree," "Hiawatha's Homeward Journey with Minnehaha," "The Home of My Childhood," "Comin' thro' the Rye," "The Land of Beulah," and "The Voice of the Great Spirit." Most of his works were never exhibited by him, but several of them have become well known to the public through engravings and chromos. Some of the finest of his latest works are in Paris, and others are in England.

THOMPSON, Charles C. B., naval officer, b. in Virginia in 1786; d. in Hot Springs, Va., 2 Sept., 1832. He entered the navy as a midshipman, 22 Dec., 1802, and was promoted to lieutenant, 15 Feb., 1809. During the war of 1812 he rendered distinguished service in the defence of New Orleans, where he commanded the ship "Louisiana," 8 Jan., 1815. He was promoted to master-commandant, 27 April, 1816, served at Philadelphia navy-yard in 1816-'17, commanded the frigate "Guerrière" in the Mediterranean squadron in 1818-'20, and was on shore duty at Philadelphia and Boston in 1821-'6. He was promoted captain, 3 March, 1825, and commanded the Pacific squadron in 1828-'31.

THOMPSON, Charles Lemuel, clergyman, b. in Cooperstown, Lehigh co., Pa., 18 Aug., 1839. He was graduated at Carroll college, Wis., in 1858, and at McCormick theological seminary, Chicago, in 1861, after spending two years (1859-'60) in Princeton seminary. He then entered the Presbyterian ministry, and after holding pastorates in Juneau and Janesville, Wis., Cincinnati, Ohio, Chicago, Ill., Pittsburg, Pa., and Kansas City, Mo., was called in 1888 to the Madison avenue church in New York city. He received the degree of D. D. from Monmouth college, Ill., in 1876, and in May, 1888, was moderator of the general assembly of his church in Philadelphia. Dr. Thompson was editor of "Our Monthly" in Cincinnati in 1870-'1, and in 1879-'82 of "The Interior" at Chicago, with which he is still connected as an editorial writer. Besides contributions in prose and verse to current literature, he has published "Times of Refreshing: a History of American Revivals" (Chicago, 1877).

THOMPSON, Charles Oliver, educator, b. in East Windsor Hill, Conn., 25 Sept., 1836; d. in Terre Haute, Ind., 17 March, 1885. He was graduated at Dartmouth in 1858, and then taught in the Peacham academy for six years except during a part of 1860-'1, when he devoted himself to practical work as a surveyor and civil engineer in Piermont, N. Y. In 1864 he became principal of the Cotington public high-school in Arlington, Mass. He was chosen principal of the Worcester free institute of industrial science in 1868, and, besides holding the chair of chemistry, was charged with the development of a scientific and practical course of instruction which had no recognized type in this country. After spending eight months in Europe in visiting similar institutions he returned to Worcester and established the course that has since prevailed in that institution. In founding the Rose polytechnic institute, the different technical schools of the country were carefully studied by its founder, Chauncey Rose, and the plan of the Worcester institute was given the preference. Accordingly, in 1883 Mr. Thompson was called to the presidency of the new institute, and continued to hold that place until his death. The degree of Ph. D. was conferred on him in 1870 by Dartmouth, and he was a member of scientific societies, including the American association for the advancement of science and the American institute of mining engineers. He was the author of numerous papers on technical instruction.

THOMPSON, Daniel Pierce, author, b. in Charlestown (now a part of Boston), Mass., 1 Oct., 1795; d. in Montpelier, Vt., 6 June, 1868. He was the grandson of Daniel, who was a cousin of Benjamin Thompson, Count Rumford, and was killed at the battle of Lexington. He was brought up on a farm, prepared himself for college under difficulties, taught for one winter, and then entered Middlebury college, where he was graduated in 1820. Going to Virginia as a family tutor, he studied law there, and was admitted to the bar in 1823, after which he returned to Vermont and settled in Montpelier. He was register of probate in 1824, and clerk of the legislature in 1830-'3, and was then appointed to compile the "Laws of Vermont from 1824 down to and including the Year 1834" (Montpelier, 1835). He was judge of probate from 1837 till 1840, from 1843 till 1845 clerk of the supreme and county courts, and from 1853 till 1855 secretary of state. From 1849 till 1856 he edited a weekly political paper called the "Green Mountain Freeman." He was a popular lecturer before lyceums and orator on public occasions. Mr. Thompson began to contribute poems and sketches to periodicals while he was in college, and continued to write frequently for the newspapers and magazines, besides publishing political pamphlets. He took part in the anti-Masonic controversy, and published a satirical novel on the subject, entitled "The Adventures of Timothy Peacock, Esq., or Freemasonry Practically Illustrated," which appeared under the pen-name of "A Member of the Vermont Bar" (Middlebury, 1835). In 1835 he wrote for the "New England Galaxy," of Boston, a prize tale called "May Martin, or the Money-Diggers," which was issued in book-form (Montpelier, 1835), and reprinted in London. Next appeared "The Green Mountain Boys," a romance, in which the principal men connected with the history of Vermont in the Revolutionary period are brought into the plot (Montpelier, 1840; republished in Boston and London); "Locke Amsden, or the Schoolmaster" (Boston, 1845); "Lucy Hosmer, or the Guardian and the Ghost" (1848); and "The Rangers, or the Tory's Daughter" (1851). His later romances are "Tales of the Green Mountains" (1852); "Gaut Gurley, or the Trappers of Lake Umbagog" (1857); "The Doomed Chief, or Two Hundred Years Ago," based on the story of King Philip (Philadelphia, 1860); and "Centeola, and other Tales" (New York, 1864). He was also the author of a "History of Montpelier, 1781-1860, with Biographical Sketches" (Montpelier, 1860). In later life he published monographs on topics of American history and on biographical subjects in various magazines. A novel, with the title of "The Honest Lawyer, or the Fair Castaway," was left unfinished.

THOMPSON, David, Canadian explorer, b. in the parish of St. John, Westminster, England, 30 April, 1770; d. in Longueuil, near Montreal, 16 Feb., 1857. He was educated at Christ's hospital school, London, and at Oxford, and when he was nineteen years old entered the service of the Hudson bay company. He was afterward employed in exploration, and on 27 April, 1798, discovered Turtle lake, which he claimed to be the source of the Mississippi, as it is from this spot that the river takes its most direct course to the sea. His course in reaching the head-waters of this river is well delineated on his "Map of the Northwest Territory of the Province of Canada, made for the Northwest Company in 1813-'14." He also surveyed the south shore of Lake Superior in 1798, in June, 1807, crossed the Rocky mountains by what is now known as the Howe pass, and in the spring of 1811 ascended Columbia river from the junction of Canoe river to its source, and then descended it to its mouth, where he arrived on 16 July the same year. On 27 May, 1812, he reached Red Deer lake, or Lac la Biche, which Schoolcraft, who visited it in 1832, claimed to be the true source of the Mississippi, and the same year resurveyed the north shore of Lake Superior to Sault Ste. Marie. He left the service of the Hudson bay company, 23 May, 1797, and entered that of the Northwest company, in which he was for many subsequent years a partner. From 1816 till 1826 he was engaged in surveying and defining the boundary-line on the part of Great Britain between Canada and the United States, being employed in 1817 on the St. Lawrence. Proceeding westward around the shores of the great lakes, he reached the Lake of the Woods in 1825. In 1834 he surveyed Lake Francis, in 1837 he made a survey of the canoe route from Lake Huron to Ottawa river, and a few years later a survey of Lake St. Peter. His last years were spent either in Glengarry county, Ont., or in Longueuil. Of the early explorers, few rendered more valuable services or estimated their achievements more modestly.

THOMPSON, David, Canadian member of parliament, b. in Wainfleet, Welland co., Ont., 7 Dec., 1836. His father, the son of a Scotchman, represented Haldimand from 1841 till 1851. The son was educated at Upper Canada college, and became a flour and grain merchant. He represented Haldimand in the Canada assembly from 1863 till the union, was elected to the Dominion parliament in 1867, re-elected by acclamation in 1872 and 1874, and chosen again in 1878 and 1882. He is actively connected with various financial and industrial organizations, is major of volunteers, a Liberal in politics, and favors a prohibitory liquor law.

THOMPSON, Edward R., naval officer, b. in Pennsylvania about 1808; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 12 Feb., 1879. He entered the navy as a midshipman on 1 Dec., 1826, became a lieutenant on 8 March, 1837, served during the Mexican war on the brig "Porpoise" and the frigate "Potomac" in the Gulf of Mexico, cruised on the coast of Africa in the "Porpoise" in 1851-'2, and in command of the "Dolphin" in 1856-'7, having been promoted commander on 14 Sept., 1855. He had charge of the steamer "Seminole" in the early part of the civil war, but, being unfit for further active service, was placed on the retired list on 3 Dec., 1861. On 4 April, 1867, his rank was raised to that of commodore.

THOMPSON, Edwin, reformer, b. in Lynn, Mass., in July, 1809; d. in East Walpole, Mass., 22 May, 1888. He was of Quaker descent, and early interested himself in the anti-slavery movement. At the suggestion of Wendell Phillips, he became a public speaker in its furtherance, travelling through the state, often on foot, lecturing in churches and school-houses, and winning a reputation as an orator by his fluency and great fund of anecdotes. While speaking in New Bedford, he roused Frederick Douglass to take up active work in behalf of his race. He was also interested from an early period in the temperance reform, which he did much to promote. Mr. Thompson was ordained as a Universalist clergyman in 1840, and afterward resided at East Walpole.

THOMPSON, Egbert, naval officer, b. in New York city, 6 June, 1820; d. in Washington, D. C., 5 Jan., 1881. He entered the navy as a midshipman, 13 March, 1837, served in Com. Charles Wilkes's exploring expedition in 1838-'42, and became a passed midshipman, 29 June, 1843. As executive officer of the schooner "Bonita," in the Gulf squadron during the Mexican war, he participated in the expedition against Frontera, and the capture of Tobasco, Tampico, Vera Cruz, and Tusan. His vessel covered the landing of Gen. Winfield Scott's army at Vera Cruz, and captured several prizes during the war. He served in the steamer "Michigan" on the lakes in 1847-'50, and at Philadelphia navy-yard in 1850-'1. He was commissioned a lieutenant, 27 Sept., 1850, and was in the steamer "Fulton" in 1859 when she was wrecked. When the civil war began he was attached to the steamer "Powhatan," which went to Pensacola navy-yard, and contributed to the relief of Fort Pickens. He commanded the river iron-clad steamer "Pittsburg," in the Mississippi flotilla, in which he participated in the battle of Fort Donelson, when he was obliged to run her ashore to keep from sinking. He was commended for gallantry in running the batteries of Island No. 10, for which he received the thanks of the navy department, and he took part in the attacks on Fort Madrid and Fort Pillow, and the battle with the Confederate rams. He was commissioned a commander, 16 July, 1862, served at the rendezvous at Philadelphia in 1863-'4, and commanded the steamer "McDonough" in the South Atlantic blockade in 1864-'5, and the steamer "Dacotah," of the South Pacific squadron, in 1866-'7. He was commissioned captain, 26 July, 1867, and was commandant of the naval station at Mound City, Ill., in 1869-'71. He commanded the steam sloop "Canandaigua," of the North Atlantic squadron, in 1871-'2, and was retired on 6 Jan., 1874.

THOMPSON, Elizabeth, philanthropist, b. in Lyndon, Vt., 21 Feb., 1821. She is the daughter of Samuel Rowell, a poor farmer, and at the age of nine went to aid in the household duties of a neighbor's family as a maid of all work, receiving as wages twenty-five cents a week. Her education was chiefly self-acquired, but she was remarkably handsome, and, while on a visit to Boston in 1843, so impressed Thomas Thompson, a well-known millionaire of that city, that he sought her acquaintance. Early in 1844 they were married, and until his death in 1869 spent much of their income for charitable purposes. The use of the entire income of his immense estate was then left to Mrs. Thompson. She has given large sums to the cause of temperance, and "Figures of Hell," a tract written by her and filled with much statistical information, has been widely circulated.

E. Thompson

Mrs. Thompson has given more than $100,000 toward providing with business pursuits the heads of families, hundreds of whom have been enabled to establish themselves by her bounty. Among her many charities is the gift of $10,000 which was expended by a commission authorized by congress to investigate the yellow fever. She founded the town of Long Mont, at the foot of the Rocky mountains, and gave 640 acres of land with $300 to each colonist in Saline county, Kan. Mrs. Thompson contributed largely to the purchase of the Vassar college telescope, and gave to the Concord school of philosophy the building in which its summer assemblies are held. She suggested the idea of a song-service for the poor, and incurred large expense in putting it into practical operation in many of the large cities of this country. Francis B. Carpenter's painting of the "Signing of the Emancipation Proclamation by Lincoln in the Presence of his Cabinet" was purchased by her and presented to congress. In consequence of this she was granted the freedom of the floor of the house, a right which no other woman, not even the president's wife, possesses. She gave $1,000 to the American association for the advancement of science in 1883, and was made its first patron. In 1885 she placed in the hands of a board of trustees, chosen for that purpose, $25,000, to be devoted to the advancement and prosecution of scientific research in its broadest sense. This trust, known as the "Elizabeth Thompson science fund," is to be controlled by the International scientific congress. Mrs. Thompson has agitated the question of the possibility of an international republic, or a world governed by laws emanating from an intelligent community. The value of this idea has been recognized by statesmen at home and abroad. The publication of a journal in England advocating her views has been announced by George J. Holyoake.

THOMPSON, George, English reformer, b. in Liverpool, England, 18 June, 1804; d. in Leeds, England, 7 Oct., 1878. He entered actively into the agitation against slavery in the British colonies, and contributed largely to its downfall, and subsequently to that of the apprentice system. Afterward he joined the Anti-corn-law league, and also took an active part in forming the India association. In 1834, at the request of William Lloyd Garrison and others, he came to the United States to speak in behalf of the abolition of slavery. He addressed meetings in various parts of the northern states, and his efforts led to the formation of more than 150 anti-slavery societies; but he was often threatened by mobs, and finally in Boston, Mass., escaped death only by fleeing in a small row-boat to an English vessel and going to St. John, New Brunswick, whence he sailed for England in November, 1835. Mr. Thompson's visit created such excitement that President Jackson denounced him in a message to congress. He made a second visit to this country in 1851, and another during the civil war, when a public reception was given to him in the house of representatives, at which President Lincoln and his cabinet were present. He aided greatly in preventing the recognition of the southern Confederacy by the British government. Mr. Thompson was also concerned in the work of the National parliamentary reform association. In 1847 he was chosen a member of parliament for the Tower Hamlets. About 1870 a testimonial fund was raised for him by his admirers in this country and England.

THOMPSON, George Washington, lawyer, b. in St. Clairsville, Ohio, 14 May, 1806; d. near Wheeling, W. Va., 24 Feb., 1888. He was graduated at Jefferson college, Pa., in 1824, studied law in Richmond, Va., was admitted to the bar, and began practice in his native town, but afterward removed to western Virginia. He was U. S. district attorney in 1849, and was elected to congress as a Democrat in the following year, serving from 1 Dec., 1851, till 30 July, 1852, when he resigned to accept a seat on the bench of the circuit court of his state. He was re-elected in 1860, but, declining to take the test oaths that were required by the reorganized government of Virginia, retired from public life. He had previously served on the commission that was appointed to determine the boundary between Virginia and Ohio. He was a frequent contributor to the Boston "Quarterly Review" in 1839-'42, and, besides numerous legal, political, and educational addresses, has published "Dissertation on the Historical Right of Virginia to the Territory Northwest of the Ohio"; "Life of Linn Boyd"; "The Living Forces of the Universe"

(Philadelphia, 1866); and "Deus Semper." When he was eighty years old he wrote "The Song of Eighty," a poem (printed privately, 1886).

THOMPSON, Hugh Miller, P. E. bishop, b. in County Londonderry, Ireland, 5 June, 1830. While he was yet a child his parents removed to the United States and settled in Ohio. He received his

received his academical education in the schools of Cleveland, and his theological course was taken at Nashotah House, Wis. He was ordered deacon at Nashotah, 6 June, 1852, by Bishop Kemper, and priest, in St. John's church, Portage, Wis., 31 Aug., 1856. During his diaconate he had charge of Grace church, Madison, Wis. He removed in 1853 to Maysville, Ky., but remained only one year. In August, 1854, he took charge of mission work in Portage and Baraboo, Wis., and immediately on his ordination to the priesthood he became rector of St. John's church, Portage. At Easter, 1857, he engaged in mission work in the city of Milwaukee, and organized the Church of the Atonement. In 1858 he was elected rector of St. Matthew's church, Kenosha, and after one year removed to Galena, Ill., and became rector of Grace church. In 1860 he was made professor of ecclesiastical history at Nashotah, and founded Kemper hall. In the same year he became editor-in-chief of "The American Churchman" at Chicago, and he continued in this office until the paper was merged into "The Churchman" at Hartford, Conn. In 1871 he became rector of St. James's church, Chicago, which was burned in the great fire. In January, 1872, he removed to New York and took the rectorship of Christ church and the editorship of "The Church Journal and Gospel Messenger." In 1875 he became rector of Trinity church, New Orleans, La., where he remained until he was consecrated assistant bishop of Mississippi, 24 Feb., 1883. Four years later, on the death of Bishop Green, he succeeded to his office. Bishop Thompson attended the third Pan-Anglican conference in London in 1888, and in August of that year delivered in Westminster Abbey the funeral sermon of Bishop Harris of Michigan. Hobart conferred upon him the degree of S. T. D. in 1863. He is the author of "Unity and its Restoration" (New York, 1860); "Sin and its Penalty" (1862); "First Principles" (1868); "Absolution" (1872); "Copy" (1872); "Is Romanism the Best Religion for the Republic?" (1873); "The Kingdom of God" (1873); "The World and the Logos," a volume of lectures (1885); and "The World and the Kingdom" (1888).

THOMPSON, Jacob, cabinet officer, b. in Caswell county, N. C., 15 May, 1810; d. in Memphis, Tenn., 24 March, 1885. He was graduated at the University of North Carolina in 1831, admitted to the bar in 1834, and settled in the Chickasaw country, Miss., where he practised law with success. In 1838 he was chosen to congress as a Democrat, and he served by continued re-election from 1839 till 1857, advocating the repudiation by Mississippi of part of the state bonds and opposing the compromise measures of 1850, on the ground that they were not favorable enough to the south. While he was in congress he held for some time the chairmanship of the committee on Indian affairs, and in 1845 he refused an appointment that was tendered him by the governor of Mississippi to a vacancy in the U. S. senate. President Buchanan made him secretary of the interior in 1857, and he held that office till 8 Jan., 1861, when he resigned, giving as his reason that troops had been ordered to re-enforce Fort Sumter contrary to an agreement that this should not be done without the consent of the cabinet. In acknowledging his letter the president reminded him that the matter had been decided in a cabinet meeting six days before. In December, 1860, while still in office, he had been appointed by the legislature of Mississippi a commissioner to urge on North Carolina the adoption of an ordinance of secession. In 1862-'4 he was governor of Mississippi, and afterward he served as aide-de-camp to Gen. Beauregard. In the summer of 1864 he was sent as a Confederate commissioner to Canada, where he promoted the plan to release the prisoners of war at Camp Douglas, near Chicago, and to seize that city. He has also been charged with instigating plots to burn northern cities and commit other outrages. After the war he returned to the United States. At his death an order of Sec. Lucius Q. C. Lamar to fly the National flag at half-mast over the buildings of the interior department caused much excitement at the north.

THOMPSON, James, jurist, b. in Middlesex, Butler co., Pa., 1 Oct., 1806; d. in Philadelphia, 28 Jan., 1874. After receiving a good education, he began life as a printer, subsequently studied law, and in 1829 was admitted to the bar. He was chosen to the legislature in 1832, 1833, and 1834, during the latter year serving as speaker of the house, although he was the youngest member. He was a presidential elector in 1836, voting for Martin Van Buren, in 1838 a delegate to the Constitutional convention of Pennsylvania, and in 1839 was appointed president-judge of the 6th judicial district of the state, in which office he served until 1844, when he was elected by the Democrats to congress, being re-elected in 1846 and 1848. In 1855, against his desire, he was again elected to the legislature, where he remained one term, and after that declined nominations for both the legislature and congress. In 1857 he was elected to the supreme court of the state, and served nine years as justice and six years as chief justice. On the expiration of his term he was renominated by the Democrats, but failed of an election, though running ahead of his ticket. He mingled with his judicial qualities warm affections and genial manners. His judicial opinions are found in the supreme court reports, from vol. xxx. to vol. lxxii. inclusive. After his retirement he resumed the practice of law in Philadelphia, and his death occurred suddenly while he was engaged in arguing a cause before the same court over which he had so recently presided, his opponent in the cause being his predecessor in the office of chief justice, George W. Woodward.

THOMPSON, John, political writer, b. in 1777; d. in Petersburg, Va., in 1799. He was the author of articles signed "Casca" and "Gracchus" in the Petersburg "Gazette," in which he attacked John Adams's administration, and also of letters signed "Curtius," addressed to Chief-Justice John Marshall in 1798, which were issued in book-form (1804). His life was written by George Hay.

THOMPSON, John Burton, senator, b. near Harrodsburg, Ky., 14 Dec., 1810; d. in Harrodsburg, 7 Jan., 1874. His ancestor came to Virginia from England as a captain in the royal navy. John was educated at private schools, studied law under his father, and succeeded to his extensive practice at Harrodsburg. He served as commonwealth's attorney, was chosen to the legislature in 1835 and 1836, and in 1840 was elected to congress as a Whig to fill a vacancy, serving from 7 Dec., 1840, till 3 March, 1843. He raised a company of cavalry for the Mexican war, but more than the necessary number of volunteers from his state offered themselves, and it was not accepted. He served again in congress in 1847-'51, and in the latter year, when Archibald Dixon was nominated by the Whigs for governor, Thompson, who had been a candidate for the office, was given second place on the ticket. Dixon was defeated, but Thompson was elected by a large majority, and in 1853 was sent to the U. S. senate, where he served a full term. In that body he was a member of the committees on private land-claims and pensions. Mr. Thompson was especially eminent as a jury lawyer, and was also a successful orator. His most noted political speech was that on the Cuban question. He was a man of broad culture, quiet and even reserved in manner. In politics he was a Clay Whig till the disruption of the party just before the civil war, when he became a Unionist.

THOMPSON, John Reuben, author, b. in Richmond, Va., 23 Oct., 1823; d. in New York city, 30 April, 1873. He was graduated at the University of Virginia in 1844, afterward studied law there, and settled in Richmond, with every prospect of success in his profession. But he had always been a lover of literature and a keen student of it, and these proclivities became more dominating after he had completed his education. Accordingly, in 1847, he accepted the editorship of the "Southern Literary Messenger." This magazine was a power in its day, and did no little to foster a literary spirit among the younger race of southern men. Mr. Thompson brought a great deal of zeal and energy into the editorial chair, and during the twelve years in which he successfully carried forward his literary work in connection with this monthly he imparted to it such a character as no southern magazine has ever had before or since. He did much to bring southern talent to light, and in the pages of the "Southern Messenger" Donald G. Mitchell first published his "Reveries of a Bachelor" and "Dream Life." Here too appeared the early writings of John Esten Cooke, Philip Pendleton Cooke, Paul H. Hayne, and Henry Timrod. In 1854 Mr. Thompson went to Europe in search of health. During this absence he wrote papers for the "Southern Messenger," which long afterward he collected in book-form. One copy had been sent to the author, and the edition, except this, was burned in the publishing-house. His health continued so delicate that in 1859 he resigned his editorship in Richmond and went to Augusta, Ga., where he edited the "Southern Field and Fireside." In 1863 he went abroad again in such delicate health that his friends did not expect him to reach the farther shore alive; but the sea-voyage revived him, and he rapidly improved. He chose London as his residence, where he was regularly engaged on the staff of the "London Index," and contributed to "Blackwood's Magazine." Some time after the civil war he returned home in broken health and dispirited. Finding it impossible to do anything in the way of literature in the south, he became literary editor of the "New York Evening Post," continuing as such for several years, until his health failed again. He made a last effort to restore it by going to Colorado in 1872, where he spent the winter, returning in the spring, only to die. Mr. Thompson was a polished and graceful writer, both of prose and verse, but he did his most effective work as a literary editor. Many of his lyrics are household words in the south, especially in his native state, and his influence in fostering the talents of writers that have since distinguished themselves was decided. He was greatly beloved for his genial and refined nature. Among his most admired poems are "The Burial of Latane," "The Death of Stuart," and "The Battle Rainbow."

Mr. R. Thompson

THOMPSON, Sir John Sparrow David, Canadian jurist, b. in Halifax, Nova Scotia, 10 Nov., 1844. His father was a native of Waterford, Ireland, for some time queen's printer, and subsequently superintendent of the money-order system of Nova Scotia. The son was educated at the common school and at Free-church academy, Halifax, studied law, was called to the bar in July, 1865, and appointed a queen's counsel in May, 1879. He was counsel on behalf of the U. S. government, acting with the American lawyers before the fishery commission at Halifax under the Washington treaty. He was made a member of the executive council and attorney-general of Nova Scotia on 22 Oct., 1878, and was premier and attorney-general of the same province from 25 May until 25 July, 1882, when he was appointed a judge of the supreme court. He resigned on 25 Sept., 1885, and was made minister of justice and attorney-general of Canada. He was a member of the house of assembly of Nova Scotia from December, 1877, until July, 1882. Mr. Thompson was elected to the Dominion parliament on 16 Oct., 1885, and re-elected in February, 1887. He was attached to the British commission, which arranged the fishery treaty at Washington, D. C., in 1888, and was knighted for his services on that occasion.

THOMPSON, Jonathan, merchant, b. in Sagtikos Manor, Long Island, N. Y., 7 Dec., 1773; d. in New York city, 30 Dec., 1846. He was the eldest son of Judge Isaac Thompson and Mary, daughter of Col. Abraham Gardiner. He was a merchant in the city of New York in 1795, of the firm of Gardiner, Thompson and Co., in partnership with his cousin, Nathaniel Gardiner, an officer in the Revolutionary army. They were engaged in the West India business, and had extensive warehouses in Brooklyn. Mr. Thompson had great influence in the councils of the Democratic party, being the chairman of its general committee for ten years. He was collector of direct taxes and internal revenue for the state of New York during the war of 1812-'15, and afterward, when that office was abolished, was appointed collector of customs of the port of New York, and served from 1820 to 1829. At the time of his death he was president of the Bank of the Manhattan company.

He was widely known socially, and numbered among his friends nearly all the statesmen and politicians of the country.

THOMPSON, Joseph Parrish, scholar, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 7 Aug., 1819; d. in Berlin, Germany, 20 Sept., 1879. He was graduated at Yale in 1838, studied theology for a few months in Andover seminary, and then at Yale from 1839 till 1840, when he was ordained as a Congregational minister. He was pastor of the Chapel street church in New Haven from that time till 1845, and during this period was one of the founders of the "New Englander." From 1845 till his resignation in 1871 he had charge of the Broadway tabernacle in New York city. Dr. Thompson devoted much time to the study of Egyptology, in which he attained high rank. In 1852-'3 he visited Palestine, Egypt, and other eastern countries, and from that time he published continual contributions to this branch of learning in periodicals, the transactions of societies, and cyclopædias. He lectured on Egyptology in Andover seminary in 1871, and in 1872-'9 resided in Berlin, Germany, occupied in oriental studies, took an active part in the social, political, and scientific discussions, and was a member of various foreign societies, before which he delivered addresses, and contributed essays to their publications. These have been issued under the title of "American Comments on European Questions" (New York, 1884). In 1875 Dr. Thompson went to England to explain at public meetings "the attitude of Germany in regard to Ultramontanism," for which service he was rewarded by the thanks of the German government, expressed in person by Prince Bismarck, and Dr. Thompson originated the plan of the Albany Congregationalist convention in 1852, and was a manager of the American Congregational union and the American home missionary society. He also aided in establishing the New York "Independent." Harvard gave him the degree of D. D. in 1856, and the University of New York that of LL. D. in 1868. He published "Memoir of Timothy Dwight" (New Haven, 1844); "Lectures to Young Men" (New York, 1846); "Hints to Employers" (1847); "Memoir of David Hale" (1850); "Foster on Missions, with a Preliminary Essay" (1850); "Stray Meditations" (1852; revised ed., entitled "The Believer's Refuge," 1857); "The Invaluable Possession" (1856); "Egypt, Past and Present" (Boston, 1856); "The Early Witnesses" (1857); "Memoir of Rev. THOMPSON, Joseph Peter, A. M. E. Zion bishop, b. in Winchester, Va., 20 Dec., 1818. He acquired a common-school education, and at the age of twenty was licensed as a local preacher. In 1843 he joined the New York annual conference of the African Methodist Episcopal Zion church, and he was ordained deacon in 1845 and elder in 1847. After serving as a missionary in Nova Scotia and holding pastorates in and near New York city, he was elected and ordained a bishop on 4 July, 1876, in the general conference in Louisville, Ky. Bishop Thompson organized a conference in the Bahama islands in 1878, and in 1882 was a delegate to the Methodist ecumenical council in London. He has studied and practised medicine successfully, having received his medical degree from Jefferson university in Philadelphia in 1858.

THOMPSON, Launt, sculptor, b. in Abbeyleix, Queen's co., Ireland, 8 Feb., 1833. At the age of fourteen he went to Albany, N. Y., and there entered the office of a professor of anatomy. While there he occupied his leisure hours with drawing, but later entered a medical college. When Erasmus D. Palmer, the sculptor, offered to receive him as his pupil, he gladly availed himself of the opportunity, and abandoned medicine for art. He worked in Palmer's studio for nine years, producing several portrait-busts and ideal heads of some merit, and in 1858 removed to New York city. Here, having shown a remarkable talent for medallion portraits, he found ample employment. He became an associate of the Academy of design in 1859, and three years later his bust, "The Trapper," secured his election as an academician. In 1868-'9 he was in Rome, and in 1875 he went again to Italy, remaining until 1881, in which year he returned to New York. In 1874 he was vice-president of the National academy. Among his works are "Elaine," a bust; "Morning Glory," a medallion; statues of Abraham Pierson, at Yale college (1874), represented in the accompanying illustration; Napoleon I., at Milford, Pa.; Gen. John Sedgwick, at West Point (1869); Winfield Scott, at the Soldiers' home, Washington, D. C.; Charles Morgan, in Clinton, Conn. (about 1871); and Ambrose E. Burnside, an equestrian statue, at Providence, R. I. (1887); "The Color-Bearer," at Pittsfield, Mass.; a medallion portrait of John A. Dix, made for the sanitary fair; and portrait-busts of William C. Bryant, in the Metropolitan museum, New York; James Gordon Bennett, the elder; Robert B. Minturn; Capt. Charles H. Marshall; Edwin Booth as "Hamlet"; Stephen H. Tyng (1870); and Charles L. Elliott and Samuel F. B. Morse (1871). Yale conferred on him the honorary degree of M. A. in 1874.

THOMPSON, Lewis O, clergyman, b. in Bergen, Norway, 13 March, 1839; d. in Henry, Ill., 16 July, 1887. He came with his parents in boyhood to Chicago, Ill., was graduated at Beloit in 1863, and at Union theological seminary, New York city, in 1866, and after being licensed to preach, and becoming, in 1866, a professor at Northwestern university, Watertown, Wis., he was ordained to the ministry of the Presbyterian church, 28 Jan., 1869. In the spring of that year he became president of Northwestern university, and in 1875 he became pastor of a church in Peoria, Ill., but in July, 1882, failing health forced him to resign. After 1886 he was in charge of a church at Henry, Ill., till his death by drowning. He published "The Presidents and their Administrations" (Indianapolis, Ind., 1873); "Nothing Lost" (New York, 1876); "The Prayer-Meeting and its Improvement" (Chicago, 1878); "How to conduct Prayer-Meetings" (Boston, 1879); and "Nineteen Christian Centuries in Outline" (Chicago, 1882); and left several uncompleted works.

THOMPSON, Maurice, author, b. in Fairfield, Ind., 9 Sept., 1844. His parents, who were southerners, removed to Kentucky, and thence to the hill-region of northern Georgia. The son was educated by private tutors, and early became interested in the study of out-door life. He served through the civil war in the Confederate army, and at its close went to Indiana, became a civil engineer on a railway survey, and in due season rose to be chief engineer. He then studied law, and opened an office at Crawfordsville. He was elected in 1879 to the legislature, and appointed in 1885 state geologist of Indiana and chief of the department of natural history. He has written much for periodicals, and has published in book-form "Hoosier Mosaics" (New York, 1875); "The Witchery of Archery" (1878); "A Tallahassee Girl" (Boston, 1882); "His Second Campaign" (1882); "Songs of Fair Weather" (1883); "At Love's Extremes" (1885); "Byways and Bird Notes" (1885); "The Boys' Book of Sports" (1886); "A Banker of Bankersville" (1886); "Sylvan Secrets" (1887); "The Story of Louisiana," in the "Commonwealth Series" (1888); and "A Fortnight of Folly" (New York, 1888).

THOMPSON, Merriwether Jeff, soldier, b. in Harper's Ferry, Va., 22 Jan., 1826; d. in St. Joseph, Mo., in July, 1876. He was educated in the common schools, was mayor of the city of St. Joseph, Mo., in 1859, and was appointed brigadier-general in the Missouri state guards early in 1861, and in the Confederate army in October of that year. He was a most successful scout and partisan officer, and achieved frequent successes by strategy and daring against greatly superior forces. He was held in high regard by Gen. Sterling Price and Gen. Leonidas Polk, under both of whom he served. He recruited his command personally, and, as a rule, clothed, armed, and subsisted them without expense to the Confederate government. He was the inventor of a hemp-break, which is now in general use, and an improved pistol-lock. He surveyed, as civil engineer, the greater part of the Hannibal and St. Joseph railroad and parts of the Kansas and Nebraska road.

THOMPSON, Richard Wigginton, secretary of the navy, b. in Culpeper county, Va., 9 June, 1809. He received a good education, and removed in 1831 to Kentucky, whence, after serving as a store-keeper's clerk in Louisville, he went to Lawrence county, Ind. There he taught for a few months, and then returned to mercantile business, at the same time studying law at night. He was admitted to the bar in 1834, began to practise in Bedford, Ind., and served in the lower house of the legislature in 1834-'6, and in the upper house in 1836-'8. He was for a short time president, pro tempore, of the state senate, and acting lieutenant-governor. He was a presidential elector on the Harrison ticket in 1840, zealously supporting Gen. Harrison in public speeches and by his pen, served in congress in 1841-'3, having been chosen as a Whig, and was a defeated candidate for elector on the Clay ticket in 1844. He served again in congress in 1847-'9, declining a renomination, and also refused the Austrian mission, which was offered him by President Taylor, the recordership of the land-office, which Fillmore tendered him, and a seat on the bench of the court of claims, which President Lincoln urged him to accept. He was again a presidential elector, on the Republican ticket, in 1864, and delegate to the National conventions of that party in 1868 and 1876. In the latter he nominated Oliver P. Morton for the presidency. In 1867-'9 he was judge of the 18th circuit of the state. On 12 March, 1877, Mr. Thompson entered President Hayes's cabinet as secretary of the navy, and he served nearly through the administration, resigning in 1881 to become chairman of the American committee of the Panama canal company. He is also a director of the Panama railroad. He has written many political platforms, and obtained a reputation for his ability in formulating party-principles. He has published "The Papacy and the Civil Power" (New York, 1876), and a "History of the Tariff" (Chicago, 1888).

THOMPSON, Robert Ellis, educator, b. in Lurgan, Ireland, in the spring of 1844. Coming to this country in his thirteenth year, he settled with his parents in Philadelphia, and, entering the University of Pennsylvania, was graduated in 1865, and in 1868 received the degree of A. M. In 1867 he was licensed to preach by the Reformed presbytery of Philadelphia, and in 1868 was chosen professor of Latin and mathematics in the University of Pennsylvania. He became professor of social science in 1871, and in 1881 professor of history and English literature, which chair he still holds. Since 1870 he has given instruction in political economy, and he is well known as an advocate of protection to home industry. In 1884-'5 he lectured at Harvard on protection and the tariff, and in 1886-'7 he delivered a similar course at Yale. In 1870 he became editor of the "Penn Monthly," then newly established, and continued such for ten years. In 1880 a weekly supplement of notes on current events was begun, which in October of that year was expanded into "The American," a weekly journal of literature, science, the arts, and public affairs, which is still published in Philadelphia under his editorship. In 1883-'5 he edited the first two volumes of the "Encyclopædia Americana," a supplement to the ninth edition of the "Encyclopædia Britannica," but, his health failing, he was obliged to resign the remaining two volumes to other hands. In 1870 Hamilton college conferred on him the degree of Ph. D., and in 1887 he received that of S. T. D. from the University of Pennsylvania. Prof. Thompson is the author of "Social Science and National Economy" (Philadelphia, 1875; revised ed., 1876; partly rewritten, under the title of "Elements of Political Economy," 1882), and "Protection to Home Industry," his Harvard lectures (New York, 1886).

THOMPSON, Smith, jurist, b. in Stanford, Dutchess co., N. Y., 17 Jan., 1768; d. in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., 18 Dec., 1843. He was graduated at Princeton in 1788, studied law with Chancellor James Kent in Poughkeepsie, teaching part of the time, and was admitted to the bar in 1792. He practised for some time in Troy, but, on the removal of Chancellor Kent from Poughkeepsie to New York, Mr. Thompson returned to the former place. In 1800 he was chosen to the legislature, and in 1801 he was a delegate to the State constitutional convention. In the latter year he was appointed attorney for the middle district of New York, but declined. From 1802 till 1814 he was associate justice of the state supreme court, meanwhile declining the mayoralty of New York city, and in the latter year he became chief justice, which post he held till he was called in 1818 to the portfolio of the navy in President Monroe's cabinet. In 1823 he was raised to the bench of the U. S. supreme court, to succeed Judge Brockholst Livingston, where he remained till his death. Judge Thompson was interested in many benevolent enterprises, and at the time of his death was the oldest vice-president of the American Bible society. He made a reputation for sound legal learning on the bench of his native state, which he sustained in the U. S. supreme court. His funeral sermon, which was delivered by Rev. A. M. Mann, in the Reformed Dutch church, Poughkeepsie, was published in pamphlet-form (Poughkeepsie, 1844). The vignette of Judge Thompson is copied from the original painting by Asher B. Durand. Yale and Princeton gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1824 and Harvard in 1835.

THOMPSON, Thomas, philanthropist, b. in Boston, Mass., 27 Aug., 1798; d. in New York city, 28 March, 1869. He was graduated at Harvard in 1817, and studied divinity under William Ellery Channing, but abandoned it to devote himself to the fine arts. His first collection of pictures, which was said to be the finest in Boston at that time and valued at $92,000, was destroyed in the burning of Tremont Temple in 1852. He gathered another collection worth $500,000, and, besides this, possessed property valued at nearly $1,000,000. He had bequeathed this to form a fund the income of which should be used to aid poor needle-women of Boston, but because his property was taxed in that city at what he thought an exorbitant rate, he removed to New York about 1860, cancelled his will, and made another in favor of the needle-women of Brattleboro', Vt., and Rhinebeck, N. Y. Mr. Thompson's mode of life was eccentric, and it is said that before his removal from Boston he had never travelled on a steamboat or a railroad.

THOMPSON, Thomas W., senator, b. in Boston, Mass., 15 March, 1766; d. in Concord, N. H., 1 Oct., 1821. He was graduated at Harvard in 1786, studied law, was admitted to the bar, and practised in Salisbury from 1790 till 1810, when he removed to Concord. He was a member of the state house of representatives, and its speaker in 1813-'14, served in congress in 1805-'7, and was treasurer of his state in 1809. He was appointed U. S. senator to fill the unexpired term of Nicholas Gilman, deceased, and served from 19 Sept., 1814, till 3 March, 1817.—His grandson, John Leverett, soldier, b. in Plymouth, N. H., 2 Feb., 1835; d. in Chicago, Ill., 31 Jan., 1888, was the son of William C. Thompson. He studied at Dartmouth and Williams, and read law in Worcester, Mass., and Poughkeepsie, N. Y., and then at Harvard law-school, where he was graduated in 1858. He was admitted to the bar at Worcester, and continued his studies in Berlin, Munich, and Paris. In 1860

he settled in Chicago, and at the opening of the civil war enlisted as a private of artillery. He rose to be corporal, and was made lieutenant in the 1st Rhode Island cavalry, in which he was commissioned captain, 3 Dec., 1861; major, 3 July, 1862; lieutenant-colonel on 11 July; and colonel on 4 Jan., 1863. In March, 1864, he took command of the 1st New Hampshire cavalry. He served first with the Army of the Potomac, and in 1864 with Sheridan in the Shenandoah valley, taking part in many engagements, and at the close of the war received the brevet of brigadier-general of volunteers. In 1866 he formed a law-partnership with Norman Williams. Gen. Thompson was connected with the work of the Citizens' association, and was president of the Union league club of Chicago.

THOMPSON, Waddy, lawyer, b. in Pickensville, S. C., 8 Sept., 1798; d. in Tallahassee, Fla., 23 Nov., 1868. He was graduated at South Carolina college in 1814 and admitted to the bar in 1819. He was a member of the legislature from 1826 till 1830, when he became solicitor of the western circuit. During the nullification excitement in 1835 he was elected by the legislature brigadier-general of militia. From 1835 till 1841 he was a member of congress, and was active in debate as a leader of the Whig party, and serving in 1840 as chairman of the committee on military affairs. In 1842 he was appointed minister to Mexico. During his mission, he made two important treaties, and procured the liberation of more than 200 Texan prisoners, many of whom were sent home at his own charge. On his return he published "Recollections of Mexico," which is valuable as a calm estimate of that country written on the eve of the war with the United States (New York, 1846). He was a cotton-planter in Florida, but spent most of his time after his return from Mexico on his estate near Greenville, S. C.

THOMPSON, William, soldier, b. in Ireland about 1725; d. near Carlisle, Pa., 4 Sept., 1781. He emigrated to Pennsylvania, and in the French and Indian war was captain of a troop of mounted militia. When a battalion of eight companies was recruited in Pennsylvania, after the fight at Lexington, he was placed in command, with the rank of colonel. They were the first troops that were raised on the demand of the Continental congress, and they arrived at the camp in Cambridge, Mass., before 14 Aug., 1775. On 10 Nov. this regiment drove back a British landing-party at Lechmere point. Thompson was made a brigadier-general on 1 March, 1776, and on 19 March he relieved Gen. Charles Lee of the command of the forces at New York. In April he was ordered to Canada to re-enforce Gen. John Thomas with four regiments, which were afterward increased to ten. He met the remnant of the Northern army on its retreat from Quebec, and assumed the chief command while Gen. Thomas was sick, yielding it up on 4 June to Gen. John Sullivan, by whose orders, two days later, he made a disastrous attack on the enemy at Trois Rivières. He was there taken prisoner, and in August returned to Philadelphia on parole, but was not exchanged for two years.

THOMPSON, William Tappan, humorist, b. in Ravenna, Ohio, 31 Aug., 1812; d. in Savannah, Ga., 24 March, 1882. His father was a Virginian and his mother a native of Dublin, Ireland, and the son was the first white child that was born in the Western Reserve. He lost his mother at the age of eleven, and removed to Philadelphia with his father, who died soon afterward, and the lad entered the office of the Philadelphia "Chronicle." This he left to become secretary to James D. Wescott, territorial governor of Florida, with whom he also studied law, but in 1835 he went to Augusta, Ga., and became associated with Judge Augustus B. Longstreet in editing the "States Rights Sentinel." He served as a volunteer against the Seminoles in 1835-'6, and in the autumn of the latter year established at Augusta the "Mirror," the first purely literary paper in the state. It was not a financial success, and was merged in the "Family Companion" at Macon, whither Mr. Thompson removed. Afterward he conducted the "Miscellany" in Madison, Ga., to which he contributed his "Major Jones Letters," which first won him a reputation, and which were afterward collected in book-form as "Major Jones's Courtship" (Philadelphia, 1840; unauthorized ed., entitled "Raney Cotten's Courtship, by Major Joseph Jones"). In 1845 he became associated with Park Benjamin in the publication at Baltimore of the "Western Continent," a weekly, of which he was afterward sole editor and proprietor, but he sold it in 1850, and, removing to Savannah, founded the "Morning News," with which he remained connected till his death. During the civil war he was aide to Gov. Joseph E. Brown, and in 1864 he served in the ranks as a volunteer. He was at one time one of the wardens of the port of Savannah, sat in the State constitutional convention of 1877, and was a delegate to the National Democratic convention of 1868. His political editorials were forcible and often bitter, but in private life he was simple and genial. His humorous works at one time were widely popular. Besides the one mentioned above, they include "Major Jones's Chronicles of Pineville" (1843; new and unauthorized ed., entitled "Major Jones's Georgia Scenes"); "Major Jones's Sketches of Travel" (1848); "The Live Indian," a farce; and a dramatization of "The Vicar of Wakefield," which was produced with success in this country and abroad. He also edited "Hotchkiss's Codification of the Statute Laws of Georgia" (1845). After his death another collection of his sketches was published by his daughter, Mrs. May A. Wade, with the title "John's Alive, or the Bride of a Ghost, and other Sketches" (Philadelphia, 1883).

THOMPSON, Zadoc, naturalist, b. in Bridgewater, Vt., 23 May, 1796; d. in Burlington, Vt., 19 Jan., 1856. He was graduated at the University of Vermont in 1823, and became a tutor there in 1825. In addition to his teaching, he edited in 1828 the "Iris and Burlington Literary Gazette," and in 1832 "The Green Mountain Repository." He issued an almanac as early as 1819, and subsequently made the astronomical calculations for the "Vermont Registers," also for thirty-four years those of "Walton's Registers." He removed in 1833 to Hatley, Canada, and then to Sherbrooke, where he taught, and, after studying theology, was in 1835 made a deacon in the Protestant Episcopal church. He returned to Burlington, Vt., in 1837, and was given a chair in the Vermont Episcopal seminary. Subsequently in 1845-'8 he held the office of state geologist of Vermont and gathered in Burlington a collection of more than 3,000 specimens of the productions of the state, which on his death became the property of the university. In 1851 he was called to the professorship of chemistry and natural history in the University of Vermont, and in 1853 he was directed to make a survey of the state, including its physical geography, geology, mineralogy, botany, and general zoölogy, upon which he was engaged at the time of his death. He was sent as a commissioner from Vermont to the World's fair in London in 1851, and exhibited a collection of American woods, classified according to their useful properties, for which he received a bronze medal. In June, 1850, he delivered the annual address before the Boston society of natural history on the "Geology of Vermont." Besides several text-books, Prof. Thompson published "Gazetteer of the State of Vermont" (Montpelier, 1824); "History of the State of Vermont to 1832" (Burlington, 1833); "History of Vermont, Natural, Civil, and Statistical" (1841-'53); "Guide to Lake George, Lake Champlain, Montreal, and Quebec" (1845); and the "Geography and Geology of Vermont" (1848).

THOMSON, Alexander, jurist, b. in Franklin county, Pa., 12 Jan., 1788; d. in Chambersburg, Pa., 2 Aug., 1848. He was the son of Archibald Thomson, a soldier in the war of the Revolution. His parents having died when he was a child, he was apprenticed at the age of fifteen to his uncle, Andrew Thomson, a sickle-maker. Meanwhile he found time for private study, and at the end of his apprenticeship had a fair knowledge of Latin and Greek, and English literature. His attainments came under the notice of the Rev. Mr. Grier, father of Justice Robert C. Grier of the U. S. supreme court, whose family he entered as tutor, at the same time pursuing his own studies. At the end of three years he left Northumberland for Bedford, where he taught, and studied law. After his admission to the bar he rose rapidly in his profession, was elected to the Pennsylvania house of representatives, and afterward chosen to congress to fill a vacancy, serving from December, 1824, till his resignation in May, 1826. During his term he gave much attention to the interests of the District of Columbia, in recognition of which his portrait was placed in the Washington city-hall. After his resignation he was appointed city judge of Lancaster, and soon afterward president-judge of the 16th judicial district, which post he occupied until 1838. Judge Thomson was also professor in the law-school of Marshall college, Lancaster, Pa. —His son, William, surgeon, b. in Chambersburg, Pa., 28 Jan., 1833, was educated in the Academy of Chambersburg and under private tutors, and was graduated at Jefferson medical college in 1855. Soon afterward he had a lucrative practice at Lower Merion, near Philadelphia, which he relinquished in 1861 in order to enter the regular army as assistant surgeon. He was with the Army of the Potomac throughout the civil war, either in the field or at Washington. For his services after the battle of South Mountain he received the thanks of President Lincoln. He originated two reforms for improving the medical field service: the system of brigade supplies, and the division hospital system. Both these reforms were extended to all the armies by the war department. He was raised to the post of medical inspector of the Department of Washington in 1864, received two brevets, and after the war was sent to Louisiana, but he resigned from the army, 25 Feb., 1866. Dr. Thomson introduced the local use of carbolic acid as a disinfectant in the treatment of wounds, published an article on the treatment of hospital gangrene by bromine, and was the first, in conjunction with Dr. William F. Norris, successfully to apply the negative process of photography by wet collodion in clinical microscopy. The Army medical museum has been largely indebted to Dr. Thomson for its success, and in its catalogue he is mentioned as the largest contributor both of papers and specimens. Since his retirement from the army Dr. Thomson has practised his profession in Philadelphia. He was elected vice-president of the ophthalmological section of the International medical congress that met in Philadelphia in 1876, has lectured at Wills hospital on diseases of the eye for many years, and was elected its emeritus surgeon in 1877. He has been clinical lecturer on diseases of the eye and ear in Jefferson medical college since 1873, and ophthalmic surgeon to the college hospital since 1877. Among his important contributions to medical literature are a series of papers published in the "American Journal of the Medical Sciences," in conjunction with Dr. S. Weir Mitchell, on the use of the ophthalmoscope in the diagnosis of intracranial tumors, and clinical reports of cases of severe and prolonged headache, dependent upon astigmatism, which have been relieved by the correction of optical defects. He revised the section on diseases and injuries of the eye in Dr. Samuel D. Gross's "System of Surgery," and has invented a new method of diagnosing and correcting ametropia by means of a simple instrument, which is now in general use among ophthalmological surgeons in this country and Europe.—Alexander's youngest son, Frank, railway superintendent, b. in Chambersburg, Pa., 5 July, 1841, was educated at Chambersburg academy, and in 1858 began to learn the railway business in the Pennsylvania railroad company's shops at Altoona. Col. Thomas A. Scott appointed him to a responsible position in the U. S. military railway system early in 1861, and he was sent to Alexandria, Va., where he assisted in rebuilding bridges and restoring shops, machinery, and rolling stock. On 1 July, 1862, he was transferred to Gen. Don Carlos Buell's army, but, after accompanying it during its march through Kentucky, he returned to the Army of the Potomac. He was then engaged in directing the lines of railroad that played an important part in the Antietam campaign, and was subsequently made assistant superintendent of the lines south of Aquia creek. He co-operated with Col. Scott in removing the 11th and 12th corps, with their full equipment of artillery and wagons, to Chattanooga, and was afterward given control of the lines south of Nashville, which he rendered capable of transmitting sufficient reinforcements and supplies to relieve the National army from its embarrassments, and enable it to assume the offensive. He resigned from the military service in 1864, and on 1 June of that year became superintendent of the eastern division of the Philadelphia and Erie railroad. While holding this office he organized a system of track-inspection which was adopted by the entire road, and made improvements in the construction of the roadway. In 1873 he was made superintendent of motive power on the Pennsylvania railroad, and in 1874 became its general manager.

THOMSON, Charles, patriot, b. in Maghera, County Derry, Ireland, 29 Nov., 1729; d. in Lower Merion, Montgomery co., Pa., 16 Aug., 1824. He was brought to this country with three other brothers by his father in 1740. The father died just in sight of land, and the young Thomsons were thrown on their own resources when they landed at New Castle, Del. An elder brother, who had emigrated before them, gave them such aid as he could, and persuaded a countryman, Dr. Francis Allison, to take Charles into his seminary in New London, Pa. Here he made rapid progress, and while yet little more than a boy he was chosen to conduct a Friends' academy at New Castle. He often visited Philadelphia, met Benjamin Franklin there, and was brought to the notice of many other eminent men. His reputation for veracity was spread even among the Indian tribes, and when the Delawares adopted him into their nation in 1756 they called him in their tongue "man of truth." Rev.

Ashbel Green, in his autobiography, says that it was common to say that a statement was "as true as if Charles Thomson's name was to it." He was one of the first to take his stand with the colonists, and he exercised immense influence, owing to the confidence of the people in his ability and integrity. He traveled through the country ascertaining the wishes of the farmers, and trying to learn whether they would be equal to the approaching crisis. "He was the Sam Adams of Philadelphia," said John Adams, "the life of the cause of liberty." He had just come to Philadelphia in September, 1774, with his bride, a daughter of Richard Harrison, of Pennsylvania, when he learned that he had been unanimously chosen secretary of the 1st Continental congress. "He was the soul of that political body," says Abbé Robin, the chaplain of Rochambeau. He would receive no pay for his first year's services, and congress presented his wife with a silver urn, which is still preserved in the family. He remained in this post under every congress up to 1789, not only keeping the records but taking copious notes of its proceedings and of the progress of the Revolution. When he retired into private life he made these notes the basis of a history of the Revolution, but he destroyed the manuscript some time before his death, as he feared that a description of the unpatriotic conduct of some of the colonists at that period would give pain to their descendants. Mr. Thomson wrote "An Enquiry into the Causes of the Alienation of the Delaware and Shawanese Indians, etc., with Notes by the Editor on Indian Customs" (London, 1759), and "The Holy Bible, containing the Old and New Covenant, commonly called the Old and New Testament; translated from the Greek [the Old Covenant from the Septuagint]" (4 vols., Philadelphia, 1808). This work is now very rare. It contained the first English version of the Septuagint that had been published at the time, and was considered by biblical scholars in Great Britain to have reflected high honor on American scholarship. His own copy of this translation, with his last manuscript corrections, is in the Philadelphia library. He also published "A Synopsis of the Four Evangelists, or a Regular History of the Conception, Birth, Doctrine, Miracles, Death, Resurrection, and Ascension of Jesus Christ, in the Words of the Evangelists" (Philadelphia, 1815), and left in manuscript "Critical Annotations on Gilbert Wakefield's Works," which were presented in 1832 by John F. Watson to the Massachusetts historical society.—His relative, William, soldier, b. in Pennsylvania in 1727; d. in Sweet Springs, Va., 22 Nov., 1796, is said in some Irish biographies to be the brother of Charles, to have been born in Maghera, Ireland, about 1726, and about fourteen years old when he arrived in this country. He was taken to South Carolina by some friends of his family, was brought up as a frontiersman, and became famous in the district for his skill with the rifle. He fought against the Regulators in 1771, at the head of a regiment under

Gov. William Tryon. He was sheriff of Orangeburg in 1772, and was elected a member of the first provincial legislature, and the first state convention. He was appointed colonel in 1775 of the 3d South Carolina regiment, which was known as the Rangers. His soldiers were all skillful marksmen, and he dispersed the guerillas of Gen. Robert Cunningham, the Tory leader. He fought at its head at Charleston in 1776, driving the English back from the eastern side of Sullivan's island, and was formally thanked for this service by Gov. John Rutledge and congress. He also served with Gen. Robert Howe in Georgia, was engaged with his command in the attack on Savannah under Count d'Estaing and Gen. Benjamin Lincoln, and was taken prisoner after the capture of Charleston. He served afterward under the command of Gen. Nathanael Greene. He displayed the greatest bravery during the war, and at the end of it was broken both in health and fortunes. He was elected sheriff of Orangeburg a second time, and was a member of the State constitutional convention. Thomson was engaged in the occupation of an indigo-planter until 1786, when, seeking to benefit his declining health, he visited the mineral springs in Virginia, where he died.

THOMSON, Charles West, poet, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., in 1798; d. in York, Pa., 17 April, 1879. He was of Quaker parentage, but became a minister of the Protestant Episcopal church, and in 1849 he was appointed rector of the church in York, Pa., which post he resigned in 1866. His principal works are "The Limner," prose sketches (Philadelphia, 1822); "The Phantom Barge, and other Poems" (1822); "Ellinor, and other Poems" (1826); "The Sylph, and other Poems" (1828); and "The Love of Home, and other Poems" (1845). He was also a contributor to periodicals.

THOMSON, Edward, M. E. bishop, b. in Portsea, part of Portsmouth, England, 12 Oct., 1810; d. in Wheeling, W. Va., 21 March, 1870. When he was seven years old his parents emigrated to the United States and settled in Wooster, Ohio. His father was a druggist, and this directed Edward's attention to the study of medicine, which he pursued at the University of Pennsylvania. He united with the Methodist church, 29 April, 1832, the next year was licensed to exhort, and in the following July was recommended for admission into the annual conference. He was received in September and united with his former pastor upon the Norwalk circuit. From the first his great abilities were apparent. In 1836 he was stationed at Detroit, where Lewis Cass, governor of the state, though a Presbyterian, was among his hearers. While there he married a daughter of Mordecai Bartley, member of congress, and afterward governor of the state. In 1837 he became principal of a seminary at Norwalk, where his success was so great that in 1843 he was offered the chancellorship of Michigan university, and the presidency of Transylvania college. In 1844 he was elected editor of the "Ladies' Repository" by the general conference. He was re-elected to this post in 1848, but was immediately called to the presidency of Ohio university, where he remained until 1860, when he was elected editor of the "Christian Advocate." Here he remained for four years, successful in spite of much opposition. In 1864 he was elected bishop, which office he filled until his death. He attained high rank as a lecturer and editor, and wrote much for periodicals and papers. He was a profound student, very absent-minded, and preferred the seclusion of a college to the episcopal office; but, notwithstanding this, he was among the most eminent of those that have filled it. Indiana Asbury (now De Pauw) university gave him the degree of D. D. in 1846, and Wesleyan that of LL. D. in 1855. Bishop Thomson published "Educational Essays" (new ed., Cincinnati, 1856); "Moral and Religious Essays" (1856); "Biographical and Incidental Sketches" (1856); "Letters from Europe" (1856); and "Letters from India, China, and Turkey" (2 vols., 1870).

THOMSON, Elihu, electrician, b. in Manchester, England, 29 March, 1853. He came to this country in 1858, and was graduated at the Central high-school in Philadelphia in 1870. He studied chemistry in an analytical laboratory, but was soon called to assist in the chemical department of the high-school, which place he held until 1876, when he was made full professor of chemistry and physics in that institution. Meanwhile, in 1875, he had been chosen professor of chemistry in the Artisan's night-school in Philadelphia, and during the winter of 1876-'77 he began a series of lectures on electricity at the Franklin institute. For several years he studied very closely the subject of electricity, with its special application to artificial illumination, and in 1880 he was appointed electrician to the American electric company of New Britain, Conn. He at once devoted himself to inventing, and nearly 200 patents relating to arc lighting, incandescent lighting, motor work, induction systems, and similar applications have resulted. For the development of these inventions the Thomson-Houston electric company was organized, and located its plant in Lynn, Mass. Prof. Thomson has also invented the system of electric welding, which he placed in the hands of a corporation, and it has now become an established industry. He is a member of the American philosophical society and the American academy of arts and sciences, and vice-president of the American institute of electrical engineers, and has contributed technical papers to the societies of which he is a member.

THOMSON, Frederick Bordine, missionary, b. in New Brunswick, N. J., 5 Nov., 1809; d. in Berne, Switzerland, 3 March, 1847. He was graduated at Rutgers in 1831, and at New Brunswick theological seminary in 1834, and in 1837 sailed for Singapore as a missionary of the Dutch Reformed church. He remained there till 1839, was then in Batavia, Java, till 1841, and afterward in Karangan, Borneo, till 1846, when feeble health forced him to leave his post. He published a "Dyak Hymn-Book," the first printed book in that language (1844), and "Brown's Catechism" in Dyak (1845), and translated into the same tongue the gospel of St. Matthew and the first twenty chapters of Genesis. He left an unfinished work on "The Economy of Missions."

THOMSON, James Bates, educator, b. in Springfield, Vt., 21 May, 1808; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 22 June, 1883. He worked on his father's farm in summer, attending a district school in winter, till 1824, when he began to teach. He was graduated at Yale in 1834, and was principal of an academy at Nantucket, Mass., from 1835 to 1842. He then went to Auburn, N. Y., and at the request of President Day, of Yale, published an abridgment of Day's algebra for the use of schools. He began in 1843 to organize and extend teachers' institutes and similar gatherings, and was actively engaged in this work for the next four or five years. In 1845 he assisted in the organization of the New York state teachers' association, and was elected its president. He removed to the city of New York in 1846, and resided there and in Brooklyn till 1868, when he took up his permanent residence in the latter city. He received the degree of LL. D. from Hamilton college in 1853, and from the University of Tennessee in 1882. Mr. Thomson attained considerable reputation as a conchologist. He published a very successful series of mathematical works, his arithmetical works alone having a sale of about 100,000 copies annually. His books include "School Algebra" (New Haven, 1843); a series of arithmetics (New York, 1845-'52); and "Arithmetical Analysis" (1854).

THOMSON, John Edgar, civil engineer, b. in Springfield, Delaware co., Pa., 10 Feb., 1808; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 27 May, 1874. He was the son of John Thomson, the engineer who planned the first experimental railroad in the United States, and was thoroughly trained and educated in the profession by his father. In 1827 he began his own career in the engineering corps that was employed upon the original surveys of the Philadelphia and Columbia railroad, having received his appointment from the secretary of the board of canal commissioners of Pennsylvania, and three years later he entered the service of the Camden and Amboy railroad as principal assistant engineer of the eastern division. In 1832 he was appointed chief engineer of the Georgia railroad, which then controlled the longest line under a single company in this country, and later he was its general manager. In 1847 he became chief engineer of the Pennsylvania railroad, and in 1852 he was made its president, which office he held until his death. Mr. Thomson took chief charge of the road before it was finished, and during the twenty-eight years of his administration dividends were regularly paid on the stock with the exception of a single semi-annual dividend in 1857. When his presidency began, the Pennsylvania company owned 246 miles of road and had a capital of $13,000,000; and it has since become a corporation controlling 2,346 miles of railroad and 66 miles of canal, with a capital of $150,000,000. Mr. Thomson possessed remarkable engineering ability and executive skill. He was connected with other railroad enterprises in various parts of the country, and was a director in many companies.

THOMSON, John Renshaw, senator, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 25 Sept., 1800; d. in Princeton, N. J., 13 Sept., 1862. He studied for some time at Princeton, but left without taking his degree, in order to pursue a commercial career. He went to China in 1817, and in 1820 had regularly established himself in the Chinese trade, and opened a house in Canton, where President Monroe appointed him U. S. consul in 1823. He returned to the United States in 1825, married a sister of Com. Robert F. Stockton, and resided at Princeton. He was appointed a director of the Camden and Amboy railroad in 1835, which office he held during his lifetime. He canvassed the state in 1842 in support of the Constitutional convention that met in 1844, and was nominated the same year for governor by the Democratic party, but was defeated. On the resignation of Com. Stockton as U. S. senator in 1853, Mr. Thomson was elected for the remainder of the term, and he was re-elected in 1857 for six years. His second wife was a daughter of Gen. Aaron Ward, and after Mr. Thomson's death she married Gov. Thomas Swann of Maryland.

THOMSON, Mortimer, humorist, b. in Riga, Monroe co., N. Y., 2 Sept., 1832; d. in New York city, 25 June, 1875. He was taken to Ann Arbor, Mich., by his parents in childhood, and entered the University of Michigan, but was expelled, with about forty others, for belonging to college secret societies. After going on the stage, and then travelling as a salesman for a New York firm, he adopted journalism as a profession. He was first brought into notice by his letters from Niagara Falls, in the New York "Tribune," and he also wrote rhymed police-court reports, and a series of sketches of New York fortune-tellers, which was afterward published in book-form as "The Witches of New York" (New York, 1859). His report of the Pierce-Butler sale of slaves at Savannah, Ga., about 1859, occupied several pages of the "Tribune," and was reprinted in the other daily papers, translated into several foreign languages, and circulated by the Anti-slavery society as a tract. During about eight years he delivered many popular lectures, including one in rhyme on "Pluck" and one on "Cheek" in prose. His wife was a daughter of Mrs. Parton, "Fanny Fern." Thomson's books, as well as most of his fugitive writings, appeared under the pen-name of "Q. K. Philander Doesticks, P. B.," which had been given him by the editor of a university magazine to which his earliest contributions were made. Thomson afterward asserted that it signified "Queer Kitter, Philander Doesticks, Perfect Brick." His works include "Doesticks—What he Says" (New York, 1855); "Plu-ri-bus-tah: a Song that's by No Author," a travesty of Longfellow's "Hiawatha" (1856); "History and Records of the Elephant Club," with "Knight Russ Ockside, M. D." (Edward F. Underhill); "Nothing to Say, being a Satire on Snobbery" (1857); and several smaller humorous collections.

THOMSON, Samuel, physician, b. in Alstead, N. H., 9 Feb., 1769; d. in Boston, Mass., in 1843. He was the originator of the so-called Thomsonian system of medicine. He published "Materia Medica and Family Physician" (Albany); "New Guide to Health, and Family Physician" (new ed., London, 1849); and his "Life and Medical Discoveries" (Boston, 1825; enlarged ed., 1832).

THOMSON, William McClure, clergyman, b. in Springfield (now Spring Dale) near Cincinnati, Ohio, 31 Dec., 1806. He was graduated at Miami university, Ohio, in 1826, studied at Princeton theological seminary in 1826-'7, and was ordained as an evangelist by the presbytery of Cincinnati on 12 Oct., 1831. He was sent as a missionary to Syria and Palestine in 1833, remained there until 1849, and was afterward again in the Holy Land from 1850 till 1857 and from 1859 till 1876. He is at present a resident of New York city. Dr. Thomson is accepted as an authority in the department of archæological research, to which he has devoted himself. His works, besides being great aids to the verification of facts that are related in the Scriptures, and giving evidence of profound learning and critical acumen, have a decided literary value from his skill in reproducing the local color and types and working them into artistic pictures of the past and present life of the Holy Land. He has written "The Land and the Book, or Biblical Illustrations drawn from the Manners and Customs, the Scenes and Scenery of the Holy Land" (2 vols., New York, 1859; London, 1860; new ed., with the results of recent explorations, 3 vols., 1880-'6), and "The Land of Promise: Travels in Modern Palestine, illustrative of Biblical History, Manners, and Customs" (New York, 1865), and has contributed articles to the "Bibliotheca Sacra" and the "American Biblical Repository."—His cousin, Samuel Harrison, clergyman, b. in Nicholas county, Ky., 26 Aug., 1813; d. in Pasadena, Cal., 2 Sept., 1882, was graduated at Hanover college, Ind., in 1837, and was elected professor of mathematics there in 1844. In 1857 he was ordained a minister in the Presbyterian church, and the rest of his life was devoted to teaching in the colleges of his denomination or to literary pursuits. He published "The Mosaic Account of the Creation" (1852); "Geology an Interpreter of Scripture"; and pamphlets on "Human Depravity" (1874) and "Our Fall in Adam" (1876).

THORBURN, Grant, merchant, b. in Dalkeith, near Edinburgh, Scotland, 18 Feb., 1773; d. in New Haven, Conn., 21 Jan., 1863. He early entered his father's business of nail-making, and became so expert that he is said to have made with his own hands in a single day, between 6 A. M. and 9 P. M., 3,221 nails. In 1792 he became involved in a political movement concerning parliamentary reforms, and was charged with treason, but he was released on bail and soon afterward emigrated to New York, where he arrived on 16 June, 1794. At first he continued his old trade of nail-making, but in 1801 he engaged in the grocery trade, and he finally established himself in the seed business in Newark, N. J. This proved unsuccessful, but, on removing his business to New York city, he acquired a handsome fortune. In 1854 he retired from active trade and settled at first in Astoria, N. Y., and then in Winsted, Conn. The house he founded is continued under the style of James M. Thorburn and Co. He was noted for his charity, and during the epidemic of yellow fever in 1798 he and his wife remained in the city, devoting themselves to the care of the victims. Under the pen-name of Lawrie Todd he contributed to the "Knickerbocker Magazine," the "New York Mirror," and more than twenty other papers, principally concerning his reminiscences of New York city at the beginning of the present century. His publications in book-form included "Forty Years' Residence in America" (Boston, 1834); "Men and Manners in Great Britain" (New York, 1834); "Fifty Years' Reminiscences of New York" (1845); "Lawrie Todd's Hints to Merchants, Married Men, and Bachelors" (1847); "Lawrie Todd's Notes on Virginia, with a Chapter on Puritans, Witches, and Friends" (1848); "Life and Writings of Grant Thorburn" (1852); and "Supplement to the Life of Grant Thorburn" (1853). His experiences furnished the novelist John Galt with the incidents described in his "Lawrie Todd, or Settlers in the New World" (London, 1830). See "A Bone to Gnaw for Grant Thorburn," by William Carver (New York, 1836).

THORBURN, James, Canadian physician, b. in Queenston, Ont., 21 Nov., 1830. His father was for many years a member of the Dominion parliament. The son was educated at Toronto university and at Edinburgh university, where he was graduated as a physician in 1855. He has practised in Toronto, where he is surgeon-major of the Queen's own rifles, and professor of pharmacology and therapeutics in Toronto university. He is also consulting surgeon of Toronto general hospital, physician of the boys' hospital, and connected with other institutions, both charitable and financial, in his capacity as a physician. He has contributed articles on medical and other subjects to journals, and published "Manual of Life Insurance Examination" (Toronto, 1887).

THORBURN, John, educator, b. near Biggar, Lanarkshire, Scotland, 10 Oct., 1830. He was educated at Edinburgh university in 1855, became classical master in the Western institution in that city, and came to Canada in 1856. In 1860 he was appointed principal of St. Francis college, Richmond, and its professor of classics, and in 1862 he became head master of the grammar-school (now the collegiate institution) at Ottawa, which post he held for about twenty years. In 1882 he was appointed librarian to the geological and natural history survey of Canada, and the same year he was appointed by the government a member of the board of civil-service examiners. He was president of the Ottawa literary and scientific society, prepared for the department of militia a scheme for entrance examination into the military college at Kingston, and has been active in other respects as an educator. He received the degree of M. A. from McGill university in 1860, and that of LL. D. from Queen's university, Kingston, in 1880.

THOREAU, Henry David, author, b. in Concord, Mass., 12 July, 1817; d. there, 6 May, 1862. His grandfather, John Thoreau, came from St. Helier, a parish in the island of Jersey, about 1773, and moved from Boston to Concord in 1800. Henry, the third of four children, went to school in Boston for a little more than a year, then attended the schools in Concord, fitted for college at a private school, entered Harvard in 1833, and was graduated in 1837, a fair scholar but not eminent. The family being in humble circumstances, the father was assisted in paying his small expenses by the boy's aunts, his elder sister, who was then teaching, the beneficiary fund of the college, and Henry's own exertions at school-keeping. Thoreau afterward led a literary life, writing, lecturing, reading, and meeting his modest physical needs by surveying, pencil-making, engineering, and carpentering. He was never married, and never left Concord except for a lecturing-tour, or a pedestrian excursion. Cities he disliked; civilization he did not believe in. Nature was his passion, and the wilder it was the more he loved it. He was a fine scholar, especially in Greek, translated two of the tragedies of Æschylus, was intimate with the Greek anthology, and knew Pindar, Simonides, and all the great lyric poets. In English poetry he preferred Milton to Shakespeare, and was more familiar with the writers of the 17th century than with modern men. He was no mean poet himself; in fact, he possessed the essential quality of the poet—a soaring imagination. He possessed an eye and an ear for beauty, and had he been gifted with the power of musical expression, would have been distinguished. No complete collection of his pieces has ever been made or could be, but fragments are exquisite. Emerson said that his poem on "Smoke" surpassed any by Simonides. That Thoreau was a man of aspiration, a pure idealist, reverent, spiritual, is plain from his intimacy with Bronson Alcott and Emerson, the latter of whom spoke these words at his funeral: "His soul was made for the noblest society; he had in a short life exhausted the capabilities of this world; wherever there is knowledge, wherever there is virtue, wherever there is beauty, he will find a home." His religion was that of the transcendentalists. The element of negation in it was large, and in his case conspicuous and acrid. Horace Greeley found fault with his "defiant pantheism," and an editor struck out the following passage from a contribution: "It [the pine-tree] is as immortal as I am, and, perchance, will go to as high a heaven, there to tower above me still." His doctrine was that of individualism. Therein he differed from Emerson, who was sympathetic and began at the divine end. Thoreau began with the ground and reasoned up. He saw beauty in ashes, and "never chanced to meet with any man so cheering and elevating and encouraging, so infinitely suggestive, as the stillness and solitude of the Well-meadow field." He aimed at becoming elemental and spontaneous. He wrote hymns to the night quite in the pagan fashion. His very aptitudes brought him in contact with the earth. His aspect suggested a faun, one who was in the secret of the wilderness. Mr. Sanborn, his friend and biographer, thus describes him: "He is a little under size, with a huge Emersonian nose, bluish-gray eyes, brown hair, and a ruddy weather-beaten face, which reminds one of some shrewd and honest animal's—some retired philosophical woodchuck or magnanimous fox." Another friend mentions his sloping shoulders, his long arms, his large hands and feet. "I fancy," he wrote, "the saying that man was created a little lower than the angels should have been a little lower than the animals." He built a hut on the shore of Walden pond in 1845, and lived there, with occasional absences, about two years and a half. He built on Emerson's land, though he had wished to build elsewhere. The house had no lock to the door, no curtain to the window. It belonged to nature as much as to man, and to all men as much as to any one. When Thoreau left it, it was bought by a Scotch gardener, who carried it off a little way and used it as a cottage. Then a farmer bought it, moved it still farther away, and converted it into a tool-house. A pile of stones marks the site of Thoreau's hut. He went into the woods, not because he wished to avoid his fellow-men, as a misanthrope, but because he wanted to confront Nature, to deal with her at first hand, to lead his own life, to meet primitive conditions; and having done this, he abandoned the enterprise, recommending no one to try it who had not "a pretty good supply of internal sunshine. . . . To live alone comfortably, he must have that self-comfort which rays out of Nature—a portion of it at least." At Walden he labored, studied, meditated, edited his first book, the "Week," and gauged his genius. He redeemed and consecrated the spot. The refusal to pay taxes, and his consequent imprisonment, were due to a more specific cause—namely, his dissent from the theory of human government and from the practice of the American state, which supported slavery. He stood simply and plainly on the rights and duty of the individual. The act was heroic as he performed it, and, when read by the light of his philosophy, was consistent. Thoreau was anything but sour, surly, or morose. He could sing, and even dance, on occasion. He was sweet with children; fond of kittens; a sunbeam at home; the best of brothers, gentle, patient, helpful. Those he loved he gave his heart to, and if they were few it was perhaps because his affections were not as expansive as they were deep. But he showed little emotion, having learned, like the Indian, to control his feelings. He cultivated stoicism. He had the pride as well as the conceit of egotism, and while the latter gave most offence to those who did not know him well, the former was the real cause of his conduct. Thoreau had no zeal of authorship, yet he wrote a great deal, and left a mass of manuscripts, mostly in prose, for he produced very few verses after he was thirty years old. The "Dial," the "Democratic Review," "Graham's Magazine," "The Union Magazine," "Putnam's Magazine," the "Atlantic Monthly," the "Tribune," all contained contributions from him. Every volume of the "Dial" had something; the third volume many articles. The essay on "Resistance to Civil Government" was printed in "Æsthetic Papers." Only two of the seven volumes of his printed works appeared in his lifetime—"A Week on the Concord and Merrimac Rivers" (Boston, 1849) and "Walden, or Life in the Woods" (1854). The others are "Excursions in Field and Forest," with a memoir by Ralph Waldo Emerson (1863); "The Maine Woods" (1864); "Cape Cod" (1865); "Letters to Various Persons," with nine poems (1865); and "A Yankee in Canada," with anti-slavery and reform papers (1866). His life has been written by William Ellery Channing under the title "The Poet-Naturalist" (1873), and by Franklin B. Sanborn in the "American Men of Letters" series (1882). The former is a rhapsody rather than a biography, and is largely composed of extracts from Thoreau's journals, which had never seen the light before. It also contains a full list of his publications.

THORFINN, Scandinavian navigator, b. in Norway; d. in Glæmbœland, Iceland, after 1016. He was surnamed Karlsefn, which signifies one that is destined to become a great man. He was one of the wealthiest and most powerful nobles of the three northern kingdoms, and several of his ancestors had been kings. He went to Greenland from Norway in 1006, bringing with him two vessels. Here he married Gudrida, the widow of Thorstein, who persuaded him to organize an expedition to Vinland. With three ships and 160 men and women, besides a supply of cattle, Thorfinn and his companions set sail from Ericsfjord in the spring of 1007, and finally were driven by the polar current and a north wind toward Helluland (probably Newfoundland). They next came in sight of Markland (Nova Scotia), and then of an island (probably Anticosti), on which some of them landed and killed a bear. Therefore they called it Bjarnar, or Bearsland. The sagas are somewhat vague as to the route that they followed afterward, but it is probable that in their search after the grave of Thorvald they sailed along the New England coast. They touched at Cape Kjalarnes, for mention is made of the keel which was set up there three years before; but they did not discover the tomb of the son of Eric, although some of his companions must have been among the crew of Thorfinn. After leaving Kjalarnes they sailed past Cape Cod, which they called Furdustrandir, or Wonderstrands, because they saw there sand-hills and long and narrow shores, and it was "long to sail by." Thorfinn soon put two scouts on shore, who were ordered to explore the country to the southwest. They returned after three days, bringing some bunches of grapes and ears of wheat. Next the Northmen anchored in a deep bay, which they called Straumfjord, on account of its currents, and they then reached an island frequented by eider-ducks in great numbers. They named it Straumey, and it is supposed to be either Martha's Vineyard or Nantucket. They wintered at Straumfjord, and, resolving to plant their settlement on its shores, landed their flocks, built booths, and spent the spring in cultivating the land, fishing, and exploring the country. But when the next winter came their resources were nearly exhausted, and Thorfinn was deserted by some of his companions. With his two remaining vessels he sailed for Leifsbudir, probably in Mount Hope bay, and established there the settlement of Thorfinnsbudir. One morning, about a fortnight afterward, he saw the bay crowded with little boats, containing men of a blackish color, with flat faces and big eyes. They were the Skraelings (Esquimaux), say the sagas. They raised aloft long poles with which they made a hissing sound by moving them rapidly in the air. "What do you think of this?" said Thorfinn to Snorre. "I think it means peace, and the white shield should be held up." So the white shield of peace was raised. The Esquimaux approached, gazed curiously a moment on the Northmen, and then disappeared behind the promontory. But they returned in the spring of 1009 in such numbers that the bay looked to their eyes as if covered with lumps of coal. The whites traded with the natives, bartering red cloth for skins and furs, and, when the cloth was gone, Thorfinn directed the women to offer the savages milk porridge, which pleased them so well that they no longer wished for any other food, "and so," says the saga of Thorfinn, "they carried in their bellies the results of a barter that the Scandinavians put carefully aside to load their ships with." Meanwhile, to be ready for a surprise, he surrounded the little colony with a palisade. In the autumn there was born to Thorfinn a son, who was named Snorre, and was in all probability the first child of European parentage born within the limits of the present United States. The Skraelings did not return until the beginning of winter, but they came then in larger numbers than usual, and laid down their merchandise before receiving the price of it, contrary to their custom. As soon as the milk porridge was brought to them they took up their bundles and flung them over the palisade. Profiting by the confusion that ensued, they rushed in and attempted to seize the arms of the Scandinavians; but as soon as they saw one of their number slain they took to flight, abandoning both merchandise and porridge. They returned in still larger numbers soon afterward, and the Northmen raised the red shield of war in reply to their fierce cries. There was trouble with the natives in the ensuing winter, hostilities began, and the Northmen, after fighting bravely for a time, fled, believing that they saw a host in their rear. They soon recognized that they had been the victims of mirage, which, according to Prof. Edward Hitchcock, in his "Report on the Geology of Massachusetts" (Amherst, 1833), still occurs on that coast; but Thorfinn resolved to leave the country. First he explored the coast in the neighborhood of Mount Hope bay, visiting several harbors and making inquiries as to the productions of the soil. He is believed by some to have ascended the Poto-mac. He then passed the winter in Straumfjord, when the turbulence of his followers forced him to sail homeward. One ship was lost, so that of the three vessels that left Ericsfjord in 1007 only that of Thorfinn returned in 1011. He carried his merchandise to Norway, where he was received with great distinction, but in 1016 he sailed for Glæmboeland, in Iceland, where he spent the rest of his days. The illustration represents a ship of that period. The remains of such a ship were discovered in 1880 in a mound at Gogstad, Norway, and are now to be seen in a good state of preservation at Christiania. The erection of the tumulus is ascribed by antiquarians to the most ancient iron age, or the 10th century of our era—most probably to the age of Harold the haired, founder of the Norwegian state.

THORN, Frank Manly, superintendent of the coast survey, b. in Collins (now North Collins), N. Y., 7 Dec., 1836. He was educated at common schools in Erie county and at the Fredonia academy. After studying law he held the office of clerk of the surrogate's court in Erie county, N. Y., in 1857-'60. Subsequently he was occupied with professional work and as a journalist until 1871, when he was chosen a member of the county board of supervisors, continuing as such until 1880, except during 1876. In July, 1885, he was appointed chief clerk in the bureau of internal revenue in Washington, and a few weeks later was made superintendent of the U. He afterward endeavored to take a schooner out of Cape Ann harbor, but was wounded in the attempt. He was on the "Flora" frigate, which captured "La Nymphe" in 1780, was promoted to the rank of commander for his gallantry on the occasion, and became post-captain in the following year. He was wrecked in 1782 in the "Blonde" while bringing a captured vessel into Halifax. After his return to the United States he settled in Newport, R. I. He was made an associate of the National academy in 1861. His landscapes showed many of the characteristics of the French school, and James J. Jarves wrote of him: "Thorndike is so thoroughly French in style and motive that his pictures require naturalization before being popularly welcomed at home." His better-known works include "The Wayside Inn," "Swans in Central Park," "The Lily Pond," "The Dumplings, Newport," and "View near Stockbridge, Mass."

He was elected to the Massachusetts convention that ratified the constitution of the United States, and for many years sat in the Massachusetts legislature. He settled in Boston in 1810, and in 1818 purchased for the use of Harvard the library of Prof. Christoph Daniel Ebeling, of Hamburg, which consists of 4,000 volumes, and is remarkably rich in works on American history and antiquities.

The son made his first appearance on the stage in San Francisco at the age of twelve. He was afterward sent to learn a trade, but soon returned to the stage, and in 1862 began to acquire popularity. He was in China subsequently, and erected a theatre at Shanghai, which was moderately successful. After a visit to Egypt and a tour thence round the world, he returned to New York in 1873 and became a member of the Union square company. One of his best characters was Daniel Rochat, in Sardou's play of that name.

His brother PRESLEY commanded a company of horsemen, and another brother was an aide to Gen. Washington. Col. Anthony raised a large family, whose descendants are scattered throughout the United States. His sword which he used during the Revolutionary war is still preserved by his grandchildren at Paris, Bourbon co., Ky., to which place he moved with his family in 1808 and engaged in agriculture.—His grandson, James Bankhead, b. in Mount Zephyr, Caroline co., Va., 28 Aug., 1806; d. in Memphis, Tenn., 12 Oct., 1867, was the son of James B. While engaged in active practice he contributed to current literature. In politics he was a Democrat, and in the civil war he was identified with the southern cause.—James Bankhead's son, Gustavus Brown, sanitarian, b. in Bowling Green, Va., 22 Feb., 1835, was graduated at the Memphis medical college in 1858, and at the medical department of the University of New York in 1860. He is a member of various sanitary and medical societies, and was in 1882 president of the Tennessee state medical society. In addition to his official reports as president of the Memphis board of health, he has contributed numerous memoirs on sanitary subjects to the "Proceedings of the American Public Health Association" and to the transactions of other societies of which he is a member. of common pleas, and from 1776 till 1782 a judge of the superior court of New Hampshire. He was elected speaker of the assembly on 5 Jan., 1776, and on 12 Sept. the legislature chose him as a delegate to the Continental congress. As in the case of the delegates from Pennsylvania, he was allowed to affix his name to the engrossed copy of the Declaration of Independence, although he was elected after its passage, and did not take his seat till 4 Nov., 1776. In December he was again chosen to represent New Hampshire in congress for another year. He removed to Exeter in 1779, and shortly afterward settled on a farm at Merrimack, relinquishing medical practice. He was elected a member of the general court, then a state senator, and in 1785 was appointed a member of the council. From the adoption of the state constitution till his death he was a justice of the peace. He wrote political articles for the newspapers, even after the age of eighty, and in his last days composed a metaphysical work on the origin of sin, which was never published. He was a skilled architect, and designed the Philadelphia library building, which was completed in 1790. He removed to Washington, D. C., when the seat of government was transferred to that place, and drew the plans and superintended the erection of the first capitol building in its early stages. He was one of the first to act as commissioner of public buildings, and was the first head of the patent-office, being appointed superintendent in 1802, and serving till the time of his death. Craig, lieutenant-governor of Lower Canada. He returned to England in 1811, and in 1813 was assigned to the command of the 85th regiment. He served in Spain and southern France, took part in the battle of the Nive, was afterward sent to this country, in May, 1814, commanded the brigade of light infantry that formed the advance-guard of Gen. Robert Ross's expedition up the Chesapeake, and was seriously wounded and made prisoner at Bladensburg. Being exchanged for Com. Joshua Barney, he went with the army that was sent against New Orleans in the following October, commanded the advance on the landing of the troops, took part in the chief operations, and in the general attack on the American lines commanded a detached force on the west bank of the Mississippi, and was severely wounded. THORNTON, William A., soldier, b. in New York state in 1803; d. on Governor's island, New York harbor, 6 April, 1866. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1825, and assigned to the artillery. He was made captain of ordnance on 7 July, 1838, commanded the ordnance depot in New York and the Watervliet and St. Louis arsenals, served on boards for the trial of small arms and cannon, and was inspector of contract arms in 1858-'61. He was promoted major on 28 May, 1861, and was commander of Watervliet arsenal till 1863, and subsequently inspector of contract arms and ordnance till his death, being promoted lieutenant-colonel of ordnance on 3 March, 1863, colonel on 15 Sept., 1863, and brigadier-general by brevet on 13 March, 1865. During the last year of his life he was commandant of the New York arsenal on Governor's island.

THORNWELL, James Henley, clergyman, b. in Marlborough district, S. C., in 1812; d. in Charlotte, N. C., 1 Aug., 1862. He was graduated at South Carolina college in 1829, and entered upon the study of the law, which he soon abandoned to devote himself to the ministry in the Presbyterian church. He was chosen, in 1836, professor of logic and belles-lettres in South Carolina college, in 1842 professor of the evidences of Christianity and chaplain, and in 1852 its president. In 1856 he became a professor in the Presbyterian theological seminary at Columbia. For a short time he was pastor of the Glebe street Presbyterian church in Charleston. Dr. Thornwell was one of the ablest men that the south has ever produced. To logical and metaphysical faculties of a high order he added a fine literary style, and an easy and effective address. He was an uncompromising champion of the old-school Presbyterian theology, and in politics advocated extreme southern views. He was the author of several published sermons and addresses, "Arguments of Romanists Discussed and Refuted" (New York, 1845); "Discourses on Truth" (1854); "Rights and Duties of Masters" (1861); "The State of the Country" (1861); and numerous articles in defence of slavery and secession in the "Southern Presbyterian Review." His collected works were edited by Rev. John B. Adger (2 vols., Richmond, 1874).

THORPE, Rose Hartwick, poet, b. in Mishawaka, Ind., 18 July, 1850. When she was ten years old her parents settled in Litchfield, Mich., where she received a common-school education. Her most popular poem, the ballad entitled "Curfew Must not Ring To-Night," was written while she was a school-girl. When it was published in a Detroit paper in 1870 it obtained a wide circulation. An illustrated edition has been issued (Boston, 1882). She married Edmund C. Thorpe in September, 1871. In 1881 she edited three Sunday-school papers in Chicago, Ill. Subsequently she settled with her family in Pacific Beach, San Diego co., Cal. Mrs. Thorpe has been a contributor to journals and magazines since 1880. She has written "The Station-Agent's Story," "Remember the Alamo," and other popular poems. Her publications include "Fred's Dark Days," a story for children (Chicago, 1881); "The Yule Log," a book of poems (1881); "The Fenton Family" (Philadelphia, 1884); "Nina Bruce" (1886); "The Chester Girls" (1887); "Temperance Poems" (Pent Water, Mich., 1887); and "Ringing Ballads" (Boston, 1887).

THORPE, Thomas Bangs, author, b. in Westfield, Mass., 1 March, 1815; d. in New York city in October, 1878. He was for three years at Wesleyan university, and while at college gave evidence of literary and artistic talent. One of his early paintings, "The Bold Dragoon," adapted from Washington Irving's story, was highly commended. After leaving college on account of his health, Mr. Thorpe made a tour of the southwest, and finally settled in Louisiana in 1836. His first literary production of note, "Tom Owen, the Bee-Hunter," was widely quoted, and his next contribution to periodical literature—the mirth-provoking sketch entitled "The Big Bear of Arkansas"—placed him in the foremost rank of early American humorists. He was for a time editor of a Whig newspaper in New Orleans. In 1844 he edited the "Concordia Intelligencer," and in 1846 established "The Conservator" at Baton Rouge, but sold the paper a few years later, and in 1859 became the editor and publisher of the New York "Spirit of the Times." Mr. Thorpe served in the Mexican war, and attained the rank of colonel. His contributions to periodical literature, particularly "Blackwood's," the "Knickerbocker," and "Harper's Magazine," show versatile talent of a high order, and several of his paintings, notably "Niagara as it Is," display ability. His published works include "Our Army of the Rio Grande" (Philadelphia, 1846); "Mysteries of the Backwoods" (1846); "Our Army at Monterey" (1847); "Lynde Weiss, an Autobiography" (1854); "The Hive of the Bee-Hunter" (New York, 1854); "A Voice to America" (1855); "Scenes in Arkansaw" (1858); and "Reminiscences of Charles L. Elliott."

THORVALD, Ericsson, Scandinavian navigator, d. in Massachusetts in 1004. He was the brother of Leif, the son of Eric the Red, who persuaded him to visit Vinland, giving him the ship that he had bought from Biarn Heriulfson, and many wise directions as to his course. Thorvald selected thirty men, and sailed westward in 1002. He reached what has been thought to be the coast of Rhode Island, and passed the winter in Leifsbudir (Leif's house), some wooden huts which Leif is supposed to have built at the mouth of Pocasset river, near the present site of Providence. In the spring of 1003 he went on a voyage of discovery along the southern coast. His men saw a lovely country covered with forests, which were separated from the shore only by a thin border of white sand. The sea was enamelled with little islands, in one of which they discovered a wooden barn. The others appeared without any trace of men or animals. After obtaining a glimpse of an island that lay toward the west, supposed to be Long Island, they returned in the autumn to Leifsbudir. In the following summer Thorvald determined to explore the northern coast, but a violent storm damaged the keel of his ship. He stopped for some time, refitting in the neighborhood, and when about to put to sea he said to his companions: "Let us raise on this point of land the keel of a ship, and let us call it Kialarnes" (Keel cape). Rafn, Kohl, and other scholars that are interested in the ante-Columbian discovery of the American continent, think that the Kialarnes of Thorvald is Cape Cod. Then Thorvald sailed westward and anchored near a promontory, which has been supposed to be Gurnet point or Cape Alderton. The country appeared so beautiful that after landing he said: "This country is very fine; I would like to build my house here." After returning to the vessel, the Northmen saw three dark points on the beach that looked like hillocks. They were three "carabos" (canoes of wickerwork, covered with skins), each containing three men. The Northmen seized and killed eight of the savages, but the ninth escaped. Thorvald then landed, explored the promontory, and discovered elevations, which he took for human habitations. The Northmen returned to their vessel at nightfall, but they were soon awakened from their sleep by cries of vengeance. The vessel was surrounded by a crowd of canoes that came to exact reparation for the assassinations of the morning. They were manned by the Skrællings, or Esquimaux, who appear to have dwelt at that time farther south than they did in the 16th century. These savages discharged a shower of arrows on the Northmen, and fled. Thorvald asked his companions if they were wounded, and all replied in the negative. "But I am," he said; "this arrow, after rebounding from my buckler, entered under the armpit. I advise you to depart quickly from this land and leave me on the promontory where I wished to build my house. I have prophesied my destiny, for there shall I dwell. You shall bury me in this place, and put two crosses on my tomb, one at my head and the other at my feet, so that henceforward this promontory shall be called Krossarnes" (Promontory of the Crosses).

A skeleton was discovered late in the 18th century on Rainsford island, and with it the hilt of an iron sword. Some antiquarians have concluded that the skeleton was that of an ancient Scandinavian, and that the workmanship of the hilt proved it to be not later than the 15th century. After the burial of Thorvald, the Northmen returned to Leifsbudir, and in 1005 sailed for Greenland. THRASHER, John S., journalist, b. in Portland, Me., in 1817; d. in Galveston, Tex., 10 Nov., 1879. While he was a youth his parents removed to Havana, Cuba, where he followed for some time a successful mercantile career, but abandoned it for journalism, purchasing, in 1849, the "Faro Industrial," which was then the only Liberal newspaper. In September, 1851, his paper was suppressed, and he was condemned by court-martial to ten years' imprisonment with hard labor at Ceuta and perpetual banishment from Cuba. After several months the U. S. minister at Madrid secured his release. He afterward established in New Orleans a Sunday journal called the "Beacon of Cuba," and in 1853-'5 was an active member of the junta that organized a filibustering expedition to be led by Gen. John A. Quitman. When the U. S. authorities prevented the departure of this expedition, Thrasher went to New York city. For several years he travelled in Central and South America as a newspaper correspondent, and edited the "Noticioso de Nuevo York," a journal devoted to the interests of Spanish-American countries. Marrying a lady whose property was in Texas, he removed to the south, and remained there during the civil war, acting as agent for the associated press at Atlanta. After the war he edited for several years Frank Leslie's "Illustracion Americana" in New York city, and afterward resided in Galveston. He published a translation of Alexander von Humboldt's "Personal Narrative of Travels," with notes and an introductory essay (New York, 1856), also many essays on the social, commercial, and political conditions of Cuba.

THROCKMORTON, James Webb, governor of Texas, b. in Sparta, Tenn., 1 Feb., 1825. He accompanied his father to Texas in 1841, became a lawyer, and entered the legislature in 1851, serving continuously in one branch or the other till the beginning of the civil war. He was a member of the convention that passed the ordinance of secession, against which he voted, with six others, but he joined the Confederate army in the spring of 1861, and served as a captain, and afterward as a major till November, 1863, when he resigned in order to take his seat again in the state senate. In 1864 he was appointed a brigadier-general of state troops, and in May, 1864, was placed by the state military authorities in command on the northwestern border of Texas, where he made treaties with the Comanches, Cheyennes, and other tribes, returning from the plains in June, 1865, after Lee's surrender at Appomattox. He was a member of the Constitutional convention that was called in accordance with President Johnson's proclamation in 1865, and was elected its president. In 1866 he was chosen governor for four years, but in 1867 he was removed from office by Gen. Philip H. Sheridan's orders. He was elected to congress, taking his seat on 6 Dec., 1875, and served through two terms. On 3 Dec., 1883, he re-entered the house, and in 1885 he was re-elected.

THROOP, Enos Thompson (troop), governor of New York, b. in Johnstown, Montgomery co., N. Y., 21 Aug., 1784; d. on his estate of Willowbrook, near Auburn, N. Y., 1 Nov., 1874. He received a classical education, studied law at Albany, and was admitted to the bar in 1806. During his residence at Albany, he became acquainted with Martin Van Buren, then also a law-student, and this acquaintance ripened into friendship. After admission to the bar, Mr. Throop began practice at Auburn, soon became active in politics as a member of the Republican party, and was appointed postmaster of the village, and in 1811 county clerk of Cayuga county. In 1814 he was elected a member of congress, as a supporter of the war measures of the administration. He took part in the debates upon the important measures to which the close of the war and the prostration of public and private credit gave rise. He also supported and voted for the act changing the compensation of congressmen from six dollars a day to $1,800 per annum, a course which temporarily clouded his political fortunes. Popular dissatisfaction with his action was such that he was defeated at the election of 1816, which was held in April of that year, and thereupon resigned his seat for the remainder of his unexpired term. In April, 1823, he was appointed one of the eight circuit judges for which the constitution of 1821 provided. In 1828, induced chiefly by the solicitation of Martin Van Buren, Judge Throop consented to be placed upon the state ticket, as the Democratic candidate for lieutenant-governor, with Mr. Van Buren as the candidate for governor, a step which rendered it necessary for him to resign his judicial office. It was expected that Andrew Jackson would be elected president at the same election, in which event Van Buren would be made secretary of state; and the latter desired to leave the office of governor and the leadership of the party in the hands of a friend. These expectations were fulfilled, and Mr. Throop succeeded to the office of governor on 12 March, 1829. He was re-elected governor in 1830. During his first term the construction of the Chenango canal became one of the chief questions of state policy. He declared himself, in his message to the legislature, unalterably opposed to the plan. This step raised such a vehement opposition to him in the localities through which the proposed canal would pass, that in 1832 he declined to be presented as a candidate for a third term. In 1833 he was appointed by President Jackson naval officer at the port of New York, which office he held until 1838, when President Van Buren appointed him chargé d'affaires of the United States to the kingdom of the Two Sicilies (Naples), where he remained until he was superseded in 1842. After spending two years in Paris, he returned to the United States, and resided upon an estate on the banks of Owasco lake near Auburn, N. Y. In 1847 he removed to Michigan, where he purchased a farm of 800 acres, and became noted among agriculturists. Advancing years compelled him to give up farming, and in 1857 he returned to his former home, removing in 1868 to New York city, but a few years later again returning to his residence near Auburn.—His nephew, Montgomery Hunt, lawyer, b. in Auburn, N. Y., 26 Jan., 1827, was educated in Geneva, Switzerland, and Naples, Italy, and at Hobart college; studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1848. He practised in Utica, N. Y., from 1851 till 1864, first in partnership with his uncle, Ward Hunt, and after 1856 with Roscoe Conkling, then in New York city till 1870, when he was appointed a commissioner to revise the statutes of the state. He acted as chairman of the commission, which prepared the New York code of civil procedure that was enacted partly in 1877 and partly in 1880. Since 1878, when the codification was ended, Mr. Throop has devoted himself to legal authorship, changing his residence in 1880 from New York city to Albany. He has published "The Future: a Political Essay" (New York, 1864); "Treatise on the Validity of Verbal Agreements" (Albany, 1870); "Annotated Code of Civil Procedure" (1880); "The New York Justice's Manual" (1880); "Digest of the Decisions of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts" (1887); and "Revised Statutes of the State of New York" (8th ed., 1888).

THRUSTON, Charles Mynn (throo'-ston), soldier, b. in Gloucester county, Va., in 1738; d. near New Orleans, La., in 1812. He was educated at William and Mary college, and after prosecuting his theological studies in England was ordained to the ministry of the Episcopal church in Gloucester county. Subsequently he removed to Clarke county, and officiated in a church, near Shenandoah river, that is still standing. At the beginning of the Revolution he raised a company, was commissioned as captain, and badly wounded at Trenton. On his recovery he was appointed colonel, being known as the "warrior parson." After the war he was a judge and a member of the legislature, and in 1808 removed to Louisiana.—His son, Buckner, jurist, b. near Winchester, Va., in 1763; d. in Washington, D. C., 30 Aug., 1845, received a classical education, emigrated in early life to Kentucky, and there studied law and was admitted to the bar. He practised in Frankfort, taking an active part in public affairs, and was elected U. S. senator in 1805, declining the post of U. S. judge of the territory of Orleans, to which he had been appointed immediately before. On 1 July, 1809, he resigned his seat in the senate to accept the appointment of U. S. judge for the District of Columbia, which office he held until his death.—Buckner's son, Charles Mynn, soldier, b. in Lexington, Ky., 22 Feb., 1789; d. in Cumberland, Md., 18 Feb., 1873, entered the U. S. military academy in 1813, and in July, 1814, was commissioned as lieutenant of artillery, and assigned to duty on Governor's island, New York harbor, where he was engaged in erecting fortifications till the close of the war with Great Britain. He became adjutant of his regiment in 1821, and during the Florida war in 1835-'6 was acting adjutant-general of the Florida army. Resigning on 31 Aug., 1836, he settled on a farm at Cumberland, Md. He became president of a bank in 1838, and mayor in 1861. At the beginning of the civil war he entered the volunteer service as brigadier-general, and served in guarding the Baltimore and Ohio railroad till April, 1862, when he resigned.—Buckner's grandson, Gates Phillips, soldier, b. in Dayton, Ohio, 11 June, 1835, was graduated at Miami university in 1855, studied law, and began practice in Dayton, where he entered the volunteer service at the beginning of the civil war as a captain in the 1st Ohio infantry. He was promoted major and assistant adjutant-general on 4 Sept., 1863, and subsequently lieutenant-colonel, for special acts of gallantry at Shiloh and Stone River, and was brevetted colonel and brigadier-general of volunteers for gallantry at Chickamauga. Since the war he has followed his profession at Nashville, Tenn. He is corresponding secretary of the Tennessee historical society, has contributed articles on military history and other subjects to northern and southern magazines, and has in preparation an illustrated work on the mound-builders, describing recent discoveries in the vicinity of Nashville and elsewhere.

THURMAN, Allen Granbery, statesman, b. in Lynchburg, Va., 13 Nov., 1813. His father was the Rev. Pleasant Thurman, a minister of the Methodist church, and his mother the only daughter of Col. Nathaniel Allen, nephew and adopted son of Joseph Hewes, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence. His parents removed to Chillicothe in 1819, and he made that place his home until he settled in Columbus, in 1853, where he has since resided. His education was in the Chillicothe academy, and at the hands of his mother. At the age of eighteen he assisted in land-surveying and at twenty-one he was private secretary to Gov. Lucas, studied law with his uncle, Gov. William Allen, afterward was admitted to the bar in 1835, and in a few years was employed in almost every litigated case in Ross county. In 1844 he was elected by the Democrats to congress, and he entered that body, 1 Dec., 1845, as its youngest member. Preferring the practice of the law, he declined a renomination to congress, and remained at the bar until 1851, when he was elected to the supreme bench in Ohio. From December, 1854, till February, 1856, he served as chief justice, and on the expiration of his term he refused a renomination. His opinions, contained in the first five volumes of the state reports, are remarkable for the clear and forcible expression of his views and the accuracy of his statements of the law. In 1867 he was the choice of his party for governor of Ohio. Rutherford B. Hayes, his opponent, was elected by a majority of fewer than 3,000 votes, though the Republican majority in 1866 was more than 43,000. Mr. Thurman was then elected to the senate to succeed Benjamin F. Wade. He took his seat, 4 March, 1869, and from the first was recognized as the leader of the Democratic minority. He was a member of the committee on the judiciary and on the accession of his party to power, in the 46th congress, he was made its chairman, and also chosen president, pro tempore, of the senate, owing to the illness of Vice-President Wheeler. In 1874 he was elected to the senate for a second term, and in his twelve years of service, ending 4 March, 1881, he won a reputation for judicial fairness and readiness, dignity and power in debate, especially upon questions of constitutional law. Besides his labor in the judiciary committee he rendered valuable service in the committee on private land claims. He was the author of the act to compel the Pacific railroad corporations to fulfil their obligations to the government, since known as the "Thurman act," the passage of which he forced in spite of the combined influence of those companies. His arguments against the constitutionality of the civil-rights bills have since been sustained by the U. S. supreme court in language that is almost identical with that of his speeches. Efforts to secure for the rebellious states the most favorable reconstruction legislation, in which he vigorously persisted while in the senate, led to a charge that he had disapproved the war for the integrity of the Union. His true position he thus defined in a letter to a friend: "I did all I could to help to preserve the Union without a war, but after it began I thought there was but one thing to do, and that was to fight it out. I therefore sustained all constitutional measures that tended, in my judgment, to put down the rebellion. I never believed in the doctrine of secession." Mr. Thurman retired from the senate not alone with the high respect of his partisan associates, but also with that of senators of opposite political views, one of whom, James G. Blaine, with whom he often contended in debate, says, in his "Twenty Years of Congress": "Mr. Thurman's rank in the senate was established from the day he took his seat, and was never lowered during the period of his service. He was an admirably disciplined debater, was fair in his method of statement, logical in his argument, honest in his conclusions. He had no tricks in discussion, no catch-phrases to secure attention, but was always direct and manly. . . . His retirement from the senate was a serious loss to his party—a loss, indeed, to the body." Gen. Garfield, before his election to the presidency, had been chosen to succeed Mr. Thurman in the senate; but the contest had not interrupted friendly relations of many years' standing, and, as a mark of his regard, the new president, soon after his inauguration, associated Mr. Thurman with William M. Evarts, of New York, and Timothy O. Howe, of Wisconsin, on the commission to the International monetary conference to be held in Paris. In the Democratic national convention of 1876 Mr. Thurman received some votes as a presidential candidate. In 1880 the first ballot gave him the entire vote of the Ohio delegation, with considerable support from other states. In 1884 he was a delegate-at-large to the National convention, was again put in nomination for the presidency, and stood next to Cleveland and Bayard upon the first ballot. In the convention of 1888 he was nominated for vice-president by acclamation. See "Lives and Public Services of Grover Cleveland and Allen G. Thurman," by W. U. Hensel and George F. Parker (New York, 1888).

THURSBY, Emma Cecilia, singer, b. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 21 Feb., 1857. She had her first instruction of Julius Meyer, and subsequently studied with Achille Errani and Erminia Rudersdorff. In 1873 she went to Italy, where she studied for a short time under Francesco Lamperti and San Giovanni. On her return she sang in the Broadway tabernacle, New York. In 1876 she made her first concert-tour with Patrick S. Gilmore's orchestra, and in 1877 she travelled with Theodore Thomas. In the same year Maurice Strakosch signed a six-years' engagement with her, and under his management she made several tours in the United States and in Europe, meeting with great success. Miss Thursby has appeared only in concert and oratorio, and has rejected the most flattering offers that were made her while abroad to appear in opera. Her forte is sacred music, and in rendering the soprano parts of Handel's and Haydn's oratorios she is unexcelled.

THURSTON, Asa, missionary, b. in Fitchburg, Mass., 12 Oct., 1787; d. in Honolulu, Hawaii, 11 March, 1868. He worked at the trade of scythe-making till he was twenty-two years old, then fitted himself for college, was graduated at Yale in 1816, and passed through the course of theological instruction at Andover seminary. On his graduation in 1819 he was ordained as a missionary, and on 23 Oct. sailed with his wife for the Sandwich islands. He established himself at Kailua, Hawaii, where he resided for more than forty years, retiring to Honolulu when incapacitated by paralysis for continued active work. He was a pioneer among the missionaries to the Sandwich islands, and instructed two of the kings while they still resided at Kailua. He also translated a large part of the Bible into the Hawaiian language.—His wife, Lucy Goodale, b. in Marlborough, Mass., 29 Oct., 1795; d. in Honolulu, Hawaii, 13 Oct., 1876, was educated at the academy in Bradford, Mass., and taught until she married and went to the Sandwich islands. She left an autobiography which was completed by Persis G. Taylor, her daughter, and Rev. Walter Freer, and published under the title of "Life and Times of Mrs. Lucy G. Thurston" (Ann Arbor, 1876).—Their son, THOMAS GAIRDNER, was graduated at Yale in 1862, studied theology, and returned to Hawaii, where he preached until the time of his death in 1884.

THURSTON, John Mellen, lawyer, b. in Montpelier, Vt., 21 Aug., 1847. In 1854 his family removed to Madison, and two years later to Beaver Dam, Wis. He was graduated at Wayland university in 1867, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1869, and in the same year removed to Omaha, Nebraska. He was appointed city attorney in 1874, and, while holding that office, was elected in 1875 to the legislature, in which he acted as chairman of the judiciary committee. He resigned the attorneyship in 1877 to become assistant attorney of the Union Pacific railroad company, of which he became general attorney in 1888. In 1875 he was defeated as a candidate for the district judgeship. He was a presidential elector in 1880, and in 1884 chairman of the delegation to the National Republican convention. He was again at the head of the delegation in 1888, and was selected by the convention at Chicago for temporary chairman. His address in calling that body to order won him a national reputation as an orator.

THURSTON, Laura M., poet, b. in Norfolk, Litchfield co., Conn., in December, 1812; d. in New Albany, Ind., 21 July, 1842. Her maiden name was Hawley. She was educated for the profession of teaching at the Hartford female seminary, and taught in Philadelphia, Pa., and New Milford and Hartford, Conn., removed to New Albany in order to take charge of an academy, and in September, 1839, married Franklin Thurston, a merchant of that place. She contributed to newspapers and magazines over the signature of "Viola." Her poems, some of which were descriptive of nature and some didactic, were highly esteemed, and many of them are preserved in Rufus W. Griswold's and other collections of American poetry.

THURSTON, Robert Lawton, mechanical engineer, b. in Portsmouth, R. I., 13 Dec., 1800; d. in Providence, R. I., 13 Jan., 1874. He early developed talent as a mechanic, and on attaining his majority began to learn the trade of a machinist. His skill attracted the attention of John Babcock, who invited his assistance in the manufacture of an experimental steam-engine which was placed in a small ferry-boat for use near Fall River. Its success led to the construction of engines for the "Rushlight" and the "Babcock," which ran between Providence and New York. He then entered the iron business in Fall River, but in 1830 returned to Providence, where, with the son of John Babcock, he founded in 1834 the first steam-engine building establishment in New England, known as the Providence steam-engine company. They purchased the Sickles patent for the "drop cut-off" for steam-engines, and were the first either in America or in Europe to manufacture a standard form of expansion steam-engine. For a series of years they were engaged in litigation with George H. Corliss, against whom they brought suit for infringement of the Sickles patent. This case, which was one of the most noted patent suits that was ever tried, called for the services of several of the most eminent lawyers and mechanical experts of the time. The Greene engine, which they introduced, is now claimed by many engineers to be one of the best of modern steam-engines. In 1863 the unsettled condition of affairs resulting from the civil war, with incidental lack of business, led to Mr. Thurston's withdrawal.—His son, Robert Henry, mechanical engineer, b. in Providence, R. I., 25 Oct., 1839, received his early training in the workshops of his father and was graduated in the scientific course at Brown in 1859. After two years' experience with his father's company, he entered the U. S. navy as third assistant engineer, and served on various vessels during the civil war. He was present at the battle of Port Royal and at the siege of Charleston, and was attached to the North and South Atlantic squadrons until 1865, when he was detailed as assistant professor of natural and experimental philosophy at the U. S. naval academy in Annapolis, where he also lectured on chemistry. In 1870 he visited Europe for the purpose of studying the British iron manufacturing districts, and on 1 April, 1872, he resigned from the navy, after attaining the rank of 1st assistant engineer. Meanwhile, in 1871, he had been called to the chair of mechanical engineering at the Stevens institute of technology, where he remained until 1885, when he was appointed director of the Sibley college of Cornell university with the professorship of mechanical engineering. In 1871, on behalf of a committee of the American institute, he made a series of experiments on steam-boilers, in which for the first time all losses of heat were noted, and, by condensing all the steam that was generated, the quantity of water "entrained" by the steam was measured. Prof. Thurston was appointed a member of the U. S. commission to the World's fair in Vienna in 1873, and, besides serving on the international jury, edited the "Reports of the United States Commissioners to the International Exhibition, Vienna, 1873" (4 vols., Washington, 1875-'6), which includes his own special "Report on Machinery and Manufactures." He was a member of the U. S. commission on the causes of boiler-explosions, and of the U. S. board to test iron, steel, and other metals. His extensive knowledge of matters connected with mechanical engineering has led to his being called upon frequently to testify in court on disputed points as an expert. The degree of doctor of engineering was conferred on him by Stevens institute of technology in 1885, and he is a regular, honorary, or corresponding member of various scientific and technical societies at home and abroad. He was vice-president of the American association for the advancement of science in 1877-'8 and 1884, vice-president of the American institute of mining engineers in 1878-'9, and president of the American society of mechanical engineers in 1880-'3. Prof. Thurston has invented a magnesium burning-lamp, an autographic-recording testing-machine, a new form of steam-engine governor, an apparatus for determining the value of lubricants, and various other devices. He is the author of about 250 papers, including contributions to "The Popular Science Monthly," "Journal of the Franklin Institute," "Van Nostrand's Magazine," "Science," "The Forum," and like periodicals, and addresses before scientific and other societies. His books are "History of the Growth of the Steam-Engine" (New York, 1878); "Friction and Lubrication" (1879); "Materials of Engineering" (3 vols., 1884-'6); "Friction and Lost Work in Machinery and Mill Work" (1884); "Text-Book of the Materials of Construction" (1885); "Stationary Steam-Engines for Electric Lighting Purposes" (1884); "Steam-Boiler Explosions in Theory and in Practice" (1887); and "A Manual of Steam Boilers: their Design, Construction, and Management" (1888).

THURY, Pierre (tu-ry), French missionary, b. in Bayeux, France, about 1650; d. in the Penobscot mission, Me., or in Nova Scotia, 3 June, 1699. He studied for the priesthood in France, and, having volunteered for the American missions, went to Quebec, where he was ordained on 21 Dec., 1677. In 1684 he was sent by Bishop Laval to labor among the Indians of Acadia. After devoting a year to the exploration of the country, he founded the mission of St. Croix in 1685. In 1688 he was transferred to the Penobscot, where he gathered together an Indian colony at Panawaniské. His converts became noted for the fervor of their piety and devotion to the French, and in 1689 did the latter good service at the attack on Fort Pemaquid. He prepared prayers and hymns for their use in the Abnaki language. He was afterward sent to instruct the Indians of Nova Scotia. He returned to Maine and died there, according to some accounts, but others assert that he spent the rest of his life in Nova Scotia. See John G. Shea's "American Catholic Missions" (New York, 1854); Shea's "The Church in the Colonies" (1887); and Diereville's "Voyage" (Paris, 1708).

THWAITES, Reuben Gold, antiquary, b. in Boston, Mass., 15 May, 1853. In 1866 he removed to Oshkosh, Wis., where he studied in the intervals of farm-work, and, after teaching for a year, became editor of a newspaper in 1872. Subsequently he took a post-graduate course at Yale. From 1877 till 1886 he was connected with the "Wisconsin State Journal" as associate and afterward as managing editor, and conducted a news bureau at Madison. Having given much attention to the study of western history, especially that of Wisconsin, he was elected in 1887 corresponding secretary of the Wisconsin historical society, and editor of its publications. He is the author of "Historic Waterways: Six Hundred Miles of Canoeing down Rock, Fox, and Wisconsin Rivers" (Chicago, 1888).

THWING, Charles Franklin (twing), clergyman, b. in New Sharon, Me., 9 Nov., 1853. He was graduated at Harvard in 1876 and at Andover theological seminary in 1879, and was pastor of a Congregational church in Cambridge, Mass., till 1886, when he took charge of the Plymouth church in Minneapolis, Minn. He received the degree of D. D. from Chicago theological seminary in 1888. Dr. Thwing, who is associate editor of the "Bibliotheca Sacra," has been a contributor to magazines, and has published many sermons, and, in book-form, "American Colleges: their Students and Work" (New York, 1878); "Reading of Books: its Pleasures, Profits, and Perils" (Boston, 1883); in collaboration with Mrs. Carrie F. Butler-Thwing, "The Family: an Historical and Social Study" (1886); and "The Working Church" (New York, 1888).

TIBBITS, George, merchant, b. in Warwick, R. I., 14 Jan., 1763; d. in Troy, N. Y., 19 July, 1849. He established himself in business at Lansingburg, N. Y., at the age of twenty-one, and in 1797 removed to Troy. He was a member of the legislature in 1800, and two years later was elected to congress, serving from 17 Oct., 1803, till 3 March, 1805. From 1815 till 1818 he sat in the state senate, and he was the author of the financial plan that was adopted for raising means to build the Erie canal. In 1816 he was defeated as the Federalist candidate for lieutenant-governor. In 1824 he was a member of a commission on state prisons which reported in favor of the Auburn system, and during the next five years he acted on the commission that had charge of the construction of Sing Sing prison, and remedied abuses in the management of penitentiaries. From 1830 till 1836 he was mayor of Troy. He delivered addresses on agricultural subjects, and was one of the earliest American advocates of the economical policy of protection in essays that appeared in the Philadelphia "Inquirer" over the signature of "Cato." He published also "Memoir on Home Markets" (Philadelphia, 1827) and "Finances of the Canal Fund of the State of New York Examined" (Albany, 1829).—His grandson, William Badger, soldier, b. in Hoosick, N. Y., 31 March, 1837; d. in Troy, N. Y., 10 Feb., 1880, was graduated at Union in 1859, began the study of law, and engaged in manufacturing. At President Lincoln's first call for troops he recruited a company, and was mustered into the service as captain on 14 May, 1861. He was engaged at Big Bethel, Fair Oaks, Malvern Hill, Bristow Station, and the second battle of Bull Run, was promoted major of the 2d New York volunteer infantry on 13 Oct., 1862, participated in the battles of Fredericksburg and Chancellorsville, and, when his term of service expired, raised a regiment that was called the Griswold light cavalry, of which he was made colonel, his commission dating from 20 Nov., 1863. He served under Gen. Julius Stahel, first encountering the enemy at New Market on 15 May, 1864. He was present at Piedmont on 5 June, was constantly engaged during the following three months, taking part in numerous actions, and was brevetted brigadier-general of volunteers on 17 Nov. At the close of the war he was ordered to the west with his command. He was brevetted major-general of volunteers on 13 March, 1865, commissioned as brigadier-general on 18 Oct., 1865, and mustered out on 15 Jan., 1866, returning to Troy with health impaired by injuries received in the service.

TICHENOR, Isaac, jurist, b. in Newark, N. J., 8 Feb., 1754; d. in Bennington, Vt., 11 Dec., 1838. He was graduated at Princeton in 1775, began the study of law in Schenectady, N. Y., and in 1777 was appointed assistant commissary-general and stationed at Bennington. He remained there, was admitted to the bar, practised law, and took an active part in public affairs, serving as a member of the Vermont house of representatives in 1781-'4, agent of the state to congress in 1782, a state councillor in 1787-'92, a commissioner for the arrangement of the territorial dispute with New York in 1791, and a member of the state board of censors from 1792 till 1813. In 1791 he was appointed a judge of the supreme court of Vermont, becoming chief justice in 1795. In the following year he resigned to take his seat in the United States senate on 6 Dec., 1796. He was elected governor of Vermont, retiring from the senate on 10 Nov., 1797, and was continued in that office by re-election till 1807. In 1808 he was again elected governor and served one more term. In 1815 he was sent to the United States senate a second time, taking his seat on 4 Dec. of that year and serving till 3 March, 1821. The degree of LL. D. was conferred on him by Dartmouth in 1789.

TICKNOR, Caleb B., physician, b. in Salisbury, Conn., in 1805; d. in New York city, 19 Sept., 1840. He was educated for his profession in the Berkshire medical institution, and adopted the homœopathic system of medicine. In addition to many medical papers, he published "The Philosophy of Living, or the Way to Enjoy Life and its Comforts" (New York, 1836); "Popular Treatise on Medical Philosophy" (Andover, 1838); and "Guide to Mothers and Nurses" (1839).—His brother, BENAJAH, also studied medicine, and was a surgeon in the U. S. navy from 10 July, 1824, till his death, which occurred 20 Sept., 1857.

TICKNOR, Elisha, educator, b. in Lebanon, Conn., 25 March, 1757; d. in Hanover, N. H., 22 June, 1821. He was graduated at Dartmouth in 1783, and was connected with various schools, becoming in 1788 head master of Franklin grammar-school, Boston. After filling this post for several years, he resigned on account of his health. He made one of the earliest efforts to improve female education in Massachusetts, and originated the scheme for primary schools in Boston, proposing them at a town-meeting in 1818. He became a successful merchant in Boston, and founded the first insurance company and the first savings-bank in the city. In 1818 he presented a plan to prevent the causes and perfect the cure of pauperism in Boston.—His son, George, author, b. in Boston, Mass., 1 Aug., 1791; d. there, 26 Jan., 1871. From

after the usual term of preparation was admitted to the bar in 1813. But he was satisfied that his vocation, or at least his taste, lay in the direction of letters rather than of law. His father's circumstances were, fortunately, such as to enable the young student to consult his taste in the selection of his profession. In 1815 he went to Europe for study. Two years he passed at Göttingen, attending the lectures of the university and devoting himself to philological studies, especially to the ancient classics. Two years longer he remained in Europe, chiefly on the continent, passing most of his time in the capitals, as affording obvious advantages for a critical study of the national literatures. During his absence he was, in 1817, appointed to fill the chair of modern languages and literature in Harvard. In 1819 he returned to the United States, bringing with him a valuable library. This in time grew to be one of the largest private collections in the country, and, for the rarity and importance of the books, was unsurpassed, in some of its departments. This is especially true of the collection of Spanish literature, which rivalled the best private ones in Europe. Mr. Ticknor, during his connection with the university, gave long and elaborate courses of lectures on French and Spanish literature. He also entered into a critical analysis of such writers as Dante, Goethe, Milton, and Shakespeare. The audience of the lectures, instead of being confined to students, was increased by persons without the walls of the college, who were attracted not merely by the interest of the subject, but by the skill of the critic, his luminous and often eloquent diction, and his impressive delivery. After holding his office for fifteen years, Mr. Ticknor resigned it in 1835, preparatory to another visit to Europe, where he proposed to spend several years with his family. His labors had been attended with signal benefit to the university. He was the first professor on the Smith foundation, and the duty devolved on him of giving a complete organization to the department, which includes several teachers. Moreover, during his connection with Harvard, he suggested valuable improvements in the system of discipline, for which he had derived the hints from the German universities. Finally, he had greatly extended the range of intellectual culture among the students at the university, where literary instruction had hitherto been confined to the classics. Mr. Ticknor was a founder of the Boston public library, and president of its board of trustees in 1864-'6, and gave to it his Spanish library. Mr. Ticknor spent three years in his second visit to Europe, and after his return set about the preparation of his great work. At the close of 1849 the "History of Spanish Literature" made its appearance in England and the United States. Humboldt, in a letter dated 19 June, 1850, shortly after its publication, pronounced its panegyric in a single sentence, declaring it "a masterly work." The judgment of the illustrious German was speedily confirmed both in Europe and in this country. The nature of the subject, it might be thought, would have restricted the demand for the book to a comparatively small number of readers. But the extent of the sales proved the contrary, confirming the remark of the "Edinburgh Review" (October, 1850), that, perhaps of all compositions of the kind, Mr. Ticknor's work has the most successfully combined popularity of style with sound criticism and extensive research within its own department. The edition that was published in England met with the most cordial reception from the scholars of that country, while in Germany and in Spain translations soon appeared, under the auspices of eminent men of letters, who have added to the value of their labors by their own annotations. Although purporting to be simply a history of literature, the work exhibits vividly the social civilization of the peninsula; and, independently of its stores of bibliographical information for the use of the scholar, it will be no less serviceable to the student of history who would acquaint himself with the character and condition of the Spaniard, and see in what manner they have been affected by the peculiar institutions of the country. The first edition of the "History of Spanish Literature" (3 vols., New York and London, 1849) was followed by a second (3 vols., 1854) and by a third American edition, corrected and enlarged (3 vols., Boston, 1863). A fourth edition, containing Mr. Ticknor's last revisions, has appeared since his death. To these are to be added the following translations: "Historia de la Literatura Española, por M. G. Ticknor; traducida al Castellano, con Adiciones y Notas críticas, por Don Pascual de Gayangos y Don Enrique de Vedia" (4 vols., Madrid, 1851-'7); "Geschichte der schönen Literatur in Spanien, von Georg Ticknor; Deutsch mit Zusätzen, herausgegeben von Nicholaus Heinrich Julius" (2 vols., Leipsic, 1852). Mr. Ticknor's great work was preceded by several minor publications, including "Syllabus of a Course of Lectures on the History and Criticism of Spanish Literature" (Cambridge, 1823); "Outline of the Principal Events in the Life of General Lafayette" (Boston, 1825; London, 1826; in French, Paris, 1825); "Remarks on Changes lately proposed or adopted in Harvard University" (Cambridge, 1825); "Report of the Board of Visitors on the United States Military Academy at West Point for 1826"; "The Remains of Nathan Appleton Haven, with a Memoir of his Life" (1827); and other publications. He also published a "Life of William Hickling Prescott" (Boston, 1864). See his "Life, Letters, and Journals" (2 vols., Boston, 1876).

TICKNOR, George, journalist, b. in Boston, Mass., 14 April, 1822; d. in Keene, N. H., 25 Dec., 1866. He was graduated at Dartmouth in 1847, studied law in Franklin, N. H., was admitted to the bar in 1850, and began practice in Hanover, but in the following year removed to Claremont. He was solicitor for Sullivan county from 1855 till 1859, and about 1860 settled in Keene and purchased a large interest in the "New Hampshire Sentinel," which he edited during the remainder of his days. He published "Gazetteer and Biographical Sketches of New Hampshire."

TICKNOR, William Davis, publisher, b. in Lebanon, N. H., 6 Aug., 1810; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 10 April, 1864. In youth he was employed in the office of his uncle, Benjamin, a money-broker, and he afterward became teller in the old Columbian bank of Boston. He began the business of a publisher in Boston in 1832, in connection with John Allen, under the firm-name of Allen and Ticknor, successors of the old publishing-house of Carter, Hendee, and Co. In the following year Mr. Allen retired, leaving Mr. Ticknor to carry on the business for twelve years. This he did under his own name, which will be found on the title-pages of the early American editions of Tennyson and many New England authors. In 1845 John Reed and James T. Fields became his partners, and the imprint was changed to Ticknor, Reed, and Fields, but the legal firm-name remained William D. Ticknor and Co. during Mr. Ticknor's lifetime. On the retirement of Mr. Reed, in 1854, the style became Ticknor and Fields, continuing as such for about ten years. During this period the last-named firm purchased and continued to publish the "Atlantic Monthly" and the "North American Review." On the death of Mr. Ticknor his interest was continued in behalf of his son, Howard M., and James R. Osgood. Among the important events of this epoch were the establishment of "Our Young Folks" (1864), edited by Howard M. Ticknor, and of "Every Saturday" (1866), edited by Thomas Bailey Aldrich. In 1868 the younger Ticknor retired, and a new copartnership was formed among the other members, under the firm-name of Fields, Osgood, and Co. In 1870 Benjamin H. Ticknor was admitted, and in 1871 Mr. Fields withdrew, when the firm became James R. Osgood and Co. In 1885 it became Ticknor and Co., consisting of Benjamin H. and Thomas B.

Ticknor and George F. Godfrey. From the beginning the publications of the house were characterized by intrinsic merit and by the neatness and correctness of their typography. The interests of American writers met with unusual consideration, and it became a mark of distinction for young writers to have secured them as publishers. William D. Ticknor was one of the first of American publishers to make payment for the works of foreign authors, beginning with £100 to Tennyson in 1842. The house always continued this custom, and it is probably not too much to say that its example did more than any other one thing to establish a principle that is now so generally recognized and acted upon. For three decades the curtained office of their establishment in the quaint old building at the corner of Washington and School streets, seen in the illustration, was the resort of Dickens, Emerson, Hawthorne, Holmes, Longfellow, Lowell, Sumner, Thackeray, Whipple, and Whittier. This building (the oldest but one now standing in Boston), one of the landmarks of the city, was built immediately after the great fire of 1711, and was occupied for various domestic and mercantile purposes, at one time being an apothecary-shop kept by the father of James Freeman Clarke, until in 1828 it became the book-store of Carter, Hendee, and Co., from whom it passed to Allen and Ticknor. It remained in the hands of William D. Ticknor and his immediate successors until 1866, when increasing business required their removal to Tremont street; but it is still a book-store.

TIDBALL, John Caldwell, soldier, b. in Ohio county, Va. (now W. Va.), 25 Jan., 1825. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1848, being assigned to the 3d artillery. He served at the various stations of his regiment until 1861, when, having attained the rank of captain, he was placed in command of a battery, and engaged in the principal actions of the Army of the Potomac from the battle of Bull Run until and including the battle of Gettysburg in 1863. During the latter part of the campaign in Pennsylvania Capt. Tidball commanded a brigade of horse artillery. He was appointed colonel of the 4th New York volunteer artillery, 28 Aug., 1863, and commanded the artillery of the 2d corps of the Army of the Potomac during the Richmond campaign, including the battles of the Wilderness and the siege of Petersburg. He was commandant of cadets at West Point from 10 July till 22 Sept., 1864, and led the artillery of the 9th corps from 9 Oct., 1864, till 2 April, 1865, in the operations that terminated in the surrender of Lee at Appomattox. After he was mustered out of the volunteer service he commanded his battery at the presidio of San Francisco until his promotion in February, 1867, to major of the 2d artillery, thence serving in command of the district of Astoria and Alaska, and the post of Raleigh, N. C., and as superintendent of artillery instruction at the U. S. artillery-school at Fort Monroe, Va., till January, 1880. He was then appointed aide-de-camp to the general of the army, with rank of colonel, serving until 8 Feb., 1884. He became lieutenant-colonel of the 3d artillery, 30 June, 1882, and colonel of the 1st artillery, 22 March, 1885, and has commanded the artillery-school and post of Fort Monroe since 1 Nov., 1883. In 1889 he will be retired from active service. He has received the brevets of brigadier-general of volunteers for gallant and distinguished services at Spottsylvania, major-general of volunteers for services at Fort Sedgwick, major in the regular army for Gaines's Mills, lieutenant-colonel for Antietam, colonel for gallantry at Fort Stedman, and brigadier-general, 13 March, 1865, for gallant and meritorious services during the rebellion. Gen. Tidball is the author of a "Manual of Heavy Artillery Service" which has been adopted by the war department (Washington, 1880).

TIEBOUT, Cornelius, engraver, b. in New York in 1777; d. in Kentucky about 1830. At an early age he exhibited a taste for drawing, and while an apprentice with a silver-smith made some attempts at engraving on copper. In 1794 he engraved several heads for William Dunlap's "German Theatre." The next year he went to London to receive instruction in the art from James Heath, being the first American to go abroad to study engraving, and returned at the end of two years very much improved. He chose Philadelphia for his residence, and there he published his chief works. He worked in the stipple or chalk manner, and was an artist of no mean merit. Among his folio plates are portraits of Washington, Gen. Horatio Gates, John Jay, and Bishop White, after Gilbert Stuart; and Thomas Jefferson, after Rembrandt Peale. After accumulating some property, Tiebout engaged in business ventures for which he was not fitted by experience or education, and lost all. He then removed to Kentucky.

TIERNAN, Luke, merchant, b. in County Meath, Ireland, in 1757; d. in Baltimore, Md., 10 Nov., 1839. He came in 1787 to the United States, and settled first at Hagerstown, Md., but soon removed to Baltimore, where he engaged in the shipping business, being the first in that city to engage in the direct trade between Baltimore and Liverpool. He took a deep interest in the prosperity of his adopted city and in politics. He was a Whig, and a warm personal friend of Henry Clay, who frequently visited his house, and spoke of him as the patriarch of the Whig party in Maryland. He was a presidential elector, voting for John Quincy Adams in 1824, and one of the founders of the Hibernian society of Maryland, and for many years its president. In 1826-'7 he was one of a committee to urge upon the legislature of Maryland the incorporation of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad company, the first railroad company incorporated in this country, and he was also a member of the committee of the Washington monument of Baltimore.

TIFFANY, Alexander Ralston, jurist, b. in Niagara, Upper Canada, 16 Oct., 1796; d. in Palmyra, Mich., 14 Jan., 1868. He learned the printer's trade in the office of the "Canadian Constellation," published by his father, Sylvester, and removed with him to Canandaigua, N. Y., previous to the war of 1812. He studied law, was admitted to the bar, and practised at Palmyra, Wayne co., N. Y., and became associate judge of the county. He removed to Palmyra, Mich., in 1832, became prosecuting attorney of Lenawee county in 1834, was elected judge of probate in 1836 and in 1840, county judge of Lenawee county in 1844, re-elected in 1848, and served until this court was abolished by the constitution of 1850. He was a member of the Constitutional convention of 1850, and of the legislature, where he was chairman of the judiciary committee in 1855. He published "The Justice's Guide" (Detroit, 1855); "Criminal Law" (1860); and "Form-Book for Attorneys in Michigan" (1860).

TIFFANY, Charles Louis, jeweler, b. in Killingly, Conn., 15 Feb., 1812. He received an academic education, and then entered the cotton-mill of his father. In 1837 he came to New York city without means, and established with John B. Young a fancy-goods and stationery store at 259 Broadway. The capital for the enterprise, $1,000, was lent to the young men by Mr. Tiffany's father. They invested their money in various novel goods, including Chinese curiosities. Success favored the new house, and in 1841 the firm became Tiffany, Young, and Ellis, by the admission of the latter as a partner. During the same year Mr. Young was sent abroad to select novelties and establish closer relations with European houses. The firm moved to 271 Broadway in 1847, and then began the manufacture of gold jewelry. During the disturbances in Europe in 1848, diamonds declined fifty per cent. in Paris, and, taking advantage of this, they made large purchases. In 1851 they began the manufacture of sterling silver ware. Various changes in the firm resulted in the establishment of a Paris branch, and the firm-name in New York became Tiffany and Co. The salesrooms were moved to 550 Broadway in 1851, and during the civil war a large business was carried on in the manufacture of swords and similar articles. At the World's fair in Paris in 1867 their exhibit received the first award. The building which they now occupy on Union square was erected for their accommodation in 1867, and the firm was incorporated as a stock company in 1868. The products of their manufacture received the highest honors at the World's fairs in Philadelphia in 1876, and again in Paris in 1878. Mr. Tiffany has been honored with testimonials by foreign powers, and he has been decorated by the French and Russian governments. He is active in the affairs of New York city, and is a liberal patron of art. His residence, among the finest in the country, is situated on Madison avenue near Central park, and is represented in the accompanying illustration.—His son, Louis Comfort, artist, b. in New York, 18 Feb., 1848, studied under George Inness and Samuel Colman, subsequently under Léon Bailly in Paris, and during five years travelled and sketched in Europe and Africa. In 1870 he became a member of the Water-color society; the following year he was elected an associate of the National academy, and he became an academicien in 1880. He is also a member of the Society of American artists. Among his works in oil are "Fruit-Vender, under the Sea-Wall at Nassau" (1870); "Market-Day, Morlaix," and "Duane Street, New York" (1878); and "Bow-Zarea, Algiers." His water-colors include "Meditation" (1872); "Shop in Switzerland," "Old and New Mosques at Cairo," and "Lazy Life in the East" (1876); "Algiers" (1877); and "Cobblers at Borifarik" (1878). He devotes much time to decorative work, and has furnished many cartoons and designs for windows for the Tiffany glass company, of which he is the founder. The interior work of his father's house in New York was executed under his supervision.

TIFFANY, Osmond, author, b. in Baltimore, Md., 16 July, 1823. He was educated at Baltimore and studied at Harvard in 1840-'2, but was not graduated. He afterward engaged in mercantile and literary work, was ordnance clerk at the U. S. armory in Springfield, Mass., in 1862-'3, and paymaster's clerk in the U. S. army in 1863-'4, and has been custom-house liquidating clerk at Baltimore since 1869. He has contributed to periodicals and published "The Canton Chinese, or the Americans' Sojourn in the Celestial Empire" (Boston, 1849); "Brandon, a Tale of the American Colonies" (New York, 1851); and "Sketch of the Life of Gen. Otho H. Williams" (Baltimore, 1851). He has edited "Patriarchs and Prophets of Biblical Story" (Springfield, Mass., 1860).

TIFFIN, Edward, statesman, b. in Carlisle, England, 19 June, 1766; d. in Chillicothe, Ohio, 9 Aug., 1829. After receiving an ordinary English education, he began the study of medicine, and continued it after his removal to Charlestown, Va., in 1784, receiving his degree at the University of Pennsylvania in 1789. In the same year he married Mary, sister of Gov. Thomas Worthington. In 1790 he united with the Methodist church, and soon afterward he became a local preacher, being ordained deacon, by Bishop Asbury, 19 Nov., 1792. In 1796 he removed to Chillicothe, Ohio, where he continued both to preach and to practise medicine. At Deer Creek, twelve miles distant, he organized a flourishing congregation, long before that part of the country was visited by travelling preachers. In 1799 he was chosen to the legislature of the Northwest territory, of which he was elected speaker, and in 1802 he was president of the convention that formed the constitution of the state of Ohio. He was elected the first governor of the state in 1803, and re-elected two years later. During his second term he arrested the expedition of Aaron Burr, near Marietta, Ohio. After the expiration of his service he was chosen U. S. senator, to succeed his brother-in-law, Thomas Worthington, and took his seat in December, 1807, but early in the following year his wife died, and on 3 March, 1809, he resigned from the senate and retired to private life. Shortly afterward he married again, and was elected to the legislature, serving two terms as speaker. In the autumn of 1810 he resumed the practice of medicine at Chillicothe, and in 1812, on the creation by act of congress of a commissionership of the general land-office, he was appointed by President Madison as its first incumbent. He removed to Washington, organized the system that has continued in the land-office till the present time, and in 1814 was active in the removal of his papers to Virginia, whereby the entire contents of his office were saved from destruction by the British. Wishing to return to the west, he proposed to Josiah Meigs, surveyor-general of public lands northwest of Ohio river, that they should exchange offices, which was done, after the consent of the president and senate had been obtained. This post he held till 1 July, 1829, when he received, on his death-bed, an order from President Jackson to deliver the office to a successor. Dr. Tiffin continued to preach occasionally in his later years. Three of his sermons were published in the "Ohio Conference Offering" in 1851. In a letter of introduction to Gen. Arthur St. Clair, Gen. Washington speaks of Dr. Tiffin as being "very familiar with law."

TILDEN, ———, poet, b. in 1686; d. about 1766. He was the author of "Tilden's Miscellaneous Poems on Divers Occasions, chiefly to animate and rouse the Soldiers" (1756). This little volume of thirty pages was one of the first of the productions that were written with a view to stimulate the soldiers in the French war. A copy of this rare book was in the library of George Ticknor, of Boston, and the whole of it appeared in the New York "Historical Magazine" for November and December, 1859, and January, 1860.

TILDEN, Samuel Jones, statesman, b. in New Lebanon, N. Y., 9 Feb., 1814; d. at his country-house, Graystone, Westchester co., N. Y., 4 Aug., 1886. The name of an ancestor, Nathaniel Tilden of Tenterden, yeoman, and that of Lydia, his wife, with seven children and seven servants, head the list of "such persons as embarked themselves in the good ship called the 'Hercules,' . . . to be therein transported to the plantation called New England in America," from the port of Sandwich, England, in March, 1634. This Nathaniel Tilden had been mayor of Tenterden, as had been his uncle John before him, and as was his cousin John after him. He settled with his family at Scituate, whence the second generation of Tildens migrated to Lebanon, Conn. To Isaac Tilden, the great-grandfather of Samuel J., was born at this place, in 1729, a son named John, who settled in what was afterward called New Lebanon, Columbia co., N. Y. Samuel J.'s father, Elam, the youngest of John Tilden's seven children, was born in 1781, and in 1802 married Polly Y. Jones, a descendant of William Jones, lieutenant-governor of the colony of New Haven. Eight children were born of this union, of whom Samuel J. was the fifth. The boy early developed great activity of mind and a remarkable command of language. His father, a farmer, who also carried on a mercantile business, was an intimate friend of Martin Van Buren, and the political controversy of the time was part of the very atmosphere of the Tilden household. In his eighteenth year Samuel prepared an address, which was adopted as a party manifesto by the Democrats, in regard to the issues of the pending state election. In the same year he entered Yale college, but almost at the outset his studies were interrupted by feeble health. He resumed them in 1834, when he entered the University of New York. Here he completed his academic education, and devoted himself to the study of law. While in college he wrote a series of papers in defence of President Van Buren's policy in regard to the United States bank. He made a more elaborate plea for the independent treasury system, as opposed to the union of bank and state, in a speech delivered to his neighbors at New Lebanon in October, 1840.

On his admission to the bar, Mr. Tilden began practice in New York city, but continued to take an active part in politics. He was elected to the assembly in 1845, and while there was chairman of a committee appointed to inquire into the causes of the anti-rent disorders, and the masterly report on the whole subject of the great leasehold estates and their tenants was almost entirely his work. He was a member of the Constitutional convention of 1846. The three most memorable cases in which he was employed as a lawyer were the trial of the contested election of his friend, Azariah C. Flagg, as comptroller of New York city, the opposition on the part of the heirs of the murdered Dr. Burdell to Mrs. Cunningham's application for letters of administration on his estate, and the defence of the Pennsylvania coal company to the claim of the Delaware and Hudson canal company for payment of extra tolls. The hearing of the last-named consumed seventy days, and Mr. Tilden's argument in the case was a marvel of analytical ingenuity and constructive ability. From 1855, more than half of the great railway corporations north of the Ohio and between the Hudson and Missouri rivers were at some time clients of Mr. Tilden's. He was the author of many of the plans of reorganization that were rendered necessary by the early financial necessities of these companies. He took part in the Free-soil revolt within the Democratic party in 1848. In 1851 he made a strong plea for respect to the constitution in dealing with the question of improvements on the state canals. In 1855 he was the candidate for attorney-general on the ticket of the "Soft-Shell" Democrats. Throughout the civil war he maintained that the struggle against the Confederacy could be successfully waged without resorting to extra-constitutional modes of action. By 1868 Mr. Tilden had definitely assumed the leadership of the Democratic party in New York state. To the enactment of what was known as "the Tweed charter" of 1870, which confirmed the control of a corrupt ring over the government and revenues of New York city, Mr. Tilden offered the most determined opposition. To the side-partners of Tweed, the almost equally notorious persons who were engaged, by the aid of courts, in plundering the stockholders of the Erie railway, Mr. Tilden had made himself similarly obnoxious. He was one of the founders of the Bar association, which was an organized protest against the perversion of the machinery of justice accomplished by judges George G. Barnard and Albert Cardozo and their allies. In the impeachment proceedings against these judges in 1872 Mr. Tilden's was the directing mind, and it was mainly for this purpose that he agreed to serve as a member of the assembly. On the exposure of the methods of plunder of the Tweed ring, which was made in the columns of the New York "Times" in July, 1871, Mr. Tilden undertook, through an examination of the bank-accounts of the chief members of the combination, a legal demonstration of the share of the spoil received by each, and the tables presented with his affidavit furnished the basis of the civil and criminal proceedings brought against the ring and its agents. He threw all his energy into the prosecution of suits in the name of the state against the men who had seized the machinery of local justice, and he resisted successfully the efforts of the ring and the politicians in its service to retain their hold on the state Democratic organization in the autumn of 1871. In 1874 he was the Democratic candidate for governor, and was elected by a plurality of 50,000 over Gov. John A. Dix. His special message to the legislature on the extravagance and dishonesty that had characterized the management of the canals made a deep impression. During his administration the new capitol building at Albany was begun (see illustration), which has cost $17,000,000, but is not finished.

In June, 1876, the National Democratic convention, assembled at St. Louis, nominated him for the presidency. (For an account of the election and its results, see HAYES, RUTHERFORD B.) As finally declared, the electoral vote was 185 for Mr. Hayes and 184 for Mr. Tilden. The popular vote, as counted, gave Tilden 4,284,265; Hayes, 4,033,295; Cooper, 81,737; Smith, 9,522. Mr. Tilden was opposed to the electoral commission, declaring his belief in "the exclusive jurisdiction of the two houses to count the electoral votes by their own servants and under such instruction as they might deem proper to give." From that time till the end of his life he was first among the leaders of the national Democracy, and the pressure for his renomination in 1880 became so great that his friends, who knew his fixed determination not to be a candidate, appealed to him for a formal announcement of his resolution, addressed to the delegates from his own state. Four years later this declaration had to be repeated. His last important contribution to the history of his time was a communication addressed to John G. Carlisle, speaker of the house of representatives, in regard to the urgent necessity of liberal appropriations for such a system of coast defences as would place the United States in a position of comparative safety against naval attack. Under the provisions of Mr. Tilden's will, the greater portion of his fortune (which was estimated at $5,000,000) was devoted to public uses, the chief of which was the establishment and endowment in the city of New York of a free public library; but the will was contested by his relatives. He never married. His life was written by Theodore P. Cook (New York, 1876), and his writings edited by John Bigelow (2 vols., 1885).—Mr. Tilden's elder brother, Moses Y. (1812-'76), was a member of the legislature in 1869, and became known by his persistent opposition to the Tweed ring. With his brother he built the Lebanon Springs railroad.

TILGHMAN, James, lawyer, b. at the Hermitage, his family-seat, on Chester river, Md., 6 Dec., 1716; d. in Chestertown, Md., 24 Aug., 1793. He was the grandson of Richard Tilghman, an eminent surgeon of London, who was one of those that petitioned for the life of King Charles I. and who emigrated to Maryland in 1660 and settled the Hermitage, which has ever since remained in the possession of his descendants. James studied law and entered on its practice at Annapolis, Md., whence he removed to Philadelphia about 1760. He was asked by John Penn in 1765 to become secretary of the land-office of Pennsylvania. Stipulating for a salary of £300 besides certain fees, he accepted the post and held it until the Revolution. He was chosen a common councilman of Philadelphia in 1764, and in 1767 became a member of the provincial council, which office he also held until the Revolution. At its beginning his views were liberal. He wished a repeal of the obnoxious acts of parliament, and thought the Boston port bill an outrage, but condemned the "Boston tea-party," and finally came to be regarded as a loyalist. On the approach of the British toward Philadelphia, he among others was placed under arrest by the authorities of the state and gave his parole. Permission was granted him, 31 Aug., 1777, to visit his family in Maryland and return within a month, before the end of which the British occupied Philadelphia, so he remained in Maryland. On 16 May, 1778, he was discharged from parole.—James's brother, Matthew, patriot, b. at the Hermitage, Queen Anne county, Md., 17 Feb., 1718; d. there, 4 May, 1790, in 1741 married his cousin, Anne Lloyd, and was commissioned commander of a troop of horse for protecting the outlying settlements from the Indians, and also one "of the worshipful, the commissioners and justices of the peace for Talbot county." He was elected delegate to the general assembly of Maryland in 1751, and continued to be a member of the house of delegates until the provincial government was superseded by the state organization, 5 Feb., 1777. He was a member of the committee that was appointed in May, 1768, by the general assembly of Maryland to draft an address to the king protesting against the stamp-act. He was speaker of the house of delegates in 1773-'5 and president of the Revolutionary convention which from 1774 till 1777 controlled the province and directed its government. He was the chairman of the committee on correspondence that was appointed in December, 1774, and of the council of safety of July, 1775, and was chairman of every delegation that was sent by the convention of president of the convention that framed the first constitution for the new state of Maryland. This circumstance alone prevented him from attaching his name to the Declaration of Independence, which he advocated both at Philadelphia and at Annapolis. He continued to represent his state in congress until 1777, when he resigned to accept the post to which he had been elected as senator from Talbot county in the senate of Maryland. He was re-elected in 1781, but resigned before his term had expired. His wisdom, courage, purity of character, and ability won for him the name of the patriarch of Maryland, and his influence was second to that of no man in forming the institutions and organizing the government of the new state. By his contemporaries he was considered one of the firmest and ablest advocates of civil and religious liberty of his time.—James's son, William, jurist, b. in Talbot county, Md., 12 Aug., 1756; d. in Philadelphia, 30 April, 1827, studied law under Benjamin Chew, after the family had removed to Philadelphia, and was admitted to the Maryland bar in 1783 and sat in the legislature for several years after 1788. He began to practise in Philadelphia in 1793, was appointed chief judge of the U. S. circuit court, 3 March, 1801, but resumed practice when the law establishing the office was repealed in the following year. In July, 1805, he was appointed president of the court of common pleas in the first district, and in February, 1806, he became chief justice of the state supreme court. He was elected president of the American philosophical society in 1824. By direction of the legislature he prepared in 1809 a report of the English statutes in force in Pennsylvania. He published "Eulogium in Commemoration of Dr. Caspar Wistar," delivered before the Philosophical society of Philadelphia (1818), and "Address before the Philadelphia Society for Promoting Agriculture" (1820).—Another son of James, Tench, soldier, b. in Talbot county, Md., 25 Dec., 1744; d. in Baltimore, Md., 18 April, 1786, began life as a merchant in Philadelphia, but at the beginning of the Revolution became lieutenant in a company from Philadelphia that was known as the Ladies' light infantry. He was appointed secretary and treasurer to the commission that was sent by congress, 13 July, 1775, to treat with the Six Nations and other northern Indians, joined the army under Washington early in 1776 as captain of a company of infantry from Pennsylvania, and in August, 1776, became military secretary and aide upon the commander-in-chief's staff. He served in this post to the end of the war, participating in all the principal battles in which the army was engaged. On 30 May, 1781, he was commissioned lieutenant-colonel, to take rank from 1 April, 1777, having, with great delicacy, declined to rank from an earlier date to which he was entitled, because he would thereby take precedence of his seniors in the service. On the surrender of Cornwallis he was selected by Washington to bear his despatch to congress announcing that event. Leaving Yorktown, 19 Oct., he reached Philadelphia at midnight on 23 Oct., when his news that "Cornwallis is taken" was immediately proclaimed by the watchman. He was voted the thanks of congress, a sword, and a horse with accoutrements, for this service. After the war he became a merchant in Baltimore. He married Anna Maria, daughter of his uncle Matthew.—William's cousin, Edward, lawyer, b. in Wye, Md., 11 Dec., 1750; d. 1 Nov., 1815, was educated in Philadelphia and studied in the Middle Temple, London, in 1772-'4. He was for many years a successful practitioner at the Philadelphia

bar, and on the death of Chief-Justice Edward Shippen the office was tendered to him. He declined it, but recommended for the office his kinsman, William.—Matthew's great-grandson, Lloyd, soldier, b. in Talbot county, Md., in 1816; d. near Vicksburg, Miss., 16 May, 1863, entered the U. S. military academy, was graduated in 1836, and assigned to the 1st dragoons. He became full 2d lieutenant, 4 July, 1836, but resigned on 30 Sept. and entered on the business of a civil engineer. He was division engineer of the Baltimore and Susquehanna railroad in 1836-'7, of the Norfolk and Wilmington canal in 1837-'8, the Eastern Shore railroad of Maryland in 1838-'9, and the Baltimore and Ohio railroad in 1839-'40. He served in the war with Mexico as volunteer aide to Gen. David E. Twiggs at the battles of Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma, and was captain of the Maryland and District of Columbia battalion of volunteers from 14 Aug., 1847, until it was disbanded, 13 July, 1848. He then served as principal assistant engineer of the Panama division of the Isthmus railroad, and was engineer on southern railroads till 1859. He joined the Confederate army in 1861, was commissioned brigadier-general in 1862, and surrendered at Fort Henry in February of that year. He was exchanged in July, and killed at the battle of Champion Hill.—Tench, soldier, great-grandson of James's brother Richard, b. in Plimhimmon, Talbot co., Md., 25 March, 1810; d. in Baltimore, Md., 22 Dec., 1874, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1832, and was assigned to the 4th artillery, but resigned, 30 Nov., 1833, and was a farmer at Oxford, Md., till his death. He was brigadier-general of Maryland militia in 1837-'60 and major-general in 1860-'1, state commissioner of public works in 1841-'51, and superintendent of the military department of the Maryland military academy, Oxford, in 1847-'57. In 1849-'50 he was U. S. consul at Mayaguez, Porto Rico. He projected the Maryland and Delaware railroad, was unwearied in his efforts to build it, and served as its president in 1855-'61. In 1858-'60 he was president of the National agricultural society. Gen. Tilghman was for many years at the head of the Maryland Society of the Cincinnati, and at his death he was also treasurer-general of the order in the United States. From 1857 till 1860 he was collector of customs for the port of Oxford, Md.—His kinsman, Richard Lloyd, naval officer, great-grandson of James's brother, William, b. in Kent county, Md., 20 April, 1810; d. in 1867, entered the U. S. navy as a midshipman, 27 Oct., 1830, promoted to lieutenant, 8 Sept., 1841, and during the Mexican war served with Com. Robert F. Stockton in the Pacific in the "Congress" and "Cyane," and participating in the conquest of California, the capture of Mazatlan, Guaymas, and La Paz, and in the operations incident to these victories. He commanded the brig "Perry" on the Brazil station from 1857 till 1860, during the Paraguayan war. He returned home during the excitement before the civil war, on 23 April, 1861, resigned from the navy, and died soon after the close of the war.

TILLEY, Jean Le Gardeur, Chevalier de, French naval officer; b. in Quebec, Canada, in 1740; d. in Canada after 1792. His family were Canadian pioneers, and had served with credit in the wars against the Iroquois and the English. A Le Gardeur de Tilley was a missionary among the Illinois in 1660, and another was a member of the council of Bishop Laval Montmorency. A member of another branch, Le Gardeur de Saint Pierre (q. v.) was on Ohio river in 1753. Tilley entered the navy early in life and rose rapidly in the service, being a commander at the beginning of the war for independence. He served from 1778 till 1783 under De Guichen, De Grasse, La Motte-Picquet and Vaudreuil, and commanded in a cruise along the Canadian coast, securing many prizes. In 1781 he was in command of the squadron that pursued Benedict Arnold in Chesapeake bay, and he took the "Romulus" and several transports. He was promoted knight of Saint Louis and brigadier-general of the naval forces after the conclusion of peace, and rose afterward to the rank of chef d'escadre, commanding in 1789 the squadron at Rochefort. In 1791 he left France and returned to Canada, where he died.

TILLEY, Sir Samuel Leonard, Canadian statesman, b. in Gagetown, Queen's co., New Brunswick, 8 May, 1818. His father was Thomas Morgan Tilley, and his grandfather, Samuel, was a loyalist, who, at the close of the American Revolution, left Brooklyn, N. Y., and settled in New Brunswick, becoming a grantee of the city of St. John. The family is of Dutch extraction. Young

Tilley was educated at the county grammar-school, but at the age of twelve he was obliged to leave his home and seek employment. He went to St. John and entered a drug-store as an apprentice. After duly serving his time he went into business on his own account with Thomas W. Peters. He joined a debating society, and became a warm and uncompromising exponent of the temperance cause. Throughout his life he has remained a total abstainer. In 1849 Mr. Tilley's name first appears in connection with the politics of his native province, when, espousing the side of the protectionists of that day, he nominated and aided in electing a candidate for the legislature. Toward the close of the year he took an active part in forming the New Brunswick railway league, which had for its object the construction of a line of railway from St. John to Shediac. At the general election of 1850 he was nominated a candidate for St. John in the reform interest. In June he was elected to a seat in the house of assembly. In 1851, however, the Liberals experienced a serious reverse, two of the leading members of their party having deserted to the other side. Mr. Tilley and two of his friends resigned, and he did not return to public life until 1854, when his old constituency re-elected him. In November he entered the cabinet of the Liberal administration, and from that day to the present time (1888) he has enjoyed, save in two periods of a few months' duration, uninterrupted power as minister or governor. In 1856 he was beaten at the polls on the prohibitory liquor-law question, when his ministry made the subject a direct issue. The new government repealed the act, but was unable to maintain itself in office longer than a year, when, a dissolution occurring, the Liberals were again returned to power, and Mr. Tilley was reinstated in his old post as provincial secretary. Shortly afterward he became premier. From June, 1857, till March, 1865, Mr. Tilley remained leader. In 1864 he went to Charlottetown,

S. Tilley

Prince Edward island, to attend the conference of maritime parliamentarians, with a view to forming a legislative union of the three provinces by the sea—Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward island. Several members of the Canadian government, among whom was Sir John A. Macdonald, being on a visit to the lower provinces and hearing of the proposed meeting, expressed a desire to be present. Invitations were sent to them; they attended, and succeeded in inducing the delegates to abandon the smaller scheme and meet later in the year at Quebec, where a grander union would be proposed and discussed. The greater assembly accordingly met on 10 Oct., and sat with closed doors until the 27th of the month, when the famous "Quebec scheme" was completed. In the framing of those resolutions, which now form the basis of the British North America act, Mr. Tilley took an active part. In March, at the general elections, Mr. Tilley submitted the question to the people; but he, and his party suffered defeat. Notwithstanding the premier's strong personal popularity in his own constituency, the majority of votes cast against him in 1865 was very large, but in the following year the new government resigned, and the majority was reversed. Delegates from Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick were sent to London to complete the terms of union, and at this conference Mr. Tilley ably represented his province. For his services he was made a companion of the Bath (civil) by the queen, and on resigning his seat in the New Brunswick house of assembly for a seat in the house of commons at Ottawa he was sworn in as a member of the Canadian privy council, and appointed minister of customs in the first cabinet of the Dominion. From November, 1868, till April, 1869, he was acting minister of public works, and on 22 Feb., 1873, he was made minister of finance in succession to Sir Francis Hincks. This important portfolio he held until the fall of the Macdonald government on 5 Nov. of the same year. Before leaving office Sir John Macdonald appointed his colleague lieutenant-governor of New Brunswick, which office he filled with great acceptance until 11 July, 1878, and though it is said a second term was offered to him by the MacKenzie administration, he declined it, and accepted the nomination of the Conservative party for a seat in the house of commons. He ran in his old constituency, St. John, and narrowly escaped defeat, his majority being but nine votes. This was doubtless due to the stand that he took on the tariff question, which was declared to be a high protective one, and framed to protect the Canadian manufactures. The platform of the Conservatives obtained throughout the country, and Sir John Macdonald, on being asked to form a government, invited Mr. Tilley to resume his old post. On presenting himself for re-election, he was returned by acclamation. In due time he formulated the national policy of the ministry on the floor of the house in one of the ablest speeches that he had ever made. Though the measure was hotly discussed, it finally passed, and has ever since been the policy of the country. On 24 May, Mr. Tilley was created a knight commander of St. Michael and St. George by the Marquis of Lorne, then governor-general of Canada. He also holds a patent of rank and precedence from the queen as an ex-councillor of New Brunswick. He held the office of finance minister of the Dominion until October, 1885, when his health failed, and he retired from parliament and the ministry to accept, for a second term, the less laborious office of lieutenant-governor of New Brunswick, which post he still holds. As a speaker he is fluent and eloquent. Many important public measures owe their inception to him, chief of which, however, is the act dealing with the readjustment and reorganization of the customs tariff.

TILLINGHAST, Nicholas, educator, b. in Taunton, Mass., 22 Sept., 1804; d. in Bridgewater, Mass., 10 April, 1856. He was the son of Nicholas Tillinghast, who was several times representative to the general court of Massachusetts between 1795 and 1816. The son was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1824, and entering the U. S. army as 2d lieutenant in the 7th infantry, served for two years on garrison duty at Fort Gibson in the Indian territory. Afterward he returned to the military academy, where, in 1827-'34 he was successively assistant professor of chemistry, mineralogy, and geology, and of geography, history, and ethics. He was promoted captain on 1 June, 1835, and joined his regiment at Fort Gibson, but resigned on 31 July, 1836. Capt. Tillinghast then settled in Boston, where he received pupils in mathematics. In 1840 he was appointed principal of the state normal school at Bridgewater, and he continued to fill this post until failing health compelled his resignation in July, 1853. His only publications were "Elements of Plane Geometry" (Concord, N. H., 1841) and "Prayers for Schools" (Boston, 1852).—His son, WILLIAM HOPKINS, b. 20 March, 1854, was graduated at Harvard in 1877, and since 1882 has been an assistant in the library of Harvard university. He has published a translation, with additions, of Carl Ploetz's "Epitome of Ancient, Mediæval, and Modern History" (Boston, 1884).

TILLINGHAST, Pardon, clergyman, b. in Seven Cliffs, near Beachy Head (now Eastborn), Sussex, England, in 1622; d. in Providence, R. I., 19 Jan., 1718. He was a soldier under Cromwell, and a participant in the battle of Marston Moor. He settled in Providence, R. I., 19 Nov., 1645, was admitted a resident of the town with a quarter interest of the original proprietors of the Providence purchase, and founded a numerous family, whose members are now found in nearly every state and territory of the United States. He was pastor of the 1st Baptist church in Providence from 1678 till his death, preaching and officiating in that capacity for about forty years without remuneration. At his own expense, in 1700, he built the first meeting-house of this religious society, the oldest in America of its denomination. Mr. Tillinghast in 1711, "for and in consideration of the love and goodwill" he bore the church over which he was then pastor, executed "to them and their successors in the same faith and order" a deed of the meeting-house and the lot on which it stood. In the deed of conveyance he describes the faith and order of the church by quoting Hebrews vi., 1, 2, showing it to be the same as that now held by the Six Principle Baptists. In addition to his pastoral duties and his occupation of a merchant, he found time to serve the infant colony many times as member of the house of deputies, and the town of Providence twenty-five years, in various posts of honor and trust.—His great-grandson, Thomas, jurist, b. in East Greenwich, R. I., 21 Aug., 1742; d. in East Greenwich, L. I., 26 Aug., 1821, was a member of the legislature from 1772 till 1780, and one of the committee that it appointed in 1777 to estimate the damage done by the British soldiers on the islands of Conanicut and Rhode Island during the war of the Revolution. In 1779 he was elected judge of the court of common pleas for Kent county, and a member of the council of war.

In September, 1780, he was chosen associate justice of the supreme court, which post he held by annual elections until 1787, sitting in the famous paper-money case of Trevett vs. Weeden. His firmness and decision in this case, notwithstanding its unpopularity in the state at the time, ought, says a writer, "to cause his name to be inscribed in letters of gold." He was again a judge of the supreme court from 1791 until his resignation in December, 1797, in which year he was elected a member of congress, serving from 13 Nov., 1797, till 4 March, 1799, and in 1801-'3.—Joseph Leonard, lawyer, fifth in descent from Pardon, b. in Taunton, Mass., in 1790; d. in Providence, R. I., 30 Dec., 1844, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1811. In 1819 he received the honorary degree of A. M. from Brown, of which he was elected a trustee in 1833. He filled many other public stations, was for many years a member of the general assembly, and was repeatedly elected speaker of the house, where he was the earnest advocate of public instruction and judicial reform. Elected to congress as a Whig, he served from 4 Sept., 1837, till 3 March, 1843. In congress he was one of the most useful members, few men equalling him in the extent of his political information. At the age of eighteen he published in the Providence "Gazette," over the signature "Dion," a series of political essays that attracted wide attention; and he also contributed poetry to journals over the signature of "Carroll."

TILLMAN, Samuel Dyer, lawyer, b. in Utica, N. Y., 1 April, 1815; d. in New York city, 4 Sept., 1875. He was graduated at Union in 1834, and then studied law in Canandaigua, where he was admitted to the bar. Several years later he settled in Seneca Falls, N. Y., where he continued in the practice of his profession, and also was repeatedly elected president of the town council. About 1850 he retired from legal practice and settled in New York city. He was soon elected a member of the American institute, by which organization he was made professor of science and mechanics. Later he became its corresponding secretary and edited the "Transactions" of the institute, published by the state. Prof. Tillman's knowledge in every department of science was extensive. He invented a rotating planisphere to serve as a substitute for the artificial globe, for the use of schools, and also a revolving musical scale, called the tonometer, designed to illustrate the theory of temperament and exhibiting visibly the relations between the true and tempered notes in every key. The degree of Ph. D. was conferred on him by Union college in 1875, and he was a member of various scientific societies, including the American association for the advancement of science. His writings were chiefly essays on technical subjects, and included "A Treatise on Musical Sounds and an Explanation of the Tonometer" (New York, 1860).

TILLSON, Davis, soldier, b. in Rockland, Me., 14 April, 1830. He entered the U. S. military academy in 1849, but two years later, having injured his foot so that it required amputation, he resigned. In 1857 he was elected to the Maine legislature, and in 1858 became adjutant-general of the state. On the inauguration of President Lincoln he was appointed collector of customs of the Waldoboro district, which place he resigned in 1861 to become captain of the 2d Maine battery. He went to Washington in April, 1862 (having been detained in Maine during the winter, owing to the threatened difficulty with England on account of the "Trent" affair), and was assigned to the Army of the Rappahannock under Gen. Irvin McDowell. On 22 May he was promoted major and made chief of artillery in Gen. Edward O. C. Ord's division. After the battle of Cedar Mountain, 9 Aug., 1862, he was assigned to Gen. McDowell's staff as chief of artillery, in which capacity he served during the three days' artillery fight at Rappahannock Station, and then at the second battle of Bull Run. Subsequently, until April, 1863, he was inspector of artillery, and in January was made lieutenant-colonel, and on 29 March was ordered to Cincinnati, having been commissioned brigadier-general to date from 29 Nov., 1862, and made chief of artillery for fortifications in the Department of the Ohio. He had charge of the defences of Cincinnati and the works on the Louisville and Nashville railroad, and raised and organized two regiments of heavy artillery. In December, 1863, he was ordered to Knoxville, Tenn., where he supervised various works and was given a brigade in the 23d army corps, which he commanded in several engagements with Confederate cavalry and irregular troops during the winter of 1863-'4. He continued in charge of the works in this district, which were officially commended as the best in the military division of the Mississippi, and also organized the 1st U. S. heavy artillery of colored troops and the 3d North Carolina mounted infantry. Subsequently he had command of the District of East Tennessee until early in 1865, when he was transferred to the 4th division of the Department of the Cumberland, and held that command until the close of the war. He then offered his resignation; but his services were retained, and he remained on duty until 1 Dec., 1866, in charge of the freedmen's bureau at Memphis, and subsequently in Georgia. For a year he remained in Georgia after his resignation, engaged in cotton-planting, but then disposed of his interests there and returned to Rockland, Me., where he has since been engaged in the granite business.

TILTON, James, physician, b. in Kent county, Del., 1 June, 1745; d. near Wilmington, Del., 14 May, 1822. He received a classical education at Nottingham academy, Md., under Rev. Samuel Finley, who was afterward president of Princeton. On leaving school, he entered the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania, where he was graduated in 1771, six years after its organization. He at once settled at Dover, Del., where he remained until the beginning of the Revolutionary war. His sympathies being warmly enlisted in the patriot cause, he abandoned a lucrative practice to enlist, and became 1st lieutenant in a company of light infantry. Subsequently he was appointed surgeon in a Delaware regiment, and served in the battles of Long Island and White Plains, accompanying the army in its retreat to the Delaware river. In 1777 he was in charge of the military hospital at Princeton, N. J., where there was much suffering among the troops in consequence of the system of placing all the sick in one hospital. Dr. Tilton himself narrowly escaped death from an attack of fever that he contracted there. In the winter of 1779-'80 the sufferings of the sick in the tent hospitals was very great. To Dr. Tilton, then stationed at Trenton, N. J., has been ascribed the suggestion of the erection of the new buildings that were ordered by the authorities with the happiest results. These were log huts, roughly built so as to admit of free ventilation through the crevices, with floors of hardened clay, each being intended to accommodate not more than six patients. In September, 1781, chiefly through the exertions of Dr. Tilton, an act was passed by congress providing for promotion by seniority in the medical corps. He was soon afterward elected a professor in the University of Pennsylvania, but declined, being unwilling to leave the service. In 1782, after the surrender of Cornwallis, he began to practise again in Dover. In 1783-'5 he was a delegate to the Continental congress, and he sat for several sessions in the legislature. He removed to Wilmington for his health, from 1785 till 1801 was government commissioner of loans, and on the declaration of war with Great Britain was appointed surgeon-general of the army. He found the hospitals on the northern frontier, and especially the one at Sackett's Harbor, filthy and neglected. He moved the latter to Watertown, N. Y., introduced better regulations into all of them, and was rewarded by an immediate improvement in the health of the army. Purchasing a farm near Wilmington, he devoted his time thereafter chiefly to its cultivation. In 1857 his remains were disinterred, and now lie in the Wilmington and Brandywine cemetery beneath a monument erected by the Delaware state medical society. Dr. Tilton published his graduation essay, "De Hydrope" (Philadelphia, 1771), and an elaborate plan for hospital organization, entitled "Economical Observations on Military Hospitals, and the Prevention and Cure of Diseases incident to the Army" (Wilmington, 1813). His papers include "Observations on the Yellow Fever," "Letter to Dr. Duncan on Several Cases of Rabies Canina," "Observations on the Curculio," "On the Peach-Tree and its Diseases," "A Letter to Dr. Rush approving of Bleeding in Yellow Fever," and an oration in 1790 as president of the Delaware Society of the Cincinnati.

TILTON, John Rollin, artist, b. in London, N. H., in 1833; d. in Rome, Italy, 22 March, 1888. His professional life was spent in Italy, and he was a close student of the Venetian school of painting. Many of his landscapes are in private collections in England and the United States. Among his paintings are "The Palace of Thebes," which was shown at the Royal academy, London, in 1873; "Como"; "Venice"; and "Venetian Fishing-Boats" and "Rome from Mount Aventine," both of which are in the Corcoran gallery, Washington. His "Lagoons of Venice," and "Komombo" were at the Philadelphia exhibition of 1876. Henry T. Tuckerman says of him that "while some critics compare him with Claude and Turner, others, like Jarves, unjustly declare him a 'weak sentimentalist in color, having no solid foundation of knowledge or inventive force.'"

TILTON, Theodore, journalist, b. in New York city, 2 Oct., 1835. He was graduated at the College of the city of New York in 1855, was employed for a year on the New York "Observer," and then became an editor of the "Independent," continuing on the staff from 1856 till 1871, the latter part of the time as editor-in-chief. He edited also, about six months of the last year, the Brooklyn "Union." He then established the "Golden Age," an independent political and literary weekly, but retired from it at the end of two years. In 1874 he charged Henry Ward Beecher with criminal intimacy with his wife (see BEECHER), and the case, tried by Plymouth church and the public courts, attracted wide attention. Mr. Tilton has written many political and reformatory articles, which have been reprinted in pamphlets. He has gained much reputation as an orator, being a constant and eloquent speaker in behalf of woman's rights, and, before the civil war, in opposition to slavery. For twenty years he was a lyceum lecturer, speaking in nearly every northern state and territory. He went abroad in 1883, and has since remained there. Among his works are "The Sexton's Tale, and other Poems" (New York, 1867); "Sancta Sanctorum, or Proof-Sheets from an Editor's Table" (1869); "Tempest Tossed," a romance (1873; republished in 1883); "Thou and I," poems (1880); and "Suabian Stories," ballads (1882).

TIMBY, Theodore Ruggles, inventor, b. in Dover, N. Y., 5 April, 1822. He received a common-school education, and spent his youth on a farm. At an early age he developed inventive faculty, and in 1836 made a practicable working model of a floating dry-dock, which was condemned by nautical experts as impracticable in tidal waters. The first sight of the circular form of Castle Williams on Governor's island, in the harbor of New York, suggested to him the idea of the revolving plan for defensive works, and in April, 1841, he went to Washington and exhibited a model and plans of a revolving battery, to be constructed of iron, to the chief of engineers and chief of ordnance of the U. S. army. This model and plans were also submitted to John C. Calhoun and other officials in Washington. In January, 1843, he made a model of a marine turret, and at that time filed a caveat in the U. S. patent-office for a metallic revolving fort, to be used on land or water, and to be revolved by propelling engines located within the same, acting upon suitable mechanism. From January, 1841, till 1861 Mr. Timby urged the importance of his plans upon the proper authorities at Washington and elsewhere, but without satisfactory results, although in 1848 a favorable report was made to the secretary of war and indorsed by the chief of the ordnance bureau. Meanwhile, in 1856, he exhibited his plans to Napoleon III., and received some encouragement, but without practical result. In September, 1862, after developing many modifications of his original idea, he took out letters-patent covering the broad claim for "a revolving tower for defensive and offensive warfare, whether placed on land or water," and in the same year he entered into a written agreement with the contractors and builders of the original "Monitor" for the use of his patents, covering the revolving turret, by which they agreed to pay him a royalty of $5,000 on each turret that they constructed. These facts show beyond a doubt that Mr. Timby is the original patentee of the revolving turrets, and that he was recognized as such by John Ericsson, the designer of the "Monitor" and similar iron-clad vessels. Among the elaborations and developments of the original idea of the revolving tower which he has perfected from time to time are the cordon of revolving towers across a channel (1861); a mole and tower system of defence (1880); the planetary system of revolving towers (1880); the subterranean system of defence (1881); and the revolving tower and shield system (1884), all of which he has patented in this and other countries. Mr. Timby invented and patented in 1844 the American turbine water-wheel, which was a success, and in 1861 he devised the method, now in universal use, of firing heavy guns by electricity, as well as other inventions of practical utility. The degree of A. M. was conferred on him by Madison university in 1866, and that of S. D. by the University of Wooster, Ohio, in 1882. Mr. Timby founded in February, 1888, "Congress," a monthly journal, in Washington, D. C., and has prepared for the press a collection of didactic and philosophical prose and verse entitled "Beyond."

TIMM, Henry C., musician, b. in Hamburg, Germany, 11 July, 1811. He was baptized as Christian Heinrich, but, on coming to the United States, he adopted his present name. He had some instruction on the piano from Albert Gottlieb Methfessel, and Jacob Schmitt, and came to this country in 1835. In the same year he appeared at the Park theatre, New York, as a pianist, and obtained an engagement to play second horn in the orchestra, and occasional piano solos. During this time he was also organist at Grace church. About a year later he became musical director of an opera troupe at the Charleston theatre. In 1838 he returned to New York, where he settled permanently. When the National opera-house was built he became chorus-master and trombone-player; but the theatre was soon burned. In 1843 he became president of the Philharmonic society, which post he held for sixteen years. During his presidency he frequently appeared as the piano soloist at the society's concerts, and for eight years was trombone-player in the orchestra. He became well known as an excellent piano-teacher, and his services as an accompanist were much in demand. His published compositions are few, the most notable being the second piano part for Johann B. Cramer's eighty-four "Études."

TIMON, John, R. C. bishop, b. in Conewago, Pa., 12 Feb., 1797; d. in Buffalo, N. Y., 16 April, 1867. In 1802 he removed with his family to Baltimore. He assisted his father, who was a merchant, in his business, and was engaged in trade in Baltimore, Louisville, and St. Louis till 1823, when he entered the Lazarist seminary at the Barrens near St. Louis. He was ordained a sub-deacon in 1824, and accompanied Father (afterward Archbishop) Odin in a missionary journey through Texas. He was raised to the priesthood the following year, appointed professor in the Barrens, and became a member of the Lazarist order. He also did missionary work throughout a large district, and became famous as a controversialist, sometimes meeting as many as six clergymen of other creeds in public debate. But his great achievement was establishing his order in the United States. Serious differences had arisen between Bishop Rosati and the Lazarists with regard to the tenure of property, and Father Timon showed great tact in bringing about a settlement. In 1835, at the assembly of Lazarist deputies in Paris, it was decided to erect the American mission into a province of the order, and Father Timon was elected its first visitor. He relieved the order from financial embarrassment, reduced to submission many members who had become disaffected, prevailed on others who had left the community to return, and acquired property of great value in St. Louis and other cities. In 1838, at the request of Bishop Rosati, he took charge of the missions in Texas. He offered the first mass in Galveston, and erected the first altar in Houston. In 1839 he was appointed coadjutor bishop of St. Louis, but earnestly asked the court to be allowed to decline, and the nomination was cancelled. In 1840 Texas was separated from the Mexican diocese of Monterey, and Father Timon was appointed prefect apostolic of the republic, where he took measures to secure the restoration of the church property that had been confiscated by the Mexican government. He went to Paris in 1841 on business connected with the Lazarists of the United States. His energy appeared to increase with advancing years. Seminaries were given into his charge in every part of the United States, which he supplied with professors from the members of his community. A narrative of the length of the journeys that he undertook in many western and southern states, and of the difficulties that he overcame, would seem incredible. The career of Father Timon was marked by many acts of courage as well as personal sacrifice and charity. His rescue of the Sisters of the Visitation from a flood in Kaskaskia had all the elements of romantic bravery. When he was appointed bishop of Buffalo in 1847 he showed reluctance to accept the office, but he yielded to the pressure that was brought to bear on him, and was consecrated by Bishop Hughes in the cathedral of New York on 17 Oct., 1847. At the beginning of his administration he demanded the transfer of the title of the property of St. Louis's church, Buffalo, to himself. This being refused by the trustees, they were excommunicated, and he laid the church under an interdict. The controversy, after being the subject of discussion in the legislature, was finally settled by his submission to the trustees in 1855. He introduced the Sisters of Charity in 1848, began St. Joseph's boys' orphan asylum in 1851, and afterward the New Catholic reformatory for boys. He began the Foundling asylum in 1853, and subsequently founded the Deaf and dumb asylum, St. Mary's German orphan asylum, the Providence lunatic asylum, and many other charities. Among the educational and religious institutions that he founded or aided in establishing are the Seminary at Suspension Bridge, the College and convent of the Franciscan Fathers, the College of St. Joseph, the Redemptorist convent of St. Mary, the Community of missionary Oblate Fathers, and several sisterhoods. See his life by C. E. Deuther (1868).

TIMROD, Henry, poet, b. in Charleston, S. C., 8 Dec., 1829; d. in Columbia, S. C., 6 Oct., 1867. His grandfather was a German, who emigrated to this country before the Revolutionary war and settled in Charleston. His father, William (1792-1838), was a mechanic, but a man of very poetic temperament, who wrote some fine lyrics. He commanded a corps in the Seminole war, composed of Germans and men of German descent residing in Charleston, and from the exposure and hardships of the service contracted a disease that resulted finally in his death. Henry was educated at the University of Georgia, but took no degree. He was of scholarly tastes, and was a writer of verses from his childhood. After leaving the university he studied law in the office of James L. Petigru, but his enthusiasm for literature interfered with his studies, and he finally abandoned them and fitted himself for a college professor. William Gilmore Simms, who was then in the height of his fame, was in the habit of gathering round him those of the young men of Charleston that had literary proclivities, and he did much to foster the genius of Timrod, Paul H. Hayne, and other young southern writers. Timrod's first volume of poems (Boston, 1860) contained such fine work that it was hailed as an earnest of great excellence. In 1861 he began to write that series of war lyrics which made his name popular throughout the south. In 1862 a project was formed for having a volume of Timrod's poems brought out in London; but the pressure of great events interrupted this scheme, and it was never put into execution. His delicate health forbade active service in the field, but his pen was never idle. He was at the battle of Shiloh as war-correspondent of the Charleston "Mercury." In 1864 he went to Columbia, the capital of the state, where he edited the "South Carolinian." He lost everything when the city of Columbia was burned in February, 1865. He said of himself that he and his family were brought to beggary, starvation, and almost death—that they had eaten up all the family silver and nearly all their furniture, and were reduced to despair. He writes in 1865: "I would consign every line I have written to eternal oblivion, for one hundred dollars in hand." But the struggle against such fearful odds, with his failing health, proved too much for him; life perceptibly ebbed away, and early in October, 1867, he died. His brother-poet and life-long friend, Paul H. Hayne, afterward published a volume of his collected works, prefaced by a very pathetic sketch of his life (New York, 1873). The south has probably never produced a poet of more delicate imagination, of greater rhythmic sweetness, of purer sentiment, and more tender emotion than this young man, who passed away before he had time or opportunity to attain that high standard of excellence which his undoubted genius fitted him to reach. His best-known poem is a short ode written for Memorial-day, 1867.

TIMS, Thomas Dillon, Canadian official, b. in Castle Pollard, Ireland, 6 Jan., 1825. He engaged for many years in commercial pursuits, entered the civil service of Canada in 1858, in 1863 was appointed a commissioner to inquire into prison-management at Montreal, and in 1865 became government superintendent of the engraving and printing of the first issue of legal-tender notes. He visited Washington the same year on official business, and in 1867 reported to the government upon a financial system for the province of Quebec, and was placed in charge of Dominion affairs at Halifax. With other commissioners he was appointed in 1868 to inquire into the management of government railways in Nova Scotia. From 1868 till 1872 he was engaged in the organization of the financial department and savings banks in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and in 1872-'3 established branches of the finance department and savings banks in British Columbia and Manitoba. He was appointed financial inspector for the Dominion in 1870, and is inspector of Dominion savings banks, and sub-treasurer and auditor of government railways.

TINKER, Mary Agnes, author, b. in Ellsworth, Me., 18 July, 1833. She was educated at the high-school in Ellsworth, and at Blue Hill academy, embraced the Catholic faith at the age of twenty, and during the civil war nursed the sick and wounded in one of the military hospitals at Washington, D. C. Since 1873 she has lived in Italy. She has published novels entitled "The House of Yorke" (New York, 1872); "A Winged Word" (1873); "Grapes and Thorns" (1874); "Six Sunny Months" (1878); "Signor Monaldini's Niece," in the "No-Name Series" (Boston, 1879); "By the Tiber" (1881); "The Jewel in the Lotus" (1884); and "Aurora" (1885).

TINGEY, Thomas (pronounced with g soft), naval officer, b. in London, England, 11 Sept., 1750; d. in Washington, D. C., 23 Feb., 1829. He served in the British navy, but came to this country before the Revolutionary war, and owned ships that were engaged in the East India trade. During the war he served in the Continental navy. He was selected as one of the six captains that were appointed on the organization of the U. S. navy on 3 Sept., 1798, and given the ship "Ganges," twenty-four guns, with the "Pinckney" and "South Carolina," forming a squadron, to guard the Mona passage in the West Indies during the war with France. During July, 1799, he captured the French ships "Le Vainqueur," "Le Rabateuse," "L'Espérance." In the same year, while off Cape Nicola Mole, he was boarded by a boat from the British frigate "Surprise," and all the Englishmen on board were demanded and also permission to examine the protections of the American seamen. Capt. Tingey answered: "A public ship carries no protection for her men but her flag. I do not expect to succeed in the contest with you; but I will die at my quarters before a man shall be taken from the ship." The crew gave three hearty cheers, hastened with alacrity to their guns, and called for "Yankee Doodle." The captain of the "Surprise," on hearing the determination of the Americans, chose rather to pursue his course than to battle for dead men. Capt. Tingey was discharged under the permanent naval-establishment act, but was reinstated on 23 Nov., 1804, after which he had command of the navy-yard at Washington until his death. When the capital was captured by the British, in the summer of 1814, the secretary of the navy ordered Com. Tingey to fire the navy-yard, which, with the sloop-of-war "Argus," five armed barges, two gun-boats, and all the naval stores, was consigned to the flames. In this connection he writes to his daughter, under date of 17 Sept., 1814: "I was the last officer who quitted the city after the enemy had possession of it, having fully performed all the orders received, in which was included that of myself retiring, and not to fall into their possession. I was also the first who returned and the only one who ventured in on the day on which they were peaceably masters of it." For fifty years he was connected with the navy of this country and for nearly thirty years had command of the Washington navy-yard.

TINKER, Reuben, clergyman, b. in Chester, Mass., 6 Aug., 1799; d. in Westfield, Chautauqua co., N. Y., 26 Oct., 1854. He entered a mercantile house in his native town in 1813, but afterward entered Amherst and was graduated in 1827, having supported himself during his college career by teaching and manual labor. He became a student in Auburn theological seminary the same year, and was ordained a minister of the Presbyterian church at Chester in 1830. Resolving to devote himself to foreign missions, he sailed for the Sandwich islands in December, 1830, and reached Honolulu on 28 June, 1831. He was chaplain for seamen at Lahaina until June, 1832, when he went with other missionaries on an exploring expedition to the Marquesas islands, with the view to founding missions. In 1834 he was appointed to edit a semi-monthly religious journal in the native language, which he did up to 1838. In 1840 he returned to the United States, where he had charge of a congregation in Madison, Ohio, for four years, and then of one in Westfield, N. Y., till his death. See "Sermons by Rev. Reuben Tinker, Missionary at the Sandwich Islands; with a Biographical Sketch" (Buffalo, 1856).

TIPTON, John, senator, b. in Sevier county, Tenn., 14 Aug., 1786; d. in Logansport, Ind., 5 April, 1830. His father, Joshua, removed from Maryland to eastern Tennessee, where he was murdered by Indians on 18 April, 1793. The duty of supporting the family was thus thrown on John's shoulders at an age when he should have been at school. At the same time he began to be known as an Indian fighter, believing that to avenge his father's murder was a sacred duty. In 1807 he removed with his family to Indiana, settling on a farm of fifty acres on Brinley's Ferry, Harrison co., which he paid for out of money that he earned by splitting rails at fifty cents a hundred. The district was infested by counterfeiters and horse-thieves, but Tipton inspired them with such fear that they abandoned the neighborhood. In 1809 he joined the "Yellow Jackets," a military company commanded by Capt. Spier Spencer, and soon afterward became ensign, serving through the campaign that terminated with the battle of Tippecanoe, 7 Nov., 1811. He kept a journal of his campaign of seventy-four days, which, notwithstanding its singular method of spelling, is said to be the fullest and most vivid narrative of those operations. The "Yellow Jackets" lost their captain and their two lieutenants at Tippecanoe, and Tipton took command of the company. After this he reached the rank of brigadier-general of militia. In 1815 he was elected sheriff of Harrison county, and held this office by re-election until 1819, when he was sent to the legislature. He was one of the commissioners that were appointed by that body in 1820 to select a site for a new capital for Indiana, and it was on his motion that Fall Creek was chosen. He wrote a journal describing minutely his trips to different points in search of a suitable locality, and it shows a marked advance in spelling and style over the one in which he relates Harrison's campaign. He was re-elected in 1821, and soon afterward appointed a commissioner to determine with another commissioner from Illinois the boundary-line between the two states. He was appointed U. S. Indian agent for the Pottawattamie and Miami tribes in March, 1823, and in 1826 made arrangements with them by which valuable public lands were thrown open to settlers. In 1831 he was elected U. S. senator, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Gen. James Noble, and he was re-elected for a full term in 1833. Although his political opinions were, on the whole, similar to those of Gen. Jackson, he was his strenuous opponent on the U. S. bank question. He was specially interested in the progress of Indiana, organized the Eel river seminary society at Logansport, raised money for teachers, built school-houses, and constructed mills. He made extensive purchases of land in Bartholomew county, sixty acres of which he gave for the erection of public buildings. The city of Columbus was built on this property, and for a time was called Tiptonia in his honor. It received its present name when his political opponents were elected to office in the county. Gen. Tipton held high office in the Masonic fraternity, becoming finally grand-master.

TIPTON, Thomas W., senator, b. in Cadiz, Ohio, 5 Aug., 1817. He was graduated at Madison college, Pa., became a lawyer, and was elected to the legislature of Ohio in 1845, but, after some time, settled in Nebraska. He was elected a delegate to the Constitutional convention there, and became in 1860 a member of the territorial council. Subsequently he studied for the ministry, was appointed chaplain in the National army, and served during the civil war. He was U. S. senator from Nebraska from 4 March, 1867, till 3 March, 1875.

TITCOMB, Jonathan, soldier, b. in Newbury, Mass., in 1728; d. there in 1817. He was a member of the committee of safety and the Provincial congress in 1774-'5, colonel of a regiment in the Rhode Island expedition in 1778, and a member of the State convention in 1780. Some time afterward he was appointed brigadier-general of militia. He was naval officer of the port of Newburyport, Mass., from 1789 till 1812.

TIZOC, Mexican king, d. in 1482. He succeeded his brother Axayacatl on the throne in 1477, having been general of his predecessor's armies. According to the historical paintings of his time, he conquered during his brief reign fourteen cities, some in the valley of Toluca, and assisted King Netzahualpiltl, of Texcoco, to subdue the revolution of his brothers allied with the republic of Huexotzingo. Tizoc began the magnificent temple in honor of Huitzilopochtli, the god of war, but before its conclusion was poisoned by instigation of Techotlalla, cacique of Ixtapalapan, who was afterward executed in the public square of Mexico in presence of the allied kings.

TLALHUICOLE (tlal - we - co' - lay), Tlaxcaltec warrior, d. in 1518. He was regarded as the most formidable hero of his country, and commanded the Tlaxcaltec forces in the civil war in 1516 between the partisans of Cacamatzin and Ixtlilxochitl. He was taken prisoner by stratagem by Tlaxpanquizqui and brought to the city of Mexico; but his bravery and character had made such an impression on Montezuma that he ordered the captive's release, an act that had no precedent in Mexican history. But Tlaluicole refused to profit by the monarch's generosity. He said to Montezuma that it would be infamous for him to return to his country after being conquered, and insisted on undergoing the fate of the other prisoners. Montezuma, wishing, at any cost, to save his life, offered him the command of an army about to be sent to drive back the Tarascos, who had invaded his frontiers. Tlaluicole accepted, hoping to meet a glorious death in the ensuing battle. He advanced at the head of the Mexican troops to the city, Tangimoraa, called by the Mexicans Tlaximaloyan, cut through the Tarascan army, which made a desperate resistance, and defeated them several times. He returned to Mexico, laden with spoils and accompanied by a long train of captives. Montezuma lavished fresh honors on him, but failed to persuade him to accept the perpetual office of commander-in-chief or to return to his native country. He refused constantly, alleging that to do the first would be treason to his country, and to do the second would be a stain on his glory. At last Montezuma consented to satisfy the desire of his general, and ordered him to be tied to the stone of the gladiators. He was armed in the usual fashion, and Montezuma, with all his court, was present at the spectacle. Eight famous warriors of Anahuac attacked him one after the other, and were all disabled; the ninth, however, stunned him with a blow, and he was then put to death, with the customary ceremonies. See "Histoire des nations civilisées du Mexique et de l'Amérique Centrale durant les siècles antérieurs à Christophe Colomb," by the Abbé Brasseur de Bourbourg (4 vols., Paris, 1859), and "Monarquía Indiana," by Juan de Torquemada (Seville, 1615).

TLAXPANQUIZQUI (tlas - pan - keeth' - kee), Mexican soldier. He lived in the latter half of the 15th and the first half of the 16th century. During the struggle between Cacamatzin and Ixtlilxochitl for the kingdom of Texcoco, which began in 1516, he commanded the troops of his native state, Huexotzingo, now in support of one claimant, now of another. He had been convicted of adultery with the wives of two other chiefs of high rank. This was an almost unknown crime in the annals of the Aztecs, and was punishable with death. But as the culprit was very powerful, the husbands appealed to Montezuma, who promised to take the matter in hand. This occurred at the time when the republic of Huexotzingo, which was then in alliance with Montezuma and Cacamatzin, was invaded by the Tlaxcaltecs, who favored Ixtlilxochitl. The Tlaxcaltecs were commanded by Tlalhuicole, their greatest hero. Tlaxpanquizqui profited by the occasion to efface the stain of his crime by a glorious feat of arms. He succeeded in drawing Tlalhuicole into an ambush and made him prisoner. The Tlaxcaltecs fled in a panic, and the victory of the Huexotzingos was complete. Their leader led his captive to Mexico and presented him to Montezuma, who not only pardoned the conqueror, but loaded him with favors. See "Histoire des nations civilisées du Mexique et de l'Amérique Centrale durant les siècles antérieurs à Christophe Colomb," by the Abbé Brasseur de Bourbourg (4 vols., Paris, 1859), and "Monarquía Indiana," by Juan de Torquemada (Seville, 1615).

TOBAR, Juan, clergyman, b. in Tezcoco, Mexico, in 1543; d. in Mexico in 1623. He was canon of that country when the first Jesuits landed in the kingdom, and entered their order soon after their arrival. He spent more than fifty-three years in efforts to convert the Indians. He wrote, by order of the viceroy, Martin Enriquez de Almansa, "Historia antigua de los Reinos de México, Acolhuacan, y Tlacopan." Jose de Acosta acknowledges in his "Historia natural y moral de las Indias" (Seville, 1590) that a considerable part of his material was derived from the work of Tobar.

TOCORNAL Y GREZ, Manuel Antonio (to-corn-al'), Chilean statesman, b. in Santiago, 12 June, 1817; d. there in 1867. He studied law in the National institute, and in 1839 was admitted to the bar. In 1841 he was one of the founders of the University of Chili, and he became in the same year editor of "El Conservador," but in 1842 retired from the press. In 1844 he travelled through Europe, and in the last year was elected deputy to congress, where he forced the government to recognize ministerial responsibility. In 1848 he opposed the severe press law, and in 1849 was elected deputy by the opposition for Valparaiso, and called to form part of the new cabinet as secretary of justice. In 1851 he accompanied Gen. Bulnes in the campaign of the south as judge-advocate-general; but on the accession of President Manuel Montt he retired, refusing a nomination as minister to the United States, a seat on the supreme bench, and the presidency of the commission to revise the criminal code. He continued his opposition in congress, but in 1857 was defeated in the election for Santiago. From 1862 till 1863 he was secretary of the interior under Gen. Perez, but he resigned when war began between Peru and Spain. From 1865 till his death he was rector of the university.

TOCQUEVILLE, Alexis Charles Henri Clérel, Count de, French statesman, b. in Paris, 29 July, 1805; d. in Cannes, 16 April, 1859. He passed his early youth at his father's castle of Verneuil, near Mantes, received his education in the College of Metz, and studied law in Paris in 1823-'6, being graduated as licencié in the latter year. Through the influence of his family he was named, 5 April, 1827, judge auditor at the tribunal of Versailles, and soon afterward assistant judge. Later he became deputy assistant district attorney of the same city, and made the acquaintance of Gustave de Beaumont, with whom he was sent in 1831 to the United States by the secretary of the interior to study the penitentiary system of the country. They landed at Boston on 12 May, and remained in the United States till March, 1832, visiting the principal prisons. They returned to France with six folio volumes of documents. Tocqueville published a few weeks later "Note sur le système pénitentiaire et sur la mission confiée par M. le Ministre de l'intérieur à MM. de Beaumont et de Tocqueville" (Paris, 1832), which attracted considerable attention. Tocqueville, becoming dissatisfied with his legal duties, resigned on 21 May, 1832, and opened an attorney's office. His "Du système pénitentiaire aux États-Unis et de son application en France" (Paris, 1832; 2d ed., with additions, 2 vols., 1836) was written in association with Gustave de Beaumont, and translated into several languages, including an English version by Francis Lieber (Philadelphia, 1833). The authors approved the solitary system as practised in the penitentiary of Cherry hill, in Philadelphia, and they caused the penitentiary system of France, and eventually of the continent, to be entirely remodelled. The French academy awarded them a Montyon prize, and the success of their work was then considered as unprecedented in the annals of literature. He then visited England, married there in 1835, and in January of the latter year published the first part of his "De la Démocratie en Amérique" (2 vols., Paris, 1835), which procured for the author an extraordinary prize of eight thousand francs from the French academy. In the report of award it is called "one of the most remarkable works published in the nineteenth century, and such as the academy has seldom been called upon to crown." It was followed by the second part early in 1840. The work was translated into several languages, including an English version by Henry Reeve, entitled "Democracy in America," with a preface and notes by John Spencer (4 vols., New York, 1839-'40). Reeve's translation has been edited by Francis Bowen (2 vols., Cambridge, 1862), and there is also an abridgment, entitled "American Institutions and their Influence" (New York, 1856). The author was created a knight of the Legion of honor, 6 June, 1837, elected a member of the French academy of moral sciences, 6 Jan., 1838, and given a seat in the Académie Française, 23 Dec., 1841. In parliament, where he served in 1839-'48, Tocqueville advocated the abolition of slavery, and urged the colonization of Algiers, which he visited in 1841 and 1846. Being returned to the constituent assembly after the revolution of 1848, he was chosen a member of the committee on legislation, elected vice-president of the assembly in 1849, and, after attending the diplomatic conferences in Brussels upon Italian affairs, was secretary of foreign relations from 2 June till 31 Oct., 1849, and strongly supported the French expedition to Rome. He was arrested at the coup d'état of 2 Dec., 1851, and afterward retired to private life. Besides those already cited, his works include "État social et politique de la France," written at the invitation of John Stuart Mill, who translated and published it in the "Westminster Review" for April, 1836;

"Mémoire sur le paupérisme" (Cherbourg, 1836); "Lettre sur le système pénitentiaire" (Paris, 1838); "Lettre à Lord Brougham sur le droit de visite" (1843); "Le droit au travail" (1843); and "L'ancien régime et la révolution" (1856; translated into English, New York, 1856). Tocqueville's inedited works and correspondence were published by his friend, Gustave de Beaumont (2 vols., Paris, 1861; 2 vols., English translation, Boston, 1861); and the latter also published a complete edition of Tocqueville's works (9 vols., Paris, 1861-'5).

TOD, George, lawyer, b. in Suffield, Conn., 11 Dec., 1773; d. in Warren county, Ohio, 11 April, 1841. He was graduated at Yale in 1795, and settled in Georgetown, Ohio, in 1800. He was elected state senator in 1804, served as judge of the state supreme court from 1806 till 1809, was presiding judge of the 3d judicial circuit of Ohio from 1815 till 1834, and was afterward prosecuting attorney for Warren county. He was appointed lieutenant-colonel in the war of 1812, and served with credit at the defence of Fort Meigs in May, 1813.—His son, David, statesman, b. in Youngstown, Mahoning co., Ohio, 21 Feb., 1805; d. there, 13 Nov., 1868, was educated by his father, and admitted to the bar in 1827. He practised his profession in Warren for fifteen years, was elected to the state senate in 1838, and canvassed the state for Martin Van Buren in 1840. He was nominated for governor in 1844, but was defeated by 1,000 votes. He was appointed by President Polk minister to Brazil in 1847, and represented the United States there till 1852, when he returned, and took part in the canvass which resulted in the election of Franklin Pierce. In 1860 he was elected a delegate to the Charleston convention, was made first vice-president of that body, and presided over it when the southern wing of the Democratic party withdrew. He was an advocate of compromise at the opening of the civil war, but was a firm supporter of the government, and in 1861 was nominated for governor of Ohio by the Republicans, and elected by a majority of 55,000. During his term of two years, beginning 1 Jan., 1862, he gave much aid to the National administration.

TODD, Alpheus, Canadian author, b. in England in 1821; d. in Ottawa, Canada, 22 Jan., 1884. He removed to Canada in 1833, and prior to the union of Upper and Lower Canada was assistant librarian to the legislative assembly of the former province. He was continued in this office by the legislature of the united provinces till 1858, when he was appointed chief librarian. When he became librarian there were but 1,000 volumes in the library; now (1888) there are more than 200,000, most of which were collected, arranged, and classified under his supervision. He published "The Practice and Privileges of the Two Houses of Parliament" (Toronto, 1839); "Brief Suggestions in Regard to the Formation of Local Governments for Upper and Lower Canada, in Connection with a Federal Union of the British North American Provinces," a pamphlet (Ottawa, 1866); and "Parliamentary Government in England: its Origin, Development, and Practical Operation" (2 vols., London, 1867-'9).—His brother, Alfred, b. in England in 1821; d. in Ottawa, 6 June, 1874, came to Canada in 1833, and became chief clerk of the private-bill office of the legislative assembly of Canada. He published "A Treatise on the Proceedings to be adopted in conducting or opposing Private Bills in the Parliament of Canada" (Quebec, 1862).

TODD, Charles Burr, author, b. in Redding, Conn., 9 Jan., 1849. He was educated at the common schools, and was fitted for college, but failure of eyesight prevented him from entering. After teaching for some time, he devoted himself to literary pursuits, and has contributed to American magazines. He was appointed in May, 1877, commissioner for erecting a monument on the winter quarters of Gen. Israel Putnam's division of Continentals in Redding, Conn., which was authorized by act of the Connecticut legislature. He is the author of "A General History of the Burr Family in America" (New York, 1878); "A History of Redding, Conn." (1880); "Life and Letters of Joel Barlow" (1886); and "The Story of the City of New York" (1888).

TODD, David Peck, astronomer, b. in Lake Ridge, N. Y., 19 March, 1855. He entered Columbia, but was graduated at Amherst in 1875, and appointed chief assistant to the U. S. transit of Venus commission in Washington. For three years he was engaged in reducing the observations of the transit of 1874, and his result for the parallax of the sun—8".883—was the first that was derived from the American photographs of that transit. When at Amherst he began a series of observations of the satellites of Jupiter, which was assiduously maintained for twelve years, or during an entire revolution of the planet. His observations on those bodies led him to begin theoretical researches on their orbits, and he published "A Continuation of De Damoiseau's Tables of the Satellites of Jupiter to the Year 1900" (Washington, 1876). These are now used in the preparation of the "American Ephemeris," the "Berliner astronomisches Jahrbuch," and elsewhere, and they were also extended backward by him to 1665. In 1877 he began to study the possibility of an extra-Nepitunian planet, from the discrepancies in the motion of Uranus; after which he spent several months in the optical search for it, and he is at present examining the photographic evidence of its existence. In 1878 he was sent to Texas in charge of the U. S. government expedition to observe the total eclipse of the sun on 29 July, and on his return was appointed assistant to Simon Newcomb in the preparation of the "American Ephemeris and Nautical Almanac," remaining in that office until 1881. He then accepted the chair of astronomy at Amherst, with the directorship of the observatory, which appointment he still holds, and in 1881-'7 he was professor of astronomy and higher mathematics at Smith college, where in 1885-'7 he was intrusted with the planning and construction of the new observatory. Prof. Todd was invited by the trustees of the James Lick estate to direct the observations of the transit of Venus in 1882 from the Lick observatory, and in 1887 he was placed in charge of the expedition to Japan under the auspices of the National academy of sciences and the U. S. navy department to observe the total solar eclipse of 19 Aug. After that event he organized an expedition to the summit of Fujiyama, the sacred mountain of Japan, 12,500 feet in elevation. Astronomical and meteorological observations were made from the summit, which have an important bearing on the occupation of such peaks for scientific purposes. The degree of Ph. D. was conferred on him by Washington and Jefferson college in 1888, and he is member of scientific societies both at home and abroad. His writings include contributions to the transactions of societies of which he is a member and reports to the government.

TODD, Eli, physician, b. in New Haven, Conn., 22 July, 1769; d. in Hartford, Conn., 17 Nov., 1833. He was graduated at Yale in 1787, and sailed for the West Indies shortly afterward, intending to travel in Europe and Asia, but was prevented by sickness at Trinidad. Having lost the fortune left him by his father, he was obliged to prepare for a profession, and, selecting that of medicine, he began to practise, after the required course of medical study, in Farmington, Conn. He removed to New York about 1810, but returned to Farmington, and remained there until 1819, when he went to Hartford, where he soon became the chief consulting physician. In 1821 there was a notable increase in the number of insane persons in Hartford and the neighborhood. Dr. Todd appreciated the difficulty of treating them in private practice, and it was principally due to him that the attention of the profession and public was awakened to the necessity of having a special institution for their care. He was principally instrumental in founding the Retreat for the insane at Hartford, one of the earliest of the kind, was elected its superintendent, and presided over it till his death. Under him it became one of the best-managed institutions either in this country or Europe. Dr. Todd was repeatedly elected president and vice-president of the Medical society of Connecticut. He was the author of several professional monographs and some occasional addresses.

TODD, John, soldier, b. in Montgomery county, Pa., in 1750; d. at the Blue Licks, Ky., 19 Aug., 1782. He took part in the battle of Point Pleasant, Va., in 1774, as adjutant-general to Gen. Andrew Lewis. He settled as a lawyer in Fincastle, Va., but, with his brothers, emigrated to Fayette county, Ky., in 1775, took part in the organization of the Transylvania colonial legislature that year with Daniel Boone, and penetrated southwest as far as Bowling Green, Ky. In 1776 he settled near Lexington and was elected a Burgess to the Virginia legislature, being one of the first two representatives from Kentucky county, where he served as county lieutenant and colonel of militia. He accompanied Gen. George Rogers Clark to Vincennes and Kaskaskia, and succeeded him in command of the latter place. In 1777 he was commissioned by Gov. Patrick Henry, of Virginia, to be colonel and commandant of Illinois county, and served two years. He organized the civil government of this county, which afterward became the state of Illinois. Col. Todd went to Virginia in 1779, and was a member of the legislature in 1780, where he procured land-grants for public schools, and introduced a bill for negro emancipation. Afterward he returned to his family in Kentucky. While there he, as senior colonel, commanded the forces against the Indians in the battle of Blue Licks, where he was killed.—LEVI, brother of John, was a lieutenant under George Rogers Clark in the expedition of 1778, and one of the few survivors of the Blue Licks; and Levi's son, ROBERT S., was the father of Mrs. Abraham Lincoln.

TODD, John, author, b. in Rutland, Vt., 9 Oct., 1800; d. in Pittsfield, Mass., 24 Aug., 1873. His boyhood was passed in poverty, but he fitted himself for college, and was graduated at Yale in 1822. He spent the following year in teaching, then entered Andover theological seminary, and in 1827 was ordained a minister of the Congregational church in Groton, Mass. He became pastor of the church in Northampton in 1833, of the 1st Congregational church in Philadelphia in 1836, and of the 1st Congregational church in Pittsfield in 1842. Here he remained as pastor until May, 1872, when his strength was impaired by old age. In 1845 he received the degree of D. D. from Williams. Dr. Todd took a warm interest in the progress of education, and the Holyoke female seminary partly owes its existence to him. He was a voluminous and popular writer. Besides his contributions to the "Congregationalist" and other religious periodicals, and his sermons, lectures, and orations, he published about thirty volumes, all of which were re-issued in England, and several of them have been translated into German, French, modern Greek, Dutch, Danish, Italian, Arabic, Armenian, Turkish, and Tamil. His "Lectures to Children" have been printed in raised letters for the blind, and used as a school-book in the colony of Sierra Leone; of some of his books several hundred thousand copies have been sold, and several of his shorter pieces, notably "Hafed's Dream," were for many years favorites for school readers. His publications include "Lectures to Children" (Northampton, 1834; 2d series, 1858); "Student's Manual" (1835; revised ed., under the title "Student's Guide," with preface by Rev. Thomas Binney, London, last ed., 1869); "Index Rerum" (1835); "Truth made Simple" (1839); "Great Cities" (1841); "The Lost Sister of Wyoming" (1841); "Hints to Young Men" (1843); "Simple Sketches" (Pittsfield, 1843); "Summer Gleanings" (London, 1852); "Daughter at School" (Northampton, 1854); "The Angel of the Iceberg, and other Stories" (1859); "Future Punishment" (New York, 1863); "Mountain Gems" (4 vols., Boston, 1864); "The Water-Dove, and other Gems" (Edinburgh, 1868); "Sketches and Incidents, or Summer Gleanings" (1866); "Nuts for Boys to Crack" (New York, 1866); "Polished Diamonds" (Boston, 1866); "Hints and Thoughts for Christians" (New York, 1867); "Serpents in the Dove's Nest" (Boston, 1867); "Woman's Rights" (1867), which elicited from Gail Hamilton a reply entitled "Woman's Wrongs: a Counter-Irritant" (1868); "Hints and Thoughts for Christians" (London, 1869); "The Sunset Land, or the Great Pacific Slope" (Boston, 1869); "Missions" (1869); and "Old-Fashioned Lives" (1870).

TODD, John Blair Smith, soldier, b. in Lexington, Ky., 4 April, 1814; d. in Yankton, Dakota, 5 Jan., 1872. He went with his parents to Illinois in 1827, and from that state to the U. S. military academy, where he was graduated in 1837 and assigned to the 6th infantry. He was made 1st lieutenant on 25 Dec., served with his regiment in the Florida war from 1837 till 1840, was on recruiting service during part of 1841, and in active service in the Florida war during the remainder of that year and part of 1842. He was made captain in 1843, and was on frontier duty in Indian territory and Arkansas until 1846. He served in the war with Mexico in 1847, taking part in the siege of Vera Cruz and the battles of Cerro Gordo and Amazoque. He was on garrison and frontier duty till 1855, when he was engaged in the action of Blue Water against the Sioux Indians. He resigned on 16 Sept., 1856, and was an Indian trader at Fort Randall, Dakota, from that date till 1861, when he took his seat as a delegate to congress, having been chosen as a Democrat. He served in the civil war as brigadier-general of volunteers from 19 Sept., 1861, till 17 July, 1862, and was in command of the North Missouri district from 15 Oct. to 1 Dec., 1861. He was again a delegate in congress in 1863-'5, was elected speaker of the house of representatives of Dakota in 1867, and was governor of the territory in 1869-'71.

TODD, Thomas, jurist, b. in King and Queen county, Va., 23 Jan., 1765; d. in Frankfort, Ky., 7 Feb., 1826. His father died when he was an infant, and he had some difficulty in obtaining an education. He abandoned his studies to serve in the army in the latter part of the Revolution, and entered the Manchester troop of cavalry during the invasion of Virginia by Arnold and Phillips. In 1786 he was tutor in the family of a cousin in Danville, Ky., studying law at night. He began the practice of his profession toward the end of the year, took part in the agitation that had for its object the admission of Kentucky as a state, and was appointed clerk of all the conventions that preceded that event. He was made clerk of the U. S. court for the district of Kentucky, and when it became a state in 1799 he was appointed clerk of the court of appeals. He was made fourth judge of the same court in 1801, and chief justice in 1806. He was appointed an associate of the U. S. supreme court on 7 Feb., 1826. While he was an appellate judge of Kentucky he gave great attention to its peculiar system of land laws, originally an act of the assembly of Virginia, and his labors, both in the state court and the supreme court, were instrumental in establishing them on principles of law and equity.—His son, Charles Scott, soldier, b. near Danville, Ky., 22 Jan., 1791; d. in Baton Rouge, La., 14 May, 1871, was graduated at William and Mary, Va., in 1809, began the study of law under his father, and afterward attended lectures at Litchfield, Conn. He opened a law-office in Lexington in 1811, but volunteered in June, 1812, for military service. In December he became division judge-advocate of the Kentucky troops, and in this capacity was sent by Gen. William Henry Harrison with private instructions to Gen. James Winchester. On his return to Kentucky he was recommended for a captaincy in the regular army by Gen. Harrison, and was appointed to a vacancy in the 17th regiment of infantry in May, 1813. He was soon afterward transferred to the 28th infantry, and appointed aide to Gen. Harrison. He was mentioned in the report of the campaign of 1813 as one of the four aides that had rendered Harrison "the most important services from the opening of the campaign." He was made deputy inspector of the 8th military district on 1 Nov., 1813, and he also acted as adjutant-general in the summer of 1814 under Gen. Duncan McArthur, who in his report of the expedition into Canada attributed much of its fortunate issue "to the military talents, activity, and intelligence of Major Todd." He was appointed inspector-general on 2 March, 1815, with the rank of colonel, but resigned in June, and opened a law-office in Frankfort, Ky. He was appointed secretary of state by Gov. Madison in 1817, but resigned and sat in the legislature in 1817-'18. In 1820 he was sent on a confidential mission to the republic of Colombia. He returned to the United States in 1821, but resumed his duties in South America in 1822, taking with him the recognition of its independence by his government. Declining several offices, he retired for a time to his farm in Shelby county. He was a delegate to the Presbyterian general assembly at Philadelphia in 1837-'8, and for several years vice-president of the State agricultural society. He was a friend of Henry Clay, and sustained his claims to the presidency, but on his withdrawal as a candidate in 1835 he supported Harrison; and in 1840, on the invitations of the states of Ohio and Kentucky, he prepared, in conjunction with Benjamin Drake, of Cincinnati, a sketch of his civil and military career (Cincinnati, 1840). To support Harrison's candidature he soon afterward took charge of the "Cincinnati Republican." His relations with Harrison, who designed him for the mission to Vienna, were confidential. He was sent as U. S. minister to Russia by President Tyler, and reached St. Petersburg in November, 1841. He was popular with the court and people, and was elected a member of the Imperial agricultural society, from which foreigners had heretofore been carefully excluded.

TOEBBE, Augustus Mary, R. C. bishop, b. in Meppen, Hanover, 17 Jan., 1829; d. in Covington, Ky., 2 May, 1884. He was educated in the gymnasium of Meppen, and, after completing his collegiate course, was for several years engaged in mercantile pursuits. He emigrated to the United States in 1851, entered the theological seminary of Mount St. Mary's, Cincinnati, in 1852, was ordained priest in 1854, and in the following year became pastor successively at New Richmond and Cumminsville, Ohio. He was appointed in 1857 assistant pastor of St. Philomena's church, Cincinnati, and in 1865 pastor. In 1866 he was a member of the council of theologians in Baltimore to prepare matters for discussion in the second plenary council. He was consecrated bishop of Covington, 9 Jan., 1870. Bishop Toebe found the finances of his diocese in a state of disorder, but he showed great administrative ability, and gradually raised the debt that had been contracted during the episcopate of his predecessor. He introduced the Sisters of the Good Shepherd and the Sisters of Notre Dame. His death was owing to an ailment that he contracted while he was engaged in ministerial labors among the workmen on the Cincinnati Southern railroad. During his episcopate the number of churches increased from thirty-eight to fifty-two, and the priests from thirty-three to fifty-five. He founded several parochial schools, which were attended by 6,225 children at the time of his death.

TOICT, Nicolas (twat), clergyman, b. in Lille, France, in 1611; d. in Paraguay in 1680. He is called DEL TECHO by Spanish writers on the latter country. He became a Jesuit in 1630, went to Paraguay in 1649, and, on account of his zeal and ability, was made superior of the Jesuits in that province. He wrote "Nicolai del Techo Societatis Jesu Historia Provinciæ Paraguariæ" and "Relatio Triplex de Rebus Indiciis" (Antwerp, 1654).

TOLEDO, Antonio Sebastian (to-lay'-do), Marquis de Mancera, viceroy of Mexico. He was a grandee of Spain and chamberlain to the queen, and had been ambassador in Venice and Germany, when in 1664 he was appointed viceroy of Mexico, and took possession of the government on 15 Oct. of that year. In the following year St. Augustine, of Florida, then depending from the viceroyalty of Mexico, was sacked by buccaneers and the depredations of Sir Henry Morgan on the Spanish colonies began, and Toledo hastened to send means to Florida for providing fortifications and to re-enforce the fleet. He sent two expeditions to California, but did not obtain any noteworthy results. In 1667 some English privateers presented themselves in front of Vera Cruz, but, finding strong fortifications, entered Alvarado river and committed depredations. In the same year the interior of the cathedral was finished after ninety-five years of work, and the building was consecrated a second time. Tired of the responsibilities of his office, Toledo solicited his relief after the conclusion of his usual term of office in 1670, but the measures that he had adopted during his government found such approval that the queen regent insisted in prolonging his term for three years. In this time the final subjugation of the Tarahumaro Indians by the capture of the principal caciques took place. On his way to Spain in 1673 Toledo lost his wife in Tepeaca, near Mexico.

TOLEDO, Fernando Alvarez de, Spanish soldier and author, lived in the last half of the 16th century and the first half of the 17th. He was a private soldier, but by feats of daring rose to the rank of captain in Chili. He wrote a poem called "Purén Indómito," which, after having been lost for more than two centuries, was discovered by Diego Barros Arana and published by him, forming the first series of the "Bibliothèque Américaine" (Paris, 1862). The work deserves attention not for its literary qualities, but for being a history of the Spanish soldiers who conquered Chili, by one of themselves. The author is very candid in his pictures of the corruption and cruelty of his countrymen. Alfonso de Ovalle, in his "Histórica Relación del Reyno de Chile" (Rome, 1646), quotes the poem as an authority. He adds that Diego Rosales, author of a voluminous history of Chili, written about 1650, has followed the narrative of Toledo page by page. Gonzalez Barcia, in his "Historiadores primitivos de Indias," quotes the "Purén Indómito" in the chapter that is devoted to the histories of Chili; but it afterward sank into oblivion until it was discovered in the library of Madrid.

TOLEDO, Francisco de, viceroy of Peru, b. in Andalusia about 1520; d. in Seville about 1583. He belonged to the noble family of Oropesa, and in 1569 was appointed viceroy of Peru, taking charge of the government in Lima on 26 Nov. of that year. When the grandson of Huaina-Capac, Tupac-Amaru, who, after the death of his brother, Sayri-Tupac, was considered by the natives as the heir to the crown, refused to surrender, Toledo, under the pretext of forwarding re-enforcements to Chili, sent in 1572 an expedition of 250 men into the mountains of Vilcabamba, where the young inca was in hiding with some followers. Martin de Loyola, with a small force, surprised the prince, who was carried prisoner to Cuzco, and, after a mock trial by the judge, Loarte, was judicially murdered by order of the viceroy. Toledo was a legislator and statesman of considerable ability and industry, and future viceroys referred to his enactments as authority. He arranged that the Indians should be governed by chiefs of their own race, and fixed the tribute to be paid by them, exempting all men under the age of eighteen and over fifty, thus putting a stop to arbitrary demands. He virtually abolished the old system of mita, or forced native labor, although, in deference to the demands of the colonists, he enacted that a seventh part of the adult male population of every village should still be obliged to work for the Spaniards, but limiting the distance they might be taken from their homes and fixing a reward for their services. The Indians admitted that the country had not been so well governed since the time of Inca Yupanqui. He was recalled in 1581, and on 23 Sept. of that year delivered the government to his successor, Martin Enriquez de Almansa, returning to Spain, where he was arrested on the charge of malversation of public funds, and died in prison.

TOLEDO, Garcia de, Spanish missionary, b. in Oropesa, Spain, about 1510; d. in Talavera, Spain, about 1583. He accompanied the viceroy, Mendoza, to Mexico in 1535. After a short but brilliant career as statesman, he entered the convent of St. Dominick in Mexico. On the demand of his family he was sent back to Spain, where he became the spiritual director of St. Teresa, and his frequent conversations with this eminent woman only made him more anxious to devote his life to the service of the Indians. In 1569 his cousin, Francisco de Toledo, was named viceroy of Peru, and invited the Dominican to accompany him as spiritual adviser. He was beginning to exercise his ministry in Lima when the viceroy asked him to be his confidential adviser on a tour of the provinces. This journey was followed by several others, during one of which he converted a tribe of Indians, among whom he founded a city to which he gave the name of Oropesa. Among the advantages that the Peruvians drew from these visits were a number of ordinances approved by the great council of the Indies. These ordinances were drawn up by him, and for a long time formed the basis of the civil law and the rule of Peruvian society. In 1577 he was elected provincial of Peru. In spite of his great age and infirmities, he visited every part of his province, founded several convents, and repaired old ones. He was in a certain sense the second founder of the University of Lima. He obtained from his cousin the funds needed for the construction of new buildings, as the old ones had become too small for the increasing number of students. In 1581 he returned to Spain.

TOLÓN, Miguel Teurbe (to-lone'), Cuban author, b. in Pensacola, Fla., in 1820; d. in Havana, Cuba, in 1858. When he was a child his parents went to Matanzas, Cuba, where he received his education and passed a great part of his life. In 1847 his comedy "Una Noticia" was performed at Matanzas, and in the following year he produced another, "Un Caserío." In 1848 he was forced to emigrate to New York, his political opinions being in opposition to the Spanish government. In New York he devoted his time to teaching and to literary labors, contributing to several newspapers. He returned to Cuba in 1857, where he died soon afterward. He is the author of "Preludios," a collection of poems (Matanzas, 1841); "Aguinaldes Matanzeros" (1847); "El Laud del Desterrado" (New York, 1852); "Elementary Spanish Reader and Translator" (1852); "Leyendas Cubanas" (1856); and "Flores y Espinas," poems (Havana, 1858).

TOLSA, Manuel, Spanish engineer and sculptor, b. in Enguera, Valencia, about 1750; d. in Mexico about 1810. He studied architecture and sculpture in the Academy of San Carlos of Madrid, and became a member of the Academy of fine arts of San Fernando. In 1781 he went to Mexico as government architect, and as such he has left numerous marks of his genius in various public buildings, directing the erection of the towers of the cathedral in 1787-'91, and of the College of mines, for which he made the plans and began the building in 1797; but afterward he had to modify the plan, to add a second story, which was begun in 1799. In 1798 he became director of the Academy of San Carlos; but his chief fame rests on the equestrian statue of Charles IV., ordered in 1795 by the viceroy, Marquis de Branciforte, of which a temporary model in plaster was erected in 1796. After the working model was completed by Tolsa, the statue was cast, under his own direction, on 4 Aug., 1802, without an accident, notwithstanding that it contains thirty tons of bronze. The statue is 15½ feet high, and was erected on a 20½-foot stone pedestal, on the queen's birthday, 9 Dec., 1803, in the main square of Mexico.

In 1822 it was removed to the university, and since 1852 it has stood on the Paseo de Bucareli, at the crossing of the Calzada de la Reforma. It is one of the finest in America, and, according to Humboldt, second only to the statue of Marcus Aurelius in Rome. When England declared war against France and Spain in 1803, Tolsa established a foundry in Mexico where many cannon for coast defence were successfully cast.

TOM (known as Blind Tom), musical prodigy, b. near Columbus, Muscogee co., Ga., 25 May, 1849. He is of pure negro blood. His parents were slaves, and called him by the name of a member of their former owner's family, Thomas Greene Bethune. He was born blind, and the only sign of intelligence he gave in infancy was the interest he showed in sounds, such as the cries of animals, the moaning of the wind, the rushing of waters, and the pattering of rain. He could speak at an earlier age than other children, and with greater distinctness; but his words had no meaning for him, and while he was able to repeat entire conversations, he expressed his own wants by inarticulate sounds. When he was four years old a piano was brought to his master's house for the use of the young ladies of the family, and one night they were awakened by hearing him play one of their pieces. This was his first effort, yet he played with both hands, using the black and white keys. After this he was allowed the use of the instrument, and in a short time he was able to render with accuracy all the airs he heard. He also made some essays in original, or rather imitative, composition. He would run about the yard or fields, return to the piano, and, when asked what he was playing, would reply: "What the birds said to me," or "What the trees said to me." He has sometimes been compared to Mozart in childhood, but there is no instance recorded in musical history comparable to Blind Tom's attainments in phonetics and the power of reproduction and retention of sound at the same early age. Tom was brought to the north by his master, and made his first appearance in New York, at Hope chapel, 15 Jan., 1861, since which time he has travelled widely in this country and Europe. His musical feats, whether they are the result of mnemonic and imitative powers, or a genius for music, are astonishing. He plays one air with his right hand, accompanies it by another air in another key with his left, and sings a third air in a third key at the same time; and he can name any combination of notes that he hears struck on the piano, no matter how disconnected and puzzling the intervals. Not only can he play from memory any piece of music, however elaborate, after a single hearing, but he imitates the improvisation of another, note by note, then gives his own idea of it, and accompanies that with variations. His capacity for the most difficult musical performances since he was first brought to the north by his master has been subjected to the severest tests. He can only play what he hears or improvises; but he has about 5,000 pieces at the disposal of his memory, embracing the most difficult selections from Bach, Beethoven, Chopin, Gottschalk, and Thalberg. During his performances he indulges in curious antics, and he applauds himself at the end by clapping his hands. He recites with ease in Greek, Latin, French, and German, besides imitating numberless musical instruments and all sorts of sounds. He has partially acquired the power of vision, and can now see a luminous object within a very small space. But while Tom's powers of memory, manual dexterity, and imitative faculties are great, his renderings are devoid of color and individuality.

TOMES, Robert, physician, b. in New York city, 27 March, 1817; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 28 Aug., 1882. He was graduated at Washington (now Trinity) college in 1835, and, after spending some time in the medical schools of Philadelphia, went to the University of Edinburgh, where he received the degree of M. D. in 1840. He then studied in Paris, and on his return to the United States settled in the practice of his profession in New York, but after a few years was appointed surgeon on a vessel belonging to the Pacific mail steamship company, and made several voyages between Panama and San Francisco. In 1865 he was appointed U. S. consul at Rheims, France, which office he filled until 1867. Returning to the United States, he spent most of his life in literary occupation. He wrote for journals and magazines, and his series of papers in "Harper's Magazine" on American manners and society were widely popular. He published "The Bourbon Prince" (New York, 1853); "Richard the Lion-Hearted" (1854); "Oliver Cromwell" (1855); "Panama in 1855" (1855); "The Americans in Japan" (1857); "The Battles of America by Sea and Land" (3 vols., 1861); "The Champagne Country" (1867); and "The War with the South: a History of the Great American Rebellion" (3 vols., 1864-'7; German translation, 2 vols., 1864-'7). Dr. Tomes also translated works from the French and German.

TOMLINSON, Gideon, senator, b. in Stratford, Conn., 31 Dec., 1780; d. in Fairfield, Conn., 8 Oct., 1854. His grandfather was an officer at the capture of Ticonderoga. He was graduated at Yale in 1802, became a lawyer, and practised at Fairfield. He was elected a member of congress in 1818, serving from 1819 till 1827. He was chosen governor of Connecticut in that year, and continued in this office till 1831, when he resigned and was elected U. S. senator, serving till 1837.

TO-MO-CHI-CHI, Indian chief, b. in Georgia about 1642; d. there, 5 Oct., 1739. He was the chief of a tribe of Creeks that dwelt near Yamacraw bluff, the site of Savannah. He met Gen. James Oglethorpe in 1733 at the fort that the latter built on Savannah river, and with the aid of an interpreter satisfactory arrangements were made with the neighboring tribes by which the English acquired sovereignty over the country that lies between Savannah and Altamaha rivers and extends westward as far as the tide-waters. The Creek chief is represented as ninety-one years old at the time, dignified and grave in manner. Although he had been expelled by the lower Creeks, he was still very influential throughout the confederacy, and this influence he exercised then, and during the remainder of his life, in favor of the English settlers. He presented Oglethorpe with a buffaloskin on which the head and feathers of an eagle were painted, and explained that these symbols were significant of the swiftness, strength, love for the Indian, and power to protect him, which were English characteristics. He visited England in 1734 in company with Oglethorpe, five other chiefs, and members of his family. As they were the first Indians in London since the appearance of the Iroquois chiefs with Peter Schuyler in 1710, they were objects of wonder and admiration, and were treated with great distinction. Tomo-chi-chi and his queen were robed in scarlet and gold, and were conveyed to an audience with King George in a coach drawn by six horses. He was received graciously, and assured of the friendship and protection of the English monarch. After a stay of four months, during which he received many costly presents, he was conveyed with his family in royal carriages to the ship on which he embarked for Savannah. His funeral ceremonies were very imposing. His body was accompanied to the tomb by a long train of Indians, magistrates, and inhabitants of Savannah amid discharges of musketry. A pyramid of stone was ordered to be erected over his grave in the centre of the city by Oglethorpe.

TOMPKINS, Daniel D., vice-president of the United States, b. in Fox Meadows (now Scarsdale), Westchester co., N. Y., 21 June, 1774; d. on Staten island, N. Y., 11 June, 1825. His father was Jonathan G. Tompkins, a farmer, who performed services useful to his country during the Revolutionary conflict. The son was graduated at Columbia in 1795, studied law, was admitted to the bar in New York city in 1797, gained rapid success in his profession, and soon began to take part in politics, being elected to the State constitutional convention of 1801, and in the same year to the assembly. He was a leader of the Republican party in his state, and in 1804 was elected to the National house of representatives, but resigned on 2 July, before the meeting of congress, in order to take his seat on the bench of the supreme court of New York, having been nominated an associate justice on the promotion of James Kent to the chief justiceship. On 9 June, 1807, he resigned in order to become the candidate for governor of the Democratic wing of his party in opposition to Morgan Lewis. He was elected by a majority of 4,000 votes, and found himself in accord with the legislature in his support of the foreign policy of the Jefferson administration. He was continued in the office by the reunited Republican factions at the elections of 1809 and 1811. In 1812, in order to prevent the establishment of the Bank of North America in New York city as the successor to the defunct United States bank of Philadelphia, he resorted to the extraordinary power of proroguing the legislature that the constitution then gave him, which no governor ever used except himself in this instance. The charter of the bank had been approved by the house, a part of the Republicans voting with the Federalists, and when the legislature reassembled it was at once passed. In the election of 1813 his majority was reduced from 10,000 to 4,000, and there was a hostile lower house in the next legislature. Nevertheless, his bold act made him very popular with the common people, and his active patriotism during the war with Great Britain increased their admiration. He placed the militia in the field, and did more than the Federal government for the success of the operations on the Canadian border, pledging his personal and official credit when the New York banks refused to lend money on the security of the U. S. treasury notes without his indorsement. He advanced the means to maintain the military school at West Point, to continue the recruiting service in Connecticut, and to pay the workmen that were employed in the manufactory of arms at Springfield. He bought the weapons of private citizens that were delivered at the arsenal in New York city, and in a short time 40,000 militia were mustered and equipped for the defence of New York, Plattsburg, Sackett's Harbor, and Buffalo. When Gen. John Armstrong retired from the secretaryship of war after the sacking of Washington, President Madison invited Tompkins to enter the cabinet as secretary of state in the place of James Monroe, who assumed charge of the war department; but he declined on the ground that he could be of more service to the country as governor of New York. He was re-elected in 1815, and in April, 1816, was nominated for the vice-presidency of the United States. His talents and public services were more conspicuous than those of James Monroe, but the northern Democrats were not strong enough to command the first place on the ticket. Before resigning the governorship and entering on the office of vice-president, to which he was elected by 183 out of 217 votes, he sent a message to the legislature, dated 28 Jan., 1817, recommending that a day be fixed for the abolition of slavery within the bounds of the state, and the assembly, acting on his suggestion, decreed that all slaves should be free on and after 4 July, 1827. He was re-elected vice-president by 215 of the 228 votes that were cast in 1820, and in the same year was proposed by his friends as a candidate for governor; but his popularity had diminished, and charges of dishonesty were made in connection with his large disbursements during the war with Great Britain. He was a delegate to the State constitutional convention of 1821. The suspicion of embezzlement, which were due to a confusion in his accounts, unbalanced his mind and brought on a melancholy from which he sought escape in intoxicating drinks, thereby shortening his life. He was one of the founders of the New York historical society, one of the incorporators of the city schools, and a regent of the State university.—Daniel's nephew, Daniel D., soldier, b. in New York in 1799; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 26 Feb., 1863, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1820, entered the ordnance corps, and on the reorganization of the army was made 2d lieutenant of artillery, the ordnance department being at that time merged in the artillery, with commission dating from 1 July, 1821. He was promoted 1st lieutenant on 1 March, 1825, and captain on 31 Dec., 1835, and in the Florida war against the Seminole Indians distinguished himself in the skirmish at San Velasco, in the battle of Wahoo Swamp, and in other actions, and was brevetted major on 11 Sept., 1836. He was appointed captain and assistant quartermaster on 7 July, 1838, became a major on the staff on 22 July, 1842, and during the Mexican war had charge of the forwarding of supplies from Philadelphia, receiving the brevet of lieutenant-colonel on 30 May, 1848, for meritorious performance of duties connected with the prosecution of the war. He was made a full lieutenant-colonel on 16 Sept., 1851, and colonel and assistant quartermaster-general on 22 Dec., 1856, and from the beginning of the civil war till the time of his death he served as depot quartermaster in New York city, furnishing supplies to the armies in the field.—A son of the second Daniel D., Charles H., soldier, b. in Fort Monroe, Va., 12 Sept., 1830, was educated at Kinsley's school at West Point, N. Y., and for two years at the U. S. military academy, but resigned without completing the course. He entered the service in 1856 in the dragoons, and after an enlistment of three years on the frontier, during which he passed through the principal non-commissioned grades, he was appointed 2d lieutenant in the 2d U. S. cavalry, 23 March, 1861, and was promoted 1st lieutenant in April of the same year. While commanding a squadron of his regiment, the 5th cavalry, within the defences of Washington, he made a dashing reconnoissance in the direction of Fairfax Court-House, Va., 31 May, 1861. It was at night and resulted in the capture of two outposts of the enemy, with an estimated loss of twenty-five Confederates. Lieut. Tompkins charged three times through the town, losing several men and horses, including two chargers which were shot under him. As one of the first cavalry affairs of the war, it attracted wide attention. Subsequently he served in the battle of Bull Run and upon the staff of Gen. George Stoneman. He was appointed captain and assistant quartermaster, served for a few months as colonel of the 1st Vermont cavalry, as lieutenant-colonel and quartermaster of volunteers in 1865-'6, and colonel and quartermaster in 1866-'7. He was made deputy quartermaster-general in the regular army in 1866, and assistant quartermaster-general with rank of colonel, 24 Jan., 1881. He participated in the operations of Gen. Nathaniel P. Banks and Gen. John Pope in the Shenandoah campaign, and was recommended for the appointment of brigadier-general of volunteers for conspicuous services at the battle of Cedar Creek, Va. He has served from 1865 till 1888 as chief quartermaster of the principal military divisions of the army, and was at the last-named date chief quartermaster of the division of the Atlantic. He was brevetted major for Fairfax Court-House, lieutenant-colonel for the Shenandoah campaign, and colonel and brigadier-general, 13 March, 1865, for meritorious services during the war.

TOMPSON, William, clergyman, b. in Lancashire, England, in 1598; d. in Braintree, Mass., 10 Dec., 1666. He emigrated to this country about 1634, and became first pastor of the church at Braintree (now Quincy). He went on a mission to Virginia in 1642, but was silenced for non-conformity and compelled to return to New England. He was an acceptable preacher, and described by Cotton Mather as a "pillar of the American church"; but he was subject to fits of depression, and in one of them committed suicide. His contemporaries describe him as "an author of reputation," but, with the exception of several prefaces to the books of others, his publications have all perished.—His son, Benjamin, educator, b. in Braintree, Mass., 14 July, 1642; d. 13 April, 1714, was graduated at Harvard in 1662, became master of the Boston Latin-school in 1667, and three years later took charge of the Cambridge school, preparatory to Harvard, which post he held for nearly forty years. He probably died in Cambridge, but is buried in Roxbury. The inscription on his tombstone describes him as "a learned school-master and physician, and y^e renowned poet of New England." He wrote an "Elegy on the Rev. Samuel Whiting, of Lynn, Mass.," which is printed in Cotton Mather's "Magnalia," and a poem of some merit descriptive of King Philip's war, entitled "New England's Crisis" (Cambridge, 1675).—Benjamin's son, Edward, clergyman, b. in Boston, Mass., 20 April, 1665; d. in Marshfield, Mass., 10 March, 1705, was graduated at Harvard in 1684, taught for several years at Newbury, and from 14 Oct., 1696, until his death was pastor of the church at Marshfield, Mass. On his tombstone is inscribed:

"Here in a tyrant's hand doth captive lie

A rare synopsis of divinity."

His last sermons, entitled "Heaven the Best Country," were published (1712).

TONE, William Theobald Wolfe, soldier, b. in Dublin, Ireland, 29 April, 1791; d. in New York city, 10 Oct., 1828. He was the eldest son of the Irish patriot and French general, Theobald Wolfe Tone. After the tragic death of his father he was declared an adopted child of the French republic by the Directory, and educated with his younger brother in the Prytaneum and Imperial lyceum at the national expense. During this period he wrote a work on the legislation of the Goths in Italy, which was favorably noticed by the institute. He was appointed a cadet in the Imperial school of cavalry on 3 Nov., 1810, and remained there until January, 1813, when he was promoted to be sub-lieutenant in the 8th regiment of chasseurs. He distinguished himself in the engagements of that year, and received six lance wounds at the battle of Leipsic. He was then made lieutenant on the staff, aide-de-camp to Gen. Bagnères, and member of the Legion of honor. After the fall of Napoleon he gave himself to literary and antiquarian studies. But, when Louis XVIII. left the kingdom, he considered himself absolved from his allegiance, and served again under Napoleon, and was employed by him in organizing defensive forces on the Rhine and on the Spanish frontier. He left the French army after the battle of Waterloo, and came to the United States in 1816. He studied law for some time, and wrote papers on military tactics. He was appointed 2d lieutenant of light artillery on 12 July, 1820, and was transferred to the 1st artillery on 1 June, 1821, but resigned on 31 Dec., 1826, and married a daughter of William Sampson. He published "L'État civil et politique de l'Italie sous la domination des Goths" (Paris, 1813); "Life of Theobald Wolfe Tone, written by Himself and continued by his Son: with his Political Writings, etc.; edited by his Son, William Theobald Wolfe Tone, with a Brief Account of his own Education and Campaigns under the Emperor Napoleon" (2 vols., Washington, 1826; London, 1827); and "School of Cavalry, or a System for Instruction, etc., proposed for the Cavalry of the United States" (Georgetown, D. C., 1824).

TONER, Joseph Meredith, physician, b. in Pittsburg, Pa., 30 April, 1825. He received his classical education at Western Pennsylvania university and Mount St. Mary's college, was graduated at Vermont medical college in 1850 and Jefferson medical college in 1853, and, after a short residence in Summitsville, Pa., and Harper's Ferry, Va., settled in Washington, D. C., in 1855. He was a founder of Providence hospital and of St. Ann's infant asylum, to which he is a visiting physician, and since 1856 has been the attending physician to St. Joseph's orphan asylum. Aware of the perishable character of much of the early medical literature of this country, he devised a scheme for a repository of medical works that should be under the control of that profession in the United States and located at Washington, D. C. His resolution on that subject was adopted by the American medical association in 1868, and resulted in the establishment of the library of the American medical association. The collection is placed in the Smithsonian institution, and has reached the number of 6,000 volumes, including pamphlets. In 1871 he founded the Toner lectures by placing $3,000 (which has grown to $5,000) in the hands of trustees, who are charged with the duty of annually procuring two lectures that contain some new fact valuable to medical science, the interest on the fund, save ten per cent. which is added to the permanent fund, being paid to the authors of the essays. These lectures are included in the regular list of the publications of the Smithsonian institution. It is the first attempt that has been made in this country to endow a course of lectures on such conditions. He gave in 1875 and three subsequent years the Toner medal at Jefferson medical college, to be awarded to the best thesis that embodies the results of original investigation. For many years he has given a similar medal to the University of Georgetown. He was president of the American medical association in 1873 and of the American health association in 1874, a vice-president of the International medical congress in 1876, and a vice-president and registrar of the International medical congress in 1887. Dr. Toner has devoted much time and research to early American medical literature, and has collected over 1,000 treatises published before 1800, and, besides publishing numerous monographs, has in preparation a "Biographical Dictionary of Deceased American Physicians," of which more than 4,000 sketches are completed. He is an authority in the medical, biographical, and local history of the District of Columbia, and has devised a system of symbols of geographical localities, which has been adopted by the U. S. post-office department. In 1882 he gave his entire library, including manuscripts, to the U. S. government. It consisted of 26,000 books and 18,000 pamphlets. He is a member of numerous medical, historical, and philosophical associations, has published more than fifty pamphlets, which include "Maternal Instinct" (Baltimore, 1864); "Compulsory Vaccination" (1865); "Medical Register of the District of Columbia" (1867); "Necrological Notices of Deceased Surgeons in the Rebellion" (Washington, 1870); "Medical Register of the United States" (Philadelphia, 1874); "Dictionary of Elevations and Climatic Register of the United States" (New York, 1874); "Annals of Medical Progress and Medical Education in the United States" (1874); "Medical Men of the Revolution" (Philadelphia, 1876); "Rocky Mountain Medical Association" (1877); and "Memorial Volume, with a Biography of its Members" (Washington, 1877). See life by Thomas Antisell (Washington, 1878).

TONTY, or TONTI, Chevalier Henry de, Italian explorer, b. in Gaeta, Italy, about 1650; d. in Mobile, La. (now Ala.), in September, 1704. His father, Lorenzo, was the inventor of the system of annuities that is called the Tontine. Henry took part in several naval and military engagements when quite young, in one of which he lost a hand. Its place was supplied by an iron one, which he used skilfully. On the recommendation of the Prince de Conti, the Sieur de La Salle took him into his service, and he embarked with the latter for Quebec on 14 July, 1678. He completed the fort at Niagara, which had been designed by La Salle, and garrisoned it with thirty men. In 1679 he visited several of the Indian tribes, went to Detroit in advance of La Salle, having first taken steps to strengthen and provision his garrison, and advanced into the country of the Illinois, whom he won to the side of the French; but this alliance proved unfortunate for the Illinois, who were attacked by the Iroquois on account of it and defeated with loss almost under the eyes of Tonti. In 1680 he was ordered by La Salle to build a fort on the river of the Illinois, but, learning that Fort Crevecoeur was threatened by the Iroquois, he marched to its aid. There he met the Indians and had some parleying with them, during which he was wounded by an Onondaga warrior. Believing that the fort was not defensible, he retired in September with the five men that constituted its garrison. He sailed up the Illinois, experiencing some losses in the voyage, and wintered in the Bay of Lake Michigan (Green bay) in 1681. He was sent by La Salle the same year to finish the fort on the Illinois which was begun the preceding year, to which he gave the name of St. Louis. He descended the Mississippi with La Salle, but on 15 May, 1682, was despatched by the latter, who had fallen sick, to Mackinaw for assistance. In 1684 he was at Fort St. Louis and repelled an attack of the Iroquois. In 1686 he went to the mouth of Mississippi river by way of Chicago and Fort Louis to seek tidings of La Salle, and on his return to Montreal he was sent to the Illinois country to collect a large force of Illinois Indians for the Seneca campaign. He was able to bring only eighty to Detroit, with whom he took part in the expedition of Denonville. Disheartened by the death of La Salle and of almost all the companions of his early adventures, he spent the last years of his life among the Illinois, who became much attached to him. He was discovered there by Iberville in 1700, supporting himself by hunting and trading in furs. A work purporting to be Tonti's memoirs was published in Paris in 1697, entitled "Dernières découvertes de la Salle dans l'Amérique septentrionale" (English translation, London, 1698; New York, 1814). Tonti declared to Iberville as well as to Father Marêst that he had no hand in this work, which is full of errors and exaggerations. The real memoirs of Tonti have been published by Pierre Margry in "Origines Françaises des pays d'outremer" (Paris, 1877-'9). Vol. i. contains "Voyages et état des Francs sur les lacs et le Mississippi sous les ordres de MM. de la Salle et de Tonty de 1678 à 1684," and vol. iii. "Lettres de Henri de Tonty sur ce qu'il a appris de M. de la Salle, le voyage qu'il a fait pour l'aller chercher et son départ prochain pour marcher contre les Iroquois, 1686-1689." Tonti wrote in 1693 a memoir addressed to Count de Pontchartrain, which is also published in Margry's "Origines" (1867).

TONYN, Patrick, British soldier, b. in 1725; d. in London, England, 30 Dec., 1804. He became a captain in the 6th dragoons in 1751, with which regiment he served in Germany in 1758, was made lieutenant-colonel of the 104th regiment in 1761, and in 1775-'83 was governor of East Florida. On 1 Jan., 1798, he became general.

TOOKE, John Horne, English politician, b. in Westminster, England, 25 June, 1736; d. in Wimbledon, England, 18 March, 1812. He changed his name from Horne to take an estate that was bequeathed him by William Tooke in 1782. He was a minister of the established church, a follower of John Wilkes, and in 1768 a founder of the Society for the support of the bill of rights. He bitterly opposed the coercion of the American colonies, and, after the battles of Lexington and Concord, advertised for a subscription for "the widows and orphans of the American soldiers who were murdered by the king's troops." The ministry prosecuted him for libel, and he was tried at Guilford hall in July, 1777. He conducted his own defence, that he might personally attack the government, and was condemned to one year's imprisonment, and to pay a fine of £200. While in jail he published his celebrated "Letter to Mr. Dunning," in which he critically explained the case of the King vs. Lawley, which had been used as a precedent against himself on his trial. He served in parliament in 1801-'2, and was an important factor in the Liberal party. His numerous publications are included in "Memoirs of John Horne Tooke, together with his valuable Speeches and Writings, by John A. Graham (New York, 1828). See "Memoirs of John Horne Tooke, with Original Documents," by Alexander Stephens (2 vols., 1813).

TOOMBS, Robert, senator, b. in Wilkes county, Ga., 2 July, 1810; d. in Washington, Ga., 15 Dec., 1885. He studied at the University of Georgia, was graduated at Union college in 1828, attended lectures in the law department of the University of Virginia the next year, and in 1830, by a special act of the legislature, was admitted to the bar before he had attained his majority. He then settled in his native county, subsequently attaining a reputation such as few lawyers ever enjoyed in the state. When the war with the Creek Indians began in 1836 he raised a company of volunteers, led them as their captain, and served under Gen. Winfield Scott until the close of hostilities. He was in the legislature in 1837-'40, and in 1842-'3 took an active part in politics, and was a leader of the so-called "State-rights Whigs." He supported William H. Harrison for the presidency in 1840, and Henry Clay in 1844, and in the latter year was chosen to congress as a Southern Whig. His first speech in the house of representatives was on the Oregon question, and placed him among the first debaters and orators in that body. He was active in the compromise measures in 1850, and greatly contributed to their passage. After eight years' service in the house he took his seat in the U. S. senate in March, 1853, holding office by re-election till 1861. As a senator he was intolerant, dogmatic, and extreme, but able and eloquent. He believed in the absolute sovereignty of the states, and that it was a necessity for the south both to maintain and extend slavery. He advocated disunion with all the force of his oratory, and after the election of Abraham Lincoln to the presidency made a series of speeches in Georgia in which he asserted that the north would no longer respect the constitutional rights of the south, and that secession was the only remedy. When the State convention met in 1861, he was mainly instrumental in securing the majority of votes on the resolution to secede. He resigned his seat in the U. S. senate in January, 1861, and in March was formally expelled from that body. He was a member of the Confederate congress at its first session, and but for a misunderstanding might have been chosen president of the Confederacy. After the election of Jefferson Davis he became secretary of state, but resigned in a few weeks to take the commission of brigadier-general in the army. He fought at the second battle of Bull Run and at the Antietam, but resigned and returned to Georgia. In 1864 he commanded the militia, of which he was brigadier-general. After the war he eluded arrest as a political prisoner, and passed two years in Cuba, France, and England, but returned on the restoration in 1867 of the privilege of habeas corpus, resumed practice, and accumulated an estate that was estimated at about $500,000. As he refused to take the oath of allegiance to the U. S. government, he was debarred from all the rights and privileges of citizenship. He was a member of the Georgia Democratic state convention in 1872, and advocated Horace Greeley as a candidate for the presidency. In 1874 he began the railroad war, to which he devoted his energies until his death. The legislature of that year had passed a law taxing railroads as all other property was taxed. The railroads resisted, and Gen. Toombs, in behalf of the state, took the matter into court, established the principle that they should pay the same taxes as other property, and collected $300,000, including some arrears of taxes. In the State convention of 1877 he introduced a resolution providing for the appointment of three commissioners who should have the power to oversee the business of the roads, to make and unmake rates, and to order improvements. In accordance with this provision, the next legislature adopted what is known as the commission railroad law. He continued his hostility to the United States government until his death.

TOPETE, Juan Bautista (to-pay'-tay), Spanish naval officer, b. in Tlacotalpan, Mexico, 24 May, 1821. His parents retired to Spain after the country had won its independence, and he entered the Spanish navy as a midshipman. In 1865 he was post-captain, commanding one of the ships of the Spanish fleet in the Pacific, and after the suicide of Admiral Jose de Pareja, when Admiral Mendez Nuñez assumed command, Topete became second commander of the expedition with the rank of commodore, and participated in the bombardment of Valparaiso, 31 March, 1866, and in the attack on Callao, 2 May, 1866, where he was dangerously wounded. When Admiral Nuñez sailed in the "Numancia" on a voyage round the world, Topete assumed command of the rest of the fleet, which he brought back to Spain in 1867. He was promoted rear-admiral and commander of the iron-clad squadron at Cadiz, and pronounced against the government, 17 Sept., 1868, with Gen. Prim, who arrived on board the fleet on 19 Sept. He became a member of the provisional government as secretary of the navy on 8 Oct., and was later returned to the constituent cortes by the city of Madrid. During his administration he took vigorous measures against the insurgents in Cuba, and obtained, in April, 1869, supplementary credits for that purpose. He was a staunch supporter of the candidacy of Montpensier, left the cabinet in November, 1869, to become vice-president of the cortes, was again secretary of the navy, 10 Jan., 1870, and secretary for the colonies in Sagasta's cabinet in December, 1871. Under Serrano's regency he was provisional president of the cabinet till 3 June, 1872, secretary of the navy and war till the suspension of constitutional guarantees, 24 June, 1872, and during the republic retired from service. After the virtual fall of the republic he held again, from 3 Jan. till 12 May, 1874, the portfolio of the navy under Serrano, and accompanied him to the seat of war, taking part in the relief of Bilbao, 25-27 March, 1874, where he was severely wounded. After the accession of Alfonso XII., 12 Dec., 1874, he retired to private life.

TOPP, Alexander, Canadian clergyman, b. near Elgin, Morayshire, Scotland, in 1815; d. in Toronto, Canada, 6 Oct., 1879. He was educated at Elgin academy and King's college, Aberdeen, and was licensed to preach in 1836. He was pastor of Elgin church in 1836-'52; of Roxburgh church, Edinburgh, in 1852-'8; and in 1858 took charge of Knox church, Toronto, Canada, where he remained until his death. In 1868 he was elected moderator of the general assembly, was one of the chief agents in consummating the union of the Presbyterian churches in Canada in 1875, and was again elected moderator of the general assembly in 1876. In 1877 he attended the Pan-Presbyterian council at Edinburgh. In 1870 he received the degree of D. D. from the University of Aberdeen.

TOPPAN, Robert Noxon, author, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 17 Oct., 1836. He was graduated at Harvard in 1858 and at Columbia law-school in 1861, and became a practising lawyer, afterward removing to Cambridge, Mass. He is a member of various historical and antiquarian societies, served on the international coinage committee of the American social science association, and was a delegate in 1878 to the International congress for the nullification of weights, measures, and money. He has translated Théodore Simon Jouffroy's "Ethics" (New York, 1862), and is the author of "Historical Succession of Monetary Metallic Standards," a pamphlet (1877); "Some Modern Monetary Questions," a pamphlet (Philadelphia, 1881); "Historical Summary of Metallic Money" (Boston, 1884); and "Biographical Sketches of Old Newbury" (Newburyport, 1885).

TORAL, Francisco de, Mexican R. C. bishop, b. in Ubeda, Spain, in 1502; d. in Mexico, 20 April, 1571. He received his education at Seville, and when nineteen years old became a Franciscan friar. In 1525 he went to Santo Domingo, and later he was sent to New Spain, where he learned Aztec and the difficult Totonaca language, and became professor of Indian dialects in the convent of his order at Mexico. After years of labor he invented a new method of teaching the Indian dialects, and afforded aid to the conquerors. Later he was sent to Yucatan, where he founded large and prosperous missions and gained the confidence of the Indians to such an extent that he became their legislator. He was appointed in 1549 superior of the convent of Tecamachalco, assisted in the general assembly of the Franciscan order at Salamanca in 1553, returning to Mexico in the following year with thirty-six new missionaries, and was appointed provincial of the province of Tlaxcala. Early in 1562 he was made first bishop of Yucatan, and being consecrated at Mexico, 15 Aug., 1562, fixed his residence at Merida. During the following years he did much to improve and organize his diocese, founded benevolent institutions for the benefit of the Indians, and built at Merida a cathedral, a seminary, and a hospital. In 1565 he assisted at Mexico in the synod of the Mexican bishops under Archbishop Montufar. He died suddenly in Mexico during a journey that he undertook to confer with the archbishop. Toral's works include "Arte y Vocabulario de la lengua Totonaca" (Salamanca, 1553) and "Tratado de la lengua Mexicana" (1554). The "Cartas de Indias," a recent state publication, contains letters and memoirs of Bishop Toral.

TORBERT, Alfred Thomas Archimedes, soldier, b. in Georgetown, Del., 1 July, 1833; d. at sea, 30 Sept., 1880. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1855, assigned to the 5th infantry, served on frontier duty during the next five years in Texas and Florida, on the Utah expedition, and in New Mexico, being promoted 1st lieutenant, 25 Feb., 1861. In April, 1861, he was sent to muster in New Jersey volunteers, and was made colonel, on 16 Sept., of the 1st New Jersey regiment. On 25 Sept., 1861, he was promoted to captain in the

A. T. Torbert

5th U. S. infantry. Col. Torbert served through the peninsula campaign, was given a brigade in the 6th corps on 28 Aug., 1862, and fought in the battle of Manassas on the two following days. He also took part in the Maryland campaign, and was wounded at the battle of Crampton's Gap, 14 Sept., where he made a brilliant bayonet charge. He was commissioned brigadier-general of volunteers on 29 Nov., 1862, and was at Gettysburg. He fought his last battle in the infantry at Rappahannock station, 7 Nov., 1863, and in April, 1864, was placed in command of the 1st division of cavalry of the Army of the Potomac, participating in the skirmishes at Milford station and North Anna river. He commanded at Hanovertown, and then participated in the cavalry battle at Hawes's shop, 28 May, 1864, for which he was brevetted lieutenant-colonel, U. S. army. He also repelled the enemy at Matadequin creek, 30 May, and drove them close to Cold Harbor. He took that place on the 31st with cavalry alone, after a severe fight, before the arrival of the infantry, and held it the next day against repeated assaults. He was now ordered by Gen. Sheridan, with another division, to make a raid to Charlottesville, had the advance, and commanded at Trevillian station on 11 June. On 8 Aug., 1864, Gen. Torbert was made chief of cavalry of the middle military division, and given command of three divisions when Gen. Sheridan took command of the Army of the Shenandoah. When Sheridan was closely pressed at Winchester, Torbert was specially active with the cavalry and aided in putting the enemy to flight, for which he was brevetted colonel on 19 Sept., 1864. He had been brevetted major-general of volunteers on the previous 9 Sept. Returning through the valley, he halted after several actions at the command of Gen. Sheridan, and fought the cavalry battle at Tom's river on 9 Oct., completely routing Gen. Thomas L. Rosser's command, and pursuing it many miles. On 19 Oct., at Cedar Creek, Gen. Torbert assisted the 6th corps in holding the pike to Winchester against desperate assaults. He commanded at Liberty Mills and Gordonsville on 22-23 Dec., 1864, when his active service ended. After his return from a leave of absence on 27 Feb., 1865, he was in command of the Army of the Shenandoah, 22 April till 12 July, 1865, of the district of Winchester till 1 Sept., and of southeastern Virginia till 31 Dec. On 13 March, 1865, he was brevetted brigadier-general, U. S. army, for Cedar Creek, and major-general for gallant and meritorious services during the war. He was mustered out of the volunteer service, 15 Jan., 1866, and resigned from the regular army, 31 Oct., 1866. He was appointed in 1869 minister to San Salvador, transferred as consul-general to Havana two years later, and filled the same post at Paris from 1873 till his resignation in 1878. He lost his life, while on his way to Mexico as president of a mining company, on the steamer "Vera Cruz," which foundered off the coast of Florida.

TORIBIO, Saint, or MONGROVEJO, Toribio Alfonso, Spanish-American archbishop, b. in Mayorga, Spain, 6 Nov., 1538; d. in Sana, Peru, 23 March, 1606. After finishing his studies in Valladolid, he led a life of the severest asceticism, until he was summoned to a professorship in the College of San Salvador in 1575. He became a favorite with Philip II., and, after occupying many important offices, was made chief magistrate of Granada. In 1580 the Spanish monarch nominated him to the vacant see of Lima, although he was at the time a layman. At first he refused, but it was believed that Toribio was needed in America to bring about a reformation in the lives of the Spanish colonists, whose profligacy was making the conversion of the natives almost impossible. He received, therefore, all the holy orders requisite for a priest on four successive Sundays, was afterward consecrated bishop, sailed for Peru, by way of Panama, entered Lima on 24 May, 1581, and soon afterward made a formal visitation of his immense diocese, which extended along the coast for nearly 400 miles, and was almost destitute of means of communication. He proclaimed himself the protector of the natives, and resumed the contest with their persecutors, from which Las Casas had retired in despair. In 1583 he held a provisional council at Lima, in which the plans that he suggested for the reformation of morals and for the amelioration of the condition of the Indians met with violent opposition from several of his suffragan bishops. He had also serious difficulties with Garcia Hurtado de Mendoza, viceroy of Peru, and his conduct was censured by Philip II. Nevertheless he continued to befriend the Indians. His charity was without bounds, and not only his money, silver plate, etc., were devoted to the relief of the needy, but he was often known to take the shirt from his back and bestow it on a native. He learned at an advanced age several of the Indian idioms, and spoke Quechua, the language of the incas, as it has been called. He established missions in the most remote and inaccessible places, and founded several churches, seminaries, and institutions for the poor and sick. He was on his third diocesan visitation when he learned that part of his diocese, several hundred miles from Lima, was devastated by the plague. Hurrying thither to give the sufferers spiritual and physical aid, he over-exerted himself, and fell a victim to exhaustion in Sana. His body was taken to Lima, he was beatified in 1679 by Pope Innocent XI., and canonized by Benedict XIII. in 1726. His life was written by Antonio Leon Pinelo (Madrid, 1653).

TORICES, Manuel Rodriguez (to-re-thays), Colombian patriot, b. in Cartagena, 24 May, 1788; d. in Bogota, 5 Oct., 1816. He received his education in the College of Rosario in Bogota, where he was graduated in law, but, being fond of scientific investigations, he did not practise his profession, and, retiring to his native city, devoted himself to meteorological observations. When the revolution of 1810 began, the governing junta commissioned him, with Fernandez Madrid, to edit the patriotic paper "Argos Americano." He was elected a member of the municipal council in 1811, and in 1812 president of the constituent assembly of the state, and, in consequence of the governor's resignation, was elected by the assembly, 25 March, 1812, to the executive, with dictatorial powers. When Santa Marta declared in favor of the Spaniards, Torices sent state troops, under command of the French adventurer Labatout, to retake the city, which was occupied on 6 Jan., 1813; but on 5 March a counter-revolution put the place again in the hands of the Spaniards. Torices now marched at the head of re-enforcements against Santa Marta, but was defeated on 10 and 11 May. After the defeat and capture of Nariño by the Spaniards in 1814, the Federal congress of Tunja resolved to confide the national executive to a triumvirate, consisting of Restrepo, Rovira, and Torices, and in January, 1815, the last-named went to Bogota, and was elected to the presidency of the triumvirate. He commissioned Bolivar to march against Santa Marta; but, the state government of Cartagena refusing to co-operate, the expedition was prevented, and Bolivar sailed for Jamaica on 8 May, the royalists obtaining great advantages for want of combined action by the patriot chiefs. In November of that year the triumvirate was superseded by the election of Dr. Camilo Torres as president; but Torices, as vice-president, remained one of his principal advisers, and when, after the defeat of Garcia Rovira at Cachiri, and the approach of the royalist troops, the evacuation of the capital was decided upon, Torices fled with Torres and others, was captured at Buenaventura, taken to Bogota, and shot by order of Gen. Morillo.

TORNOS, Alberto de, educator, b. in Cariñena, Aragon, Spain, 9 April, 1821; d. in New York city, 22 March, 1887. His father, Andres de Tornos y Beltran, was a well-known lawyer. The son became a teacher, and, after holding several offices in Spain, went to Porto Rico in 1845, where he was appointed by royal order director of the seminary of teachers of the island. On 19 May, 1845, he received his diploma as a graduate of the normal school at Madrid, with the title of professor and director of normal schools of the kingdom of Spain. As director of the Central military academy of Porto Rico he was given the title of captain. After occupying many posts in Porto Rico, Cuba, and Mexico, he came to the United States about 1848. He held the office of professor of languages at Spring Hill college, Ala., for three years, and a similar post at the University of Louisiana, where he remained for many years. He wrote for the press on educational topics, and did much to promote public instruction. He was professor of Spanish at the New York evening high-school about twenty years. He published "De Tornos's Combined Spanish Method," and of which more than 20,000 copies have been sold (New York, 1867), wrote a book of Spanish and English correspondence, as well as two novels in Spanish, and several text-books for acquiring foreign languages.—His son, Manuel Alberto, b. in New York city, 2 June, 1862, was educated in the public schools, and since 1881 has been secretary of the Spanish consulate-general in New York city. Having rendered important services to the Spanish representatives in this country, in 1888 he was decorated by the queen regent of Spain with the cross of the order of Caballero de la Real orden de Isabel la Católica. He has published "Spanish Tariffs, with Extracts from the Custom-House Regulations" (New York, 1888).

TORO, Fermin, Venezuelan statesman, b. in Caracas in 1807; d. there in 1865. He received an excellent private education, but was never graduated. After being employed in his early years in the national treasury, he was promoted collector of the island of Margarita, and in 1831 was elected, before the legal age, to congress, where he soon became known as an orator. He was also a member of the constituent congress, and was called to the cabinet by Gen. Soublette as secretary of state and provisionally of the treasury, also representing his country as minister in Bogota and Madrid. In 1845-'6, with Juan M. Cajigal, he edited "El Correo de Carácas." In 1858 he was one of the intimate advisers of Gen. Castro, and under Gen. Paez formed part of his cabinet. He published "Los Mártires," a romance (Caracas, 1834); "Disertación sobre la ley de 10 de Abril de 1834" (1835); "América y Europa" (1836); and many poems published by his friend, Manuel Cañete, under the pen-name of Emiro Kastos (Paris, 1847). He left in manuscript "La Sibila de los Andes," a novel, and "La Hecatonfonia" and "El veinticuatro de Enero," poems.

TORO ZAMBRANO, Matéo de, president of Chili, b. in Santiago in 1724; d. there, 26 Feb., 1811. During the Spanish reign he occupied several public offices, and contributed to the construction of the breakwater in Santiago, and of a bridge across Mapocho river. He equipped at his own expense a company against the Araucanian revolt, the command of which he gave to his son, Jose Gregorio. In 1762 he was appointed acting president during the absence of Juan Balmaceda, and, when President Manuel Amat went to Peru as viceroy in 1768, Toro Zambrano occupied his place provisionally. Charles III. created him Count de la Conquista in 1771, and in 1809 the central junta of Seville gave him the rank of brigadier. When in 1810 the opposition against President Carrasco began, the audiencia, alarmed by the popular demonstrations, caused the latter to resign, and appointed in his stead Toro Zambrano on 16 July. But the excitement continued, and on 18 Sept. Toro convoked a meeting of the authorities and citizens, before whom he resigned the presidency, and was elected again president of the new popular junta, of which Juan Martinez Rozas was the chief spirit. Toro Zambrano's age and feeble character prevented him from taking an active part in the government, and he died before the complete separation of the country from Spain.

TORQUEMADA, Juan de (tor-kay-mah'-dah), Spanish historian, b. in Valladolid about 1550; d. in Mexico about 1625. He went to Mexico in his youth as an officer, but assumed there the habit of St. Francis, and, besides studying theology, took a course in the Aztec language, history, and antiquities under the direction of the Indian cacique, Antonio Valeriano, who was one of the teachers at the College of Santiago de Tlaltelolco. He became a professor in Tlaltelolco, and finally superior of the college, meanwhile continuing assiduously his studies in ancient history, and after twenty years of labor published his great historical work. In 1614 he was elected provincial of his order at the general chapter in Xochimilco, and during his administration he constructed one of the great causeways that leads to the city of Mexico, which is now called San Cristobal. Besides some ecclesiastical biographies, he wrote "Monarquía Indiana, compuesta de 22 Libros" (3 vols., Seville, 1615; Madrid, 1723), which, notwithstanding his ecclesiastical prejudices, is considered fairly impartial and truthful, although it has been greatly improved by Carlos de Sigüenza's "Anotaciones."

TORRANCE, Frederick William, Canadian jurist, b. in Montreal in July, 1823. He was the son of a Scotch merchant of Montreal, and was educated at Paris and at Edinburgh university, where he received the degree of M. A. in 1844. On his return to Canada he studied law, was called to the bar in 1848, became professor of Roman law in McGill university in 1854, and was appointed puisne judge of the superior court in 1868. He aided in establishing the "Lower Canada Jurist," and managed it several years. McGill university gave him the degree of B. C. L. in 1856, and since 1870 he has been one of its governors.

TORRE, José Maria de la (tor-ray), Cuban archæologist, b. in Havana in 1815; d. there in 1873. He studied law in his native city, and was admitted to the bar in 1841, but he never practised as a lawyer, devoting himself instead to teaching. He published a remarkable map showing the districts into which the island was divided before its discovery by Columbus, accompanied by learned researches and notes on the history of Cuba, and made numerous contributions to the geography, history, and archæology of the island. In 1848 he was commissioned to travel in the United States and Europe to study improvements in agriculture and the industrial arts, and to introduce them into Cuba. The results of this journey were very useful. He was a member of the Royal academy of history of Madrid, and other scientific and antiquarian societies. His works are "Mapa antiguo de Cuba" (Havana, 1837); "Gran Cuadro Sinóptico de la Monarquía Española" (1845); "Lo que fuimos y lo que somos," a history of Havana (1857); "El Robinson Cubano" (1860); and numerous text-books for schools.

TORRE, Tomas de la, Spanish missionary, b. in Salamanca about 1510; d. in Chiapa, Mexico, in 1567. He studied at the Dominican college of San Esteban, in Salamanca, and when twenty years of age entered the order and was attached to the missions of Santo Domingo. He became there one of the most trusted assistants of Bishop Bartolome de Las Casas in his exertions in behalf of the conquered Indians, and incurred the hostility of the Spanish authorities by his fearless denunciation of their cruelties. Las Casas therefore ordered him to Guatemala in 1544, and he travelled for three years through the country preaching the gospel. He became in 1547 vicar of Cinacautlan, prior of the convent of Guatemala in 1550, and provincial of the order in 1553. He founded the convents of Chiapa and Copanabaxtla and schools for the Indians, and built churches and colleges. He left a valuable manuscript, "Historia de los principios de la Provincia de Chiapa y Guatemala, del orden de Santo Domingo," which was used by Father Antonio de Remesal in his "Historia de las Provincias de Chiapa y Guatemala" (Madrid, 1619).

TORRES, Camilo (tor'-rays), Colombian statesman, b. in Popayan, 22 Nov., 1766; d. in Bogota, 5 Oct., 1816. He received his education in his native city, where he studied Latin, Greek, and philosophy, and was graduated in law. He served on several commissions for his government, and was considered at that time the first jurist of New Granada. On 20 July, 1810, he joined the patriot cause. The congress of Leiva nominated him, 4 Oct., 1812, president of the federation, but Antonio Nariño did not acknowledge the authority of congress, and refused to enter the confederacy. In 1814, during the triumvirate, he was president of congress, and as such assisted Bolívar to subdue the unitarian government of Bogotá and to prepare an expedition against Santa Marta and Venezuela. After the landing of Gen. Pablo Morillo in July, 1815, congress elected Torres supreme chief of the nation on 15 Nov., but, on the approach of Morillo and Calzada, he saw the hopelessness of resistance, and resigning, 14 March, 1816, fled to the south. He was captured by the Spaniards in Buenaventura, whence he was expecting to sail for Buenos Ayres, transported to Bogotá, and, with three other leaders, shot by order of Morillo.

TORRES, Diego de, Spanish missionary, b. in Spain in 1551; d. in La Plata, South America, in 1638. He was a Spanish nobleman who became a Jesuit in Valladolid in 1571, and spent most of his life in Peru, where he governed several colleges and convents. He was also the founder of the missions of Paraguay. Torres was sent to Rome as procurator of his province in 1602, and availed himself of this circumstance to publish his work entitled "Relatione Breve del P. Diego de Torres della Compagnia di Giesú, procurator della Provincia del Perú circa il frutto che si raccoglie con gli Indiani di quel Regno" (Rome, 1603; Spanish translation, 1603; Latin, 1604; French, Paris, 1604; Polish, Dantzie, 1603).

TORRES CAICEDO, José María, South American publicist, b. in Bogotá, New Granada, 30 March, 1830. He began, when seventeen years old, to compose verses and to write for newspapers, and was afterward managing editor of "El Progreso" and "El Día" in opposition to the government, which retaliated by inciting a riot, in the course of which his printing-office was broken open and the type destroyed. Later he was elected to the Colombian congress, was afterward secretary of legation at London and Paris, intendant for the states of Bolívar and Magdalena, secretary of an embassy to Washington, and Venezuelan consul-general and chargé d'affaires in France and the Netherlands, but he retired in 1864 to devote himself exclusively to literature, and has since lived in Paris. In January, 1872, he became chargé d'affaires of the republic of San Salvador in France and Belgium. Torres Caicedo was elected on 4 May, 1872, a corresponding member of the Paris academy of moral and political sciences. He has been for years a contributor to European journals, and has published "Religión, Patria y Amor," a collection of poems (Paris, 1862); "Ensayos Biográficos y de Crítica Literaria" (2 vols., 1863); "Unión Latino-Americana" (1864); "Mis Ideas y mis Principios" (3 vols., 1865); and "Les principes de 1789 en Amérique" (1869).

TORRES RUBIO, Diego de, South American educator, b. in Valencia, Spain, in 1547; d. in Chuquisaca, Bolivia, 13 April, 1638. He entered the Society of Jesus, and went to Peru in 1579. He devoted himself almost entirely to the study of the native dialects, which he taught in Chuquisaca for thirty years. He published "Grammatica et Vocabularium linguarum Aymaræ, et Quichuæ, quarum est usus in Peruvio" (Rome, 1603); "Arte de la lengua Aymara," which is very rare and commands a high price (Lima, 1616); and "Arte de la lengua Quechua" (1619).

TORRES Y AYALA, Laureano, Marquis of Casa-Torres, Spanish soldier, b. in Havana, Cuba, in 1645; d. in Spain in 1722. He went as a boy to Spain, where he entered the army, and in 1693 was appointed governor of Florida. After a few years he returned to Spain, and from 1704 till 1707 took part in the first war of the succession. In the last-named year he was appointed governor-general of the island of Cuba. He filled this office until 1711, when he was suspended during an investigation of his acts that was ordered by the Madrid government; but he was appointed again to the same post in 1713, his administration lasting till 1716. Under his rule the tobacco industry was developed greatly, and the plant began to be cultivated extensively in the district that is known as "Vuelta Abajo." He founded the city of Santiago del Bejucal, and established a foundling-hospital at Havana, and other charitable institutions.

TORRES Y RUEDA, Marcos de, viceroy of Mexico, b. in Almanza, Spain, in 1591; d. in Mexico, 22 April, 1649. He was graduated at the University of Alcalá, and, after obtaining holy orders, was professor of theology in Osma and Valladolid. Later he became canon of the cathedral of Burgos and rector of the College of San Nicolás in the same city, when in 1644 he was presented by Philip IV. to the bishopric of Yucatan, and confirmed in the same year by Pope Innocent X. He was consecrated by the bishop of Puebla, and in November, 1646, arrived in Campeche, taking possession of his see in Merida in the next month.

He was scrupulous in his visitations of his diocese, especially in the investigation of the irregularities of the clergy, who in consequence clamored against him at court. Therefore, in 1647, on the promotion of the Count of Salvatierra to the viceroyalty of Peru, he received orders to take charge of the viceroyalty of Mexico, with the title of governor and president of the royal audiencia. He left Merida in December of that year, and, the outgoing viceroy being detained for some time, he took charge of the government, 13 May, 1648. He finished the cathedral of Puebla, sent reinforcements to Porto Rico, and recommended the erection of a university in Guatemala; but his administration was chiefly noteworthy for the "auto da fé" that was celebrated by his orders, 11 April, 1649. It was one of the largest that was ever celebrated by the Inquisition of Mexico, 13 persons being burned and 107 flogged and otherwise punished; but the governor had already been stricken with the sickness of which he died a few days afterward.

TORRE-TAGLE, José Bernardo, Marquis de, president of Peru, b. in Lima, 21 March, 1779; d. in Callao in 1825. He belonged to one of the best families of Spain, attained the rank of colonel of the army, and, being elected deputy to the cortes, was sent to Spain in 1813 with special recommendation for his good services. Being promoted brigadier, he was appointed inspector of the army of Peru and intendant of the department of Trujillo. When Gen. San Martin landed in Peru, Torre-Tagle was the first Peruvian officer to hoist the national flag in the north, and on 24 Dec., 1820, proclaimed independence in Trujillo. On 26 July, 1822, he was appointed provisional president by San Martin when the latter went to meet Bolivar in Guayaquil. After the departure of San Martin for Chili, on 20 Sept., Torre-Tagle was elected member of the triumvirate under La Mar. In January, 1823, congress appointed him president; but a military mutiny deposed him and proclaimed Riva Agüero on 28 Feb. After the deposition of the latter and his retreat to Trujillo, Torre-Tagle was appointed president by Sucre on 20 July, and elected by congress on 16 Aug., and Bolivar, who on his arrival, 1 Sept., had been proclaimed dictator, left him in charge of the government. When the garrison of Callao revolted, 5 Feb., 1824, for arrears of pay, and, Torre-Tagle failing to provide the necessary means, pronounced for Spain, Bolivar sent Gen. Necochea to arrest him, and congress deposed him on 10 Feb. Fearing to be shot by order of a court-martial, he fled to Callao, where the rebels kept him a prisoner, and on the reoccupation of Lima by the Spaniards, he was offered the place as governor of the capital, but declined, preferring to remain a prisoner of war. After the beginning of the siege of Callao, he tried several times to be admitted on board the blockading Chilean fleet, but Admiral Blanco Encalada refused to receive him except as a prisoner, and he perished with his whole family by the disease that was caused by the famine due to the protracted siege. Although he was not a traitor to his country, as charged by his enemies, he caused great misfortunes by his want of energy and vacillating policy.

TORREY, Bradford, essayist, b. in Weymouth, Mass., 9 Oct., 1843. He was educated in the public schools of his native town, taught for two years, and subsequently engaged in business in Boston. Since 1886 he has been an assistant editor of the "Youth's Companion," and a frequent contributor to periodicals. Mr. Torrey has devoted much time to the study of birds, their habits, peculiarities, and domestic traits. He has written numerous papers on this subject, and published "Birds in the Bush" (Boston, 1885).

TORREY, Charles Turner, reformer, b. in Scituate, Mass., in 1813; d. in Baltimore, Md., 9 May, 1846. His ancestor, James, was an early settler of Scituate. (See TORREY, WILLIAM.) Charles was graduated at Yale in 1830, studied theology, and occupied Congregational pastorates in Princeton, N. J., and Salem, Mass., but soon relinquished his professional duties to devote himself to anti-slavery labors in Maryland. In 1843 he attended a slaveholders' convention in Baltimore, reported its proceedings, and was arrested and put in jail. In 1844, having been detected in his attempt to aid in the escape of several slaves, he was tried, convicted, and sentenced to a long imprisonment in the state penitentiary, where he died of consumption that was brought on by ill usage. His body was taken to Boston, and his funeral attended from Tremont temple by an immense concourse of people. The story of his sufferings and death excited eager interest both in this country and in Europe, and "Torrey's blood crieth out" became a watch-word of the Abolition party, giving new impetus to the anti-slavery cause. He published a "Memoir of William R. Saxton" (Boston, 1838), and "Home, or the Pilgrim's Faith Revived," a volume of sketches of life in Massachusetts, which he prepared in prison (1846). See "Memoir of the Martyr Torrey" (1847).

TORREY, John, botanist, b. in New York city, 15 Aug., 1796; d. there, 10 March, 1873. His father, Capt. William Torrey, served during the Revolutionary war. The son received his early education in public schools in New York city. In his youth he showed a fondness for mechanics, and at one time determined to become a machinist, but, coming under the influence of Amos Eaton, he was taught the structure of flowers with the rudiments of botany, and a knowledge of mineralogy and chemistry. In 1815 he began the study of medicine with Dr. Wright Post, and was graduated at the College of physicians and surgeons. He opened an office in New York city, and engaged in the practice of medicine, at the same time devoting his leisure to botany and other scientific pursuits. The medical profession was not congenial to him, and on 5 Aug., 1824, he entered the U. S. army as assistant surgeon, serving at the U. S. military academy as acting professor of chemistry, mineralogy, and geology until his resignation, 31 Aug., 1828. In 1827 he was chosen professor of chemistry and botany in the College of physicians and surgeons in New York city, and he continued in that place until 1855, when he was made professor emeritus. He was also professor of chemistry at Princeton in 1830-'54, and of chemistry, mineralogy, and botany at the University of the city of New York in 1832-'3. In 1853, on the establishment of the U. S. assay-office in New York city, Dr. Torrey was appointed assayer, which office he continued to fill until his death. He was frequently consulted by the treasury department on matters pertaining to the coinage and currency, and was sent on special missions at various times to visit the different mints. In 1856 he was chosen a trustee of Columbia, and in 1860, having presented the college with his herbarium, numbering about 50,000 specimens, he was made emeritus professor of chemistry and botany. On the consolidation of the College of physicians and surgeons with Columbia in 1860, he was chosen one of its trustees, and his emeritus professorships continued. His advice was frequently sought on scientific subjects by various corporations. Dr. Torrey's earliest publications in the "American Journal of Science" treat of mineralogy. In 1817 he became one of the founders of the New York lyceum of natural history (now the New York academy of science), and one of his first contributions to this body is a "Catalogue of Plants growing spontaneously within Thirty Miles of the City of New York" (Albany, 1819). Its publication gained for him the recognition of foreign and native botanists. He undertook in 1820 the examination of the plants that had been collected around the head-waters of the Mississippi by Prof. David B. Douglass, and during the same year the collections made by Dr. Edwin James, while with the expedition that was sent out to the Rocky mountains under Maj. Stephen H. Long, were submitted to him. His report was the earliest treatise of its kind in this country that was arranged on the natural system. Dr. Torrey, in the mean time, had planned "A Flora of the Northern and Middle United States, or a Systematic Arrangement and Description of all the Plants heretofore discovered in the United States North of Virginia," and in 1824 began its publication in parts, but it was soon suspended owing to the general adoption of the natural system of Jussieu in place of that of Linnaeus. In 1836, on the organization of the geological survey of New York, he was appointed botanist, and required to prepare a flora of the state. His report, consisting of two quarto volumes, was issued in 1843, and no other state in the Union has yet produced a flora to compare with it. He began in 1838, with Asa Gray, "The Flora of North America," which was issued in numbers irregularly until 1843, when they had completed the "Composite," but new botanical material accumulated at such a rapid rate that it was deemed best to discontinue it. Subsequently Dr. Torrey published reports on the plants that were collected by John C. Frémont in the expedition to the Rocky mountains (1845); those gathered by Maj. William H. Emory on the reconnoissance from Fort Leavenworth, Mo., to San Diego, Cal. (1848); the specimens secured by Capt. Howard Stansbury on his expedition to the Great Salt Lake of Utah (1852); the plants collected by John C. Frémont in California (1853); those brought back from the Red river of Louisiana by Capt. Randolph B. Marcy (1853); and the botany of Capt. Lorenzo Sitgreaves's expedition to the Zuni and Colorado rivers (1854); also memoirs on the botany of the various expeditions for the purpose of determining the most practicable route for a Pacific railroad (1855-'60). He also reported on the "Botany of the Mexican Boundary Survey" (1859), that of the expedition upon the Colorado river of the West under Lieut. Joseph C. Ives (1861), and, in association with Asa Gray, the botanical collections of the Wilkes exploring expedition. The last was in his hands at the time of his death, its publication having been delayed by the civil war. The Torreya taxifolia, an ornamental shade-tree in the southern states, was named in his honor, and the Torreya Californica of California, the Torreya nucifera of Japan, and the Torreya grandis of northern China, bear his name. The association of botanists that originally met at his residence were chartered as the Torrey botanical club, and he was its first president. Besides being the last surviving charter-member of the Lyceum of natural history, he held its vice-presidency for several years, and was president in 1824-'6 and 1838, holding the same office in the American association for the advancement of science in 1855, and he was one of the original members of the National academy of science, being named as such by act of congress in 1863. The degree of A. M. was conferred on him by Yale in 1823, and that of LL D. by Amherst in 1845. His bibliography is extensive, including contributions on botanical subjects to scientific periodicals and to the transactions of the societies of which he was a member. A sketch of his life by his pupil and life-long associate, Asa Gray, was contributed to the "Biographical Memoirs" of the National academy of sciences (Washington, 1877).

TORREY, Joseph, clergyman, b. in Rowley, Mass., 2 Feb., 1797; d. in Burlington, Vt., 26 Nov., 1867. He was graduated at Dartmouth in 1816, and at Andover theological seminary in 1819, and was pastor of a Congregational church in Royalton, Vt., in 1824-'7. He was professor of Greek and Latin in the University of Vermont in 1827-'42, of intellectual and moral philosophy in 1842-'67, and its president in 1862-'6. (See illustration below.) Harvard gave him the degree of D. D. in 1850. He is the author of a posthumous volume of lectures entitled "A Theory of Fine Art" (New York, 1874); edited "Remains of President James Marsh" (1843) and "Select Sermons of President Worthington

Smith" (1861), to both of which he prefixed memoirs; and translated Neander's "General History of the Christian Religion and Church," which may be considered the principal work of his life (5 vols., Boston, 1854).—His daughter, Mary Cutler, author, b. in Burlington, Vt., 28 May, 1831, was educated in private schools and by her father. She is the author of "America," a dramatic poem (New York, 1863), and has edited Joseph Torrey's "Theory of Fine Art" and his revised edition of Neander's "Church History" (Boston, 1872), herself preparing the index volume (1881).

TORREY, Joseph William, rajah of Amboy and Mavoodu, Borneo, b. in Bath, Me., 22 April, 1828; d. near Boston, Mass., in March, 1884. He was educated in Roxbury, became a reporter on the Boston "Times," and was subsequently connected with Benjamin P. Shillaber in the publication of the "Carpet-Bag." He became a clerk in a commercial house in Melbourne, Australia, in 1853, and went to Hong Kong in 1857, where he was a partner in the firm of Montgomery, Parker and Co., and editor and manager of the "Hong Kong Times" and the "China Mail." He was subsequently appointed vice-consul in Siam, and practised law with success in that country. He founded the American trading company of Borneo in 1864. At that time the whole of Borneo was under the absolute sway of the sultan, but the Trading company settled upon about 20,000 square miles in the provinces of Amboy and Mavoodu. In 1865, the sultan's power being threatened by the encroachment of foreign nations, he made an ally of the company by recognizing Mr. Torrey as rajah or governor of all the territory that it occupied, the company paying him a small yearly tribute. As chief executive of the provinces, Torrey exercised the rights of an absolute sovereign, with power of retaining his office for life and of naming his successor. He occupied that post for fourteen years, and then became secretary to the U. S. legation in Siam. He returned to this country in 1883, and a few weeks before his death was appointed by the king of Siam his chief adviser, but died before deciding whether to accept or decline that office.

TORREY, William, colonist, b. in Combe, St. Nicholas, Somersetshire, England, in 1590; d. in Weymouth, Mass., about 1675. He was descended from an eminent English family, and carefully educated. He emigrated to this country in 1632 with his brother James, who settled in Seituate. William went to Weymouth, took an active part in the affairs of the colony, became a magistrate, and captain of the train-band, which at that time was the highest local military office, and for many years represented the town in the general court, where, owing to his accomplishments as a penman, he was always either clerk or secretary. He was also a member of all the town educational and literary committees, and in the latter capacity was appointed to examine and report on John Eliot's Indian Bible. He is the author of a work on the millennium entitled "A Discourse Concerning Futurities," which was published, with a biographical notice of him, by Thomas Prince (1757).—His son, Samuel, clergyman, b. in England in 1631; d. in Weymouth, Mass., 10 April, 1707, was educated at Harvard, but left before taking his degree, studied theology, and in 1656 became pastor of the church at Weymouth, which post he held for fifty-one years. He preached the election sermon in 1674, 1683, and 1689, and was a "person of such deep and extensive views that the governor and council would send for him to come fifteen miles to aid them with his advice and wise observations." He declined the presidency of Harvard in 1686, but for many years was a fellow of the corporation.

TORRUBIA, José, Spanish naturalist, b. in Granada, Spain, late in the 17th century; d. in Rome, Italy, in 1768. He entered the order of the Barefooted Franciscans, in the convent of St. Peter of Alcantara, in Granada, went as missionary to the Philippine islands, and was secretary to the commissary-general of the religious orders in Mexico. When this official attempted to reform some of these orders, they rose against him, and after his death in 1748 Torrubiá was imprisoned for four months, when he was released by the syndic-general of the Franciscans, who sent him to Cadiz. He went to Rome, was appointed president of the Franciscan chapter of the province of Mexico, and filled several other posts of responsibility in his order. He travelled through various Asiatic countries, and spent some time in every Spanish province in South America. He knew several Indian languages, while his acquaintance with those of Asia and Europe acquired for him a great reputation, both in Italy and Spain, and scientists of note visited him in his cell. He published many works, of which the most important are "Disertación histórica geográfica sobre la América del Sur" (Madrid, 1742); "Descripción poética de la planta Gia que se halla en los campos de la Habana" (1744); and "Aparato para la historia natural de la Nueva España" (1754).

TOTEPEHU (to-tay-pay-hoo'), fourth king of Tollan, Mexico; d. in 927. He was the son of Huetzin, whom he succeeded on the throne in 875, and under his reign arts and agriculture flourished in Tula or Tollan, which was the cradle of culture for the plateau of Mexico. Thence, after the destruction of the Toltec kingdom, civilization spread on its southward march to Tehuantepec, Central America, and probably Yucatan. Totepehu was succeeded by his son, Nacaxoc.

TOTIRI, Stephen (to-tee'-ree), Indian convert, lived in the first half of the 17th century. He resided in the town of St. Joseph, where he was regarded as a saint. When missionaries came to his village in 1641 he offered his cabin for a chapel, and, after their departure, instructed the catechumens in Christian doctrine. In 1643 he accompanied Father Jogues, and was captured with him by the Iroquois, but he eluded their vigilance and escaped to his own country, where he preached the gospel in every direction. The French missionaries, having been forced to discontinue their work among the Attiwandaronks, a tribe known as the "neutral nation," in 1644, Totiri went thither. He explained the Christian doctrine by means of symbols, and the curiosity that he excited resulted in his making many converts. He returned to his tribe in 1646. On one occasion, after vainly trying to save an Iroquois prisoner that was about to be put to death, he instructed him in the Christian faith, and, although threatened with death by his kinsmen, baptized the Iroquois before he was sent to the stake. A number of his tribe remained heathens, and he several times nearly lost his life. But his calmness and courage eventually prevailed, and the village gradually submitted to his control.

TOTOQUIYAUHTZIN (to-to-ke-yah-oo-tseen'), king of Tlacopan, or Tacuba, Mexico, d. in 1469. He was a grandson of Tetzotzomoc, king of Azcapotzalco, by his son Tayatzin, and when the latter, who had been aided by Chimalpopoca, king of Mexico, was murdered by his brother, Maxtla, Tayatzin's orphan son was fostered by Izcohuatl. When the latter defeated Maxtla in 1430, and destroyed the capital and monarchy of Azcapotzalco, he erected part of the conquered territory into a kingdom, which he gave, with the assent of Netzahualcoyotl, to Totoquiyauhtzin. The latter was succeeded in 1469 by his son, whom, in memory of his father's first protector, he had named Chimalpopoca.—His grandson, TOTOQUIYAUHTZIN II., succeeded his father in 1487, and was in turn succeeded in 1503 by his son, the unfortunate Tettlepanquetzal.

TOTTEN, Benjamin J., naval officer, b. in the West Indies in 1806; d. in New Bedford, Mass., 9 May, 1877. He entered the navy as a midshipman, 2 March, 1823, became a passed midshipman, 20 Feb., 1830, was promoted to lieutenant, 29 March, 1834, and was commissioned a commander, 14 Sept., 1855. He was in charge of the sloop "Vincennes" in 1858-'60 on the coast of Africa to suppress the slave-trade, and the "Brandywine" of the North Atlantic squadron, 1862-'3, most of the time being stationed at Hampton Roads, Va. He was placed on the reserved list in July, 1862, and served at the naval rendezvous at New Bedford, Mass., during the rest of the war after May, 1863. He was retired, 1 Oct., 1864, and promoted to commodore on the retired list, 4 April, 1867, after which he was governor of the naval asylum at Philadelphia for two years. He was the author of "Totten's Naval Text-Book" (Boston, 1841; revised eds., New York, 1862 and 1864).

TOTTEN, George Muirson, civil engineer, b. in New Haven, Conn., 28 May, 1809; d. in New York city, 8 June, 1884. He was educated in Capt. Alden Partridge's military academy in Middletown, Conn., and began work as a civil engineer on the Farmington canal in 1827. Subsequently he went to Pennsylvania and was there employed upon the Juniata canal. In 1831 he was one of the engineers of the Delaware and Raritan canal in New Jersey, and in 1835 he was engaged in building the railroad from Reading to Port Clinton. For several years following he was employed in building railroads in Virginia, Pennsylvania, and North Carolina. In 1843 he was appointed engineer-in-chief of the canal del Dique, which connects Magdalena river with the harbor of Carthagena in Colombia. He was appointed in 1850 engineer-in-chief of the Panama railroad, and spent twenty-five years among difficulties of every sort in the completion of this arduous task. In 1879 he was associated with Ferdinand de Lesseps on the commission that went to the isthmus to decide on the canal project. Later he went to Venezuela, where he was engaged in the survey of a railroad, and he afterward became consulting engineer of the Panama railroad.

TOTTEN, James, soldier, b. in Pittsburg, Pa., 11 Sept., 1818; d. in Sedalia, Mo., 1 Oct., 1871. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1841, became 1st lieutenant in 1847, engaged in the Florida war against the Seminole Indians in 1849-'50, and became captain in 1855. He aided in quelling the Kansas disturbances in 1857-'8, and in expelling intruders from the Indian reserves in Kansas and Arkansas in 1860. While in command of Little Rock arsenal in February, 1861, he was compelled to evacuate that post by a superior Confederate force under Gov. Henry M. Rector. He served under Gen. Nathaniel Lyon and Gen. John C. Frémont in the military operations in Missouri as chief of artillery, was engaged at Camp Jackson, Booneville, and Wilson's Creek, and in June was brevetted major in the U. S. army for Camp Jackson, and lieutenant-colonel in August, 1861, for "gallant and meritorious service" in all these actions. He became major in the 1st Missouri volunteers, 19 Aug., 1861, lieutenant-colonel the next month, and assistant inspector-general, with the rank of major, in November. On 12 Feb., 1862, he became brigadier-general of Missouri militia, in command of the central district of the state. He then engaged in several actions on the frontier and in pursuit of the enemy beyond Boston mountains, Ark., became inspector-general of the Department of the Missouri in May, 1863, and chief of artillery and chief of ordnance in 1864. He was brevetted colonel, U. S. army, on 13 March, 1865, "for gallant and meritorious conduct during the siege of Mobile, Ala.," and on the same day brigadier-general in the U. S. army "for gallant and meritorious service in the field" during the civil war. He was inspector-general of the Military division of the Atlantic from 15 Aug., 1865, till 27 Aug., 1866, and became lieutenant-colonel, U. S. army, and assistant inspector-general, 13 June, 1867. In 1870 he was retired.—His son, Charles Adiel Lewis, inventor, b. in New London, Conn., 3 Feb., 1851, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1873, was professor of military science and tactics in the Massachusetts agricultural college at Amherst in 1875-'8, and occupied a similar chair in St. Paul's cathedral school, Garden City, N. Y., in 1893-'6. He is now 1st lieutenant in the 4th artillery. He served in the Bannock campaign in 1878, and in the Chiricahua campaign in 1881. In 1877 he patented an improvement in explosives, one in collimating sights, one in signal-shells, and several minor inventions. He patented "Strategos," a war-game, in 1880, a system of weights and measures in 1884, and improvements in linear and other scales in 1885. Trinity gave him the degree of A. M. in 1885. He has written extensively on pyramid explorations, lectured in favor of Prof. Piazzi Smyth's pyramid theories, and for several years was chairman of the committee on pyramid exploration in the International institute for preserving Anglo-Saxon weights and measures. His publications include "Strategos, the American War-Game" (2 vols., New York, 1880); "An Important Question in Metrology," a plea for the Anglo-Saxon against the metric system (1883); and, under the pen-name of Ten Alcott, "Gems, Talismans, and Guardians, the Facts, Fancies, Legends, and Lore of Nativity" (1887).

TOTTEN, Joseph Gilbert, soldier, b. in New Haven, Conn., 23 Aug., 1788; d. in Washington, D. C., 22 April, 1864. He received his earliest education under the direction of his maternal uncle, Jared Mansfield, by whom he was brought up after the death of his mother. After his uncle's occupation of the chair of mathematics at the U. S. military academy the boy received an appointment from Connecticut as cadet. In 1805 he was graduated and promoted 2d lieutenant in the corps of engineers. Meanwhile Capt. Mansfield, having been made surveyor-general of Ohio and the western territories, obtained the services of his nephew as secretary of the first systematic survey of any of the new states of the Union. While holding this place he resigned in 1806 from the army, but returned to the engineering corps two years later, and began his career as a military engineer under Col. Jonathan Williams. His first work was on the construction of Castle Williams and Fort Clinton in New York harbor, of which he had special supervision in 1808-'12; and in July, 1810, he was promoted 1st lieutenant. During the war of 1812 he served as chief engineer of the army under Gen. Stephen Van Rensselaer on the Niagara frontier, and participated in the battle of Queenstown. Subsequently he was chief engineer of the army under Gen. Henry Dearborn in 1813, and of that under Gen. Alexander Macomb in 1814. His services gained for him promotion to captain, and the brevets of major in 1813 and lieutenant-colonel for his conduct at Plattsburg in 1814. At the close of the war he returned to duties in connection with the National coast defences and served chiefly at Newport, R. I., where he had charge of the construction of Fort Adams until 7 Dec., 1838, when, having passed through the grades of major in 1818 and lieutenant-colonel in 1828, he was appointed colonel and chief engineer of the U. S. army. In connection with the labors incidental to this office, he was intrusted with the inspectorship and supervision of the U. S. military academy, which duties he filled until his death. At the beginning of the Mexican war he was called by Gen. Winfield Scott to take charge of the engineering operations of the army that was to invade Mexico. In this capacity he directed the siege of Vera Cruz, for which he was brevetted brigadier-general. He then returned to his official duties in Washington; and, in addition to his regular work, was a member of the light-house board in 1851-'8 and 1860-'4, also serving in 1855 as a state commissioner for the preservation of the harbor of New York, and later in similar capacity in Boston. In 1859-'61 he made a reconnaissance of the Pacific coast of the United States to determine the requisites for its defence, and inspecting fortifications. After the beginning of the civil war he had charge of the engineer bureau in Washington, and acted on various military commissions. When the corps of engineers and that of topographical engineers were consolidated in 1863, he was made brigadier-general on 3 March, and for his long, faithful, and eminent services was brevetted major-general on 21 April, 1864. He was one of the regents of the Smithsonian institution from its establishment in 1846 until his death. Gen. Totten was interested in natural science and was an authority on the conchology of the northern coast of the United States, publishing occasional papers, in which he described hitherto unknown species. The Gemma Tottenii and the Succinea Tottenii were so named in his honor. He also published papers on mineralogy. The degree of A. M. was conferred on him by Brown in 1829, and, in addition to membership in other scientific societies, he was named by act of congress in 1863 one of the corporate members of the National academy of sciences. He published papers on scientific subjects, which appeared in transactions of societies of which he was a member, and various reports on national defences; and translated from the French "Essays on Hydraulic and Other Cements" (New York, 1842). See a sketch by Gen. John G. Barnard in "Biographical Memoirs of the National Academy of Sciences" (Washington, 1877).

TOTTEN, Silas, clergyman, b. in Schoharie county, N. Y., 26 March, 1804; d. in Lexington, Ky., 7 Oct., 1873. He was graduated at Union college in 1830, and ordained to the ministry of the Protestant Episcopal church in Connecticut by Bishop Brownell in 1833. In the same year he was elected professor of mathematics and natural philosophy in Washington (now Trinity) college, from which chair after four years he was elevated to the presidency. During the eleven years for which he held this office (1837-'48) a new building—Brownell hall—was erected for the accommodation of the students. The name of the institution was changed, at the request of the alumni, to Trinity college, the graduates were organized into a house of convocation as a constituent part of the academic body, additions were made to the scholarship funds, and a library fund was established. A chapter of the Phi Beta Kappa society was also established in the college, of which Dr. Totten was the first president. On retiring from the presidency of Trinity college, Dr. Totten accepted the professorship of belles-lettres in William and Mary college, Va., which he resigned in 1859, to become chancellor of the University of Iowa. In 1864 he accepted the rectorship of a parish in Decatur, Ill., from which place he removed in 1866 to Lexington, Ky., where he occupied himself in teaching for the remainder of his life. Dr. Totten received his honorary degree in divinity from Union college in 1838, and that in laws from William and Mary college in 1860. He was the author of "New Introduction to Algebra" (New York, 1836); "The Analogy of Truth" (1848); and a "Letter about Jubilee College" (1848).

TOUCEY, Isaac, statesman, b. in Newtown, Fairfield co., Conn., 5 Nov., 1796; d. in Hartford, Conn., 30 July, 1869. He was descended from Thomas, first Congregational minister of Newtown. He received a private classical education, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1818 at Hartford, where he afterward practised. He was state's attorney for Hartford county in 1822-'5, a representative in congress from the first Connecticut district in 1835-'9, and was again state's attorney for Hartford county in 1842-'4. He was unsuccessful as the Democratic candidate for governor of Connecticut in 1845, and in 1846, there being no choice by the people, was elected by the legislature, but he was again defeated in 1847. He was appointed attorney-general of the United States, serving from 21 June, 1848, till 3 March, 1849, and was also for part of this time acting secretary of state. He was a member of the state senate in 1850, and of the state house of representatives in 1852, and was elected a U. S. senator from Connecticut as a Democrat, serving from 14 May, 1852, till 3 March, 1857. Mr. Toucey was appointed by President Buchanan secretary of the navy, served from 6 March, 1857, till 3 March, 1861, and afterward returned to Hartford and resumed the practice of his profession. He was charged with favoring the cause of the seceding states while secretary of the navy by deliberately sending some of the best vessels of the navy to distant seas to prevent their being used against the Confederates. This was denied, but he was generally thought to sympathize with the south and to be opposed to prosecution of the war.

TOUCHARD, Louis Charles (too-shar), naval officer, b. in New Orleans in 1741; d. at sea, 12 April, 1782. He received his education in Martinique, entered the marines in 1755, and took part in several campaigns in the Gulf of Mexico. As lieutenant he commanded in 1769 a scientific expedition to the South sea and determined the geographical position of points along the Patagonian coast, the Strait of Lemaire, and Tierra del Fuego. While attached to the station of Cayenne in 1772 he conducted hostilities against corsairs, who were then numerous in the Atlantic ocean between South America and Africa, and, being promoted commander in 1777, participated in the victory of Count d'Orvilliers off Ouessant, 27 July, 1778. He was sent afterward with two frigates to the West Indies, joined D'Estaing's naval force, and assisted in the attack on St. Lucia and St. Vincent and the capture of Granada. As captain he served under De Guichen, and in 1781 under De Vaudreuil. When De Grasse and Vaudreuil left for Yorktown he remained with the Marquis de Bouillé, assisted in the capture of St. Eustatius, and ravaged the English colonies of Bahama. When chased by a superior force he gave battle off Havana and escaped capture. Joining De Grasse again in 1782, he took command of the "Pluton," the sister ship of the "Ville de Paris," the admiral's flag-ship, and made strenuous efforts to relieve the admiral, when he was surrounded by superior forces. When he himself was attacked by two English men-of-war, he captured one, but was killed in the moment of victory. His vessel rejoined Vaudreuil's division, and he was buried with honors in Martinique.

TOUCHIMBERT, Éloi Angélique Prévost Sansac, Marquis de (too-sham-bair), West Indian magistrate, b. in Basse-Terre, Guadeloupe, 29 Sept., 1786; d. at sea, 5 May, 1839. He emigrated with his parents to New Orleans, but after the coup d'état of 1799 returned to Guadeloupe, and during the English invasion raised a regiment among his slaves, led them to the field, and was severely wounded in the attack on Morne Bel-Air, 3 Feb., 1810, and publicly praised by Capt.-Gen. Ernouf. After the surrender of the colony he was appointed by Lord Cochrane judge of the supreme court of Guadeloupe, and later confirmed by Louis XVIII. He was also made a gentleman of the king's private chamber, and president of the grand electoral college of the colony. Marquis de Touchimbert—who belonged to one of the most illustrious French families, being the lineal descendant of that famous Count de Sansac of whom King Francis I. said, "There are only three real gentlemen in France, Sansac, Saint-André, and I"—was nevertheless a Liberal, and always advocated the enfranchisement of the slaves. As a member of the colonial assembly of Guadeloupe, he alone supported the motion of the crown for freeing the negroes for a liberal consideration, and, as a member of the privy council of the governor, he enforced the rights of the slaves. Failing health induced him to set out for France, and he died when in sight of land.

TOULMIN, Henry, author, b. in Taunton, England, in 1767; d. in Washington county, Ala., 11 Nov., 1823. He was the son of the eminent Dr. Joshua Toulmin, and was a dissenting minister for several years at Chorobert, Lancashire. He came to Norfolk, Va., in 1793, and was president of Transylvania university in 1794-'6. He was secretary of state of Kentucky in 1796-1804, and appointed judge of the U. S. district court of Mississippi in 1804. During his latter years he resided in Alabama, assisted in framing the constitution of that state, and served in the legislature. He published "Description of Kentucky" (1792); "Magistrate's Assistant"; "Collection of the Acts of Kentucky" (Frankfort, 1802); "Review of the Criminal Law of Kentucky," with James Blair (1804); and "Digest of the Laws of the State of Alabama" (Cahawba, 1823).

TOUR, Charles (or CLAUDE) Turgis de St. Étienne, Sieur de la, b. in France; d. in Nova Scotia after 1635. While on his way to the latter country in 1629 to join his son, who held command of the fort at Cape Sable, he was captured by the English and carried as a prisoner to London. He married a lady of rank at the English court, and was made a baronet of Nova Scotia. He was won over to the English government by this honor, and promised to put them in possession of the post that his son held in Acadia. On this assurance two war vessels were given him, and he embarked with his wife in 1630. His efforts to persuade his son to surrender failed, and an attack on the fortress was repelled. He thus found himself in a position of great difficulty; he could not return to either England or France, and finally decided, with the consent of his wife, to throw himself on the mercy of his son. The latter replied that he would cheerfully give him an asylum, but could not permit him to enter his forts. With the consent of the English commander, he landed with his wife and servants. A house was built for him at some distance from the fort by his son, who took care of his support. The Sieur Denys says, in his "Description géographique," that he met La Tour and his family there about 1635, and that they were very comfortably situated.—His son, Charles Amador de St. Étienne, b. in France; d. in Nova Scotia about 1665, was made commandant of Fort St. Louis at Cape Sable, and a part of the peninsula was bequeathed to him by Biencourt Poutrincourt. His resistance to the attack of the English under his father in 1630 has been described. Two ships arrived shortly afterward from France to support him. He was made in February, 1631, lieutenant-general of Acadia, where his authority was limited to Fort St. Louis and Port de la Tour, and wrote a letter to his father urging him to return to his duty. Some time before this he had founded Fort Pentagoet, on Penobscot bay, near the present Castine, Me. After the restoration of Acadia to France in 1632 he received important grants on the St. John's river, where he founded settlements in 1635, and in 1638 he was not only secured in these possessions, but was made lieutenant-general on the coast of Acadia from the middle of the main-land of the Bay of Fundy to Camceaux, as well as what is now known as Nova Scotia. Complaints were made of him about this time to the French court, which appears to have suspected his loyalty. On 13 Feb., 1641, Aulnay de

Charnisé, his bitter enemy, obtained an order to arrest him and send him to France. But De la Tour, who commanded a body of soldiers that were fully equal in numbers and devotion to those of Charnisé, refused to surrender. The latter went to France toward the end of the year, and obtained a new commission on 22 Feb., 1642, and additional powers. Meanwhile, De la Tour invoked the aid of John Winthrop, governor of Massachusetts, and entered Boston harbor in an armed vessel on 12 April, 1643. After several discussions, some of them on religious subjects, he was allowed to raise volunteers, and with these auxiliaries forced Charnisé to withdraw from Fort St. John and retreat to Port Royal, whither he pursued him and inflicted some damage on him. A short time afterward La Tour went to Quebec, and Charnisé besieged and took the fort in his absence in April, 1645. (For the heroic defence of the fort by his wife, see CHARNISÉ.) La Tour then retired to Newfoundland, and in August, 1646, to Quebec. In 1648 he went to France and described the tyranny of Charnisé so effectively to the French court that, on the death of the latter, he was appointed governor and lieutenant-general in Acadia. The wife and children of Charnisé were about to oppose his authority with arms, but in 1653 an arrangement was made between the opposing factions, which was confirmed by the marriage of De la Tour with the widow of Charnisé, his own wife having died soon after the surrender of Fort St. John. He was forced to yield this fortress in 1654 to a detachment of New England troops, commanded by Robert Sedgwick, from want of provisions. He obtained from Oliver Cromwell an extensive grant of territory in Acadia in favor of himself and two Englishmen. But his different enterprises had involved him in pecuniary embarrassment, and he sold out to his co-proprietors.

TOUR, Le Blond de la, French soldier, b. in France; d. in New Orleans, La., about 1725. He had some skill in engineering, and went to New France as chief of a party, erecting Fort Alibamon (or Alibama) in Louisiana in 1713. He surveyed the site of New Orleans in 1717, and immediately built a fort on piles at Balize (or North-East Pass) to guard the entrance. When Bienville was summoned to France in 1724, La Tour was ordered to take command until the return from Illinois of Dugué de Boisbriand, the governor ad interim.

TOURGEE, Albion Winegar (toor-zhay'), author, b. in Williamsfield, Ohio, 2 May, 1838. He is the son of a farmer of Huguenot descent. After studying at Rochester university in 1859-'61, he served in the National army in 1861-'65, was wounded at Bull Run and at Perryville, and was a prisoner in the hands of the Confederates for four months. After the war he settled as a lawyer, farmer, and editor at Greensboro', N. C. He opposed the plan of reconstruction that was adopted, favoring instead the establishing of territorial governments in the seceding states. At the Loyalists' convention in Philadelphia, Pa., in 1866, he prepared the report on the condition of the southern states. He was an active member of the North Carolina constitutional conventions of 1868 and 1875, and was one of the commission appointed to codify and revise the state laws. In April, 1868, he was elected judge of the superior court for the seventh judicial district of North Carolina, his term expiring in 1874; and in February, 1876, he was appointed pension agent for that state. His judicial district included the counties where the Ku-klux clan was most powerful and aggressive, and several unsuccessful raids were planned for his capture. In 1866-'7 he published at Greensboro' the "Union Register," and in 1882 he established "The Continent," a literary weekly, in Philadelphia, which was discontinued in 1885. He is well known as a lecturer, and has published "North Carolina Form-Book" (1869); "Toinette" (New York, 1874); "The North Carolina Code, with Notes and Decisions" (1878); "A Digest of Cited Cases" (1879); "Statutory Decisions of the North Carolina Reports" (1879); "Figs and Thistles" (1879); "A Fool's Errand, by one of the Fools," of which 135,000 copies were sold (1879); "Bricks without Straw" (1880); "Hot Plowshares" (1883); "An Appeal to Cæsar" (1884); "Black Ice" (1887); and "Button's Inn" (Boston, 1887).

TOURGEE, Eben, musician, b. in Warwick, R. I., 1 June, 1834. At seventeen years of age he was clerk in a Providence music-store, and at nineteen a music-dealer at Fall River. He also taught in the public schools, and edited the "Massachusetts Musical Journal." In 1859 he founded a musical conservatory at East Greenwich, and in 1864 he projected a larger institution at Providence, which was removed to Boston in 1867, and incorporated in 1870. The building that is occupied by the conservatory has a concert-hall, containing a large pipe-organ and stage and seats for 1,500 persons. Besides a library, reading-room, and offices, it has rooms for 500 students, and cost, with all its appointments, more than $700,000.

TOURO, Judah, philanthropist, b. in Newport, R. I., 16 June, 1775; d. in New Orleans, La., 18 June, 1854. Leaving Newport in 1798, where his father, Isaac Touro, a native of Holland, was minister of the synagogue, he entered commercial life in Boston, and settled as a merchant in New Orleans in 1802. Here he acquired great wealth through his thrift and industry. He volunteered under Gen. Jackson when the British marched against New Orleans, and was wounded in battle on 1 Jan., 1815. Being saved by the bravery and care of Rezin Davis Shepherd, Touro bequeathed to him a large share of his property. He was a steady and generous giver to charities, Jewish and Christian, and endowed several synagogues and churches throughout the country. He gave $10,000 toward Bunker Hill monument. His remains are buried in the Newport Jewish cemetery.

TOUSEY, Sinclair, publisher, b. in New Haven, Conn., 18 July, 1818; d. in New York city, 16 June, 1887. He received the rudiments of a common-school education, and was employed on farms and as a clerk till 1836, when he came to New York and became a newspaper-carrier. He was subsequently an agent till 1840, and established and published in Louisville, Ky., the "Daily Times," the first penny paper that was issued west of the Alleghany mountains. He engaged in farming in New York state in 1840-'53, and in the autumn of the latter year became partner in a news agency in Nassau street. In May, 1860, Mr. Tousey became sole proprietor of the agency, the business of which had increased from $150,000 to $1,000,000 per annum. The American news company was organized, 1 Feb., 1864, and he was elected president, which office he held till his death. He joined the Republican party at its organization, was an enthusiastic Abolitionist, writing and speaking against slavery, was at one time a vice-president of the Union league club, and took an active interest in philanthropic schemes and organizations. He published "Papers from over the Water" (New York, 1869).

TOUSSAINT, Diédonné Gabriel (too-sang), Austrian naturalist, b. in Vienna in 1717; d. in Schoenbrunn in 1799. He was the son of a chancellor of the French legation, studied in Vienna and Prague, and, devoting himself afterward to botany, was made in 1759 imperial botanist by the Empress Maria Theresa, and shortly afterward appointed professor in the University of Prague. After the general peace of 1763 he was sent on a scientific mission to South America, and from 1764 till 1771 visited several of the West Indies. By special permission of Charles III. of Spain, he also went to Mexico and both Upper and Lower California, being detained a prisoner for several weeks by Indians in the neighborhood of the present city of Los Angeles. The valuable collections that he formed are preserved in the museum at Vienna. Toussaint's works include "Sertum Mexicanum" (Vienna, 1773); "Prodomus floræ Mexicanæ, exhibens characteres plantarum, nova genera et species novas vel minus cognitæ" (4 vols., 1773-'7); and "Bibliotheca botanica, continens genera plantarum in America Meridionali crescentium" (1779). His name has been given to a Brazilian plant of the family Polygalæ.

TOUSSAINT, Dominique François, best known as TOUSSAINT L'OUVERTURE, Haytian soldier, b. in Bréda, near Cape François, in 1743; d. in the castle of Joux, near Pontarlier, France, 27 April, 1803. He was a slave, and his master employed him as coachman, and subsequently made him overseer, in which office he was honest and efficient, but was severe toward his fellow-slaves. In 1790, when the mulattoes appealed to the negroes for help in enforcing their rights, Toussaint refused to join them, but forwarded supplies secretly to his friend, Jean Biassou, the leader of the insurgents. After the general massacre of the whites in August, 1791, Tous-saint protected the flight of his master, and then joined the forces of Jean François, being appointed by the latter chief surgeon of the army. He soon became very popular in the negro army, but incurred the enmity of François, who imprisoned him in the fortress of La Vallière in 1793; but Biassou liberated him. Soon Toussaint turned against his benefactor, and supported the candidacy of Jean François as supreme chief. When news came of the execution of Louis XVI., François, followed by Toussaint, accepted a colonel's commission in the Spanish-Dominican forces, and went to the Spanish part of the island. Re-enforced by a Spanish division, Toussaint invaded French territory, defeated Brandicourt, and occupied important posts, among them Gonaives. Meanwhile the English had taken Port au Prince, and the whole island was in confusion, French, English, Spaniards, mulattoes, and negroes all contending for supremacy. After unsuccessful negotiations with the French agents, Étienne Polverel and Félicité Sonthonax, he heard that the French government had decreed the freedom of the slaves, and Gen. Laveaux, Polverel's successor, having promised him the rank of brigadier he joined the French forces. His successes against the Spanish and English were immediate and great. "Cet homme fait donc l'ouverture partout," exclaimed Laveaux, and afterward Toussaint was given the surname of L'Ouverture. Some authorities say that he adopted the title to declare himself the liberator of his people. Laveaux distrusted him, and was seeking an opportunity to dismiss him; but in March, 1795, there was an insurrection in Cape Français, and Toussaint, relieving Laveaux, was appointed lieutenant-general and deputy governor-general, and caused the negroes to lay down their arms. Being confirmed in his offices by the Directory through Sonthonax, Laveaux's successor, in April, 1796, Toussaint formed and disciplined another army, with the purpose of making himself master of the province, and entering Cape Français in August, at the head of a strong party of cavalry, compelled Sonthonax to leave for France. He then assumed the government, acknowledging only the authority of the Directory. The latter body, aware of the extraordinary influence that he exercised over the blacks, feigned to approve his acts, but sent a new commissioner, Gen. Hédouville, to Santo Domingo. Meanwhile the English general, Maitland, had received orders from the home government to evacuate Santo Domingo, and he sought to conciliate Toussaint. It is now demonstrated, through the documents published by Pamphile Lacroix, that a treaty was concerted between Maitland and Toussaint which recognized the latter as king of Santo Domingo, England pledging also the acceptance of the other powers, on condition that an exclusive right of commerce in the island be conceded to the English, who should maintain forever an armed fleet for the protection of Santo Domingo. The sudden landing of Gen. Hédouville terminated the negotiations, and Maitland surrendered to Toussaint Port au Prince, St. Marc, Jeremie, and Môle St. Nicolas. Hédouville, aware of Toussaint's intrigues, sought to overthrow him, but the latter organized through his agents a rebellion in Cape Français, and Hédouville was compelled to return to France. Before sailing he appointed Gen. André Rigaud his lieutenant, and the mulattoes, dissatisfied with Toussaint's rule, rallied around Rigaud. A fierce war ensued, in which Toussaint was almost defeated, but finally drove Rigaud to Les Cayes in December, 1799. At this juncture new commissioners, sent by Bonaparte, brought to Toussaint a commission of commander-in-chief, and determined Rigaud to sail for France. Toussaint then proclaimed a general amnesty and issued his famous decree, which, though acknowledging the enfranchisement of the negroes, compelled them to work for five years for their old masters without other remuneration than a fourth part of the net income from the land that was thus cultivated. He also organized his military household with pomp and ceremony, formed a guard, built palaces, and began to direct his attention to the prosperity of the country, fostering agriculture and commerce. He used to say, "I am the Bonaparte of Santo Domingo," and it is said that he headed his correspondence to the first consul, "The first among the blacks to the first among the whites." At the beginning he selected an administrative council composed of eight whites and one black. Toward the close of January, 1801, he subdued, without effort, the Spanish part of the island, which had been ceded to France by the treaty of Basles. His next act was to promulgate a constitution the first article of which made him president and commander-in-chief of Santo Domingo for life, with the privilege of choosing his successor and of appointing all military and civil officers. This provoked harsh criticism, and there were riots in several cities, which Toussaint subdued with his usual vigor. In the north he defeated the rebels on 4 Nov., and ordered his own nephew, Hyacinthe Moyse, to be shot without trial. On 26 Nov. he issued a decree recalling the emigrated proprietors and providing severe penalties for larceny and other offences against the common law. Bonaparte just then directed his attention to Santo Domingo. It is now conceded that he had less in mind to subdue Toussaint than "to get rid of 60,000 soldiers," the partisans of Gen. Moreau, as he said to Gen. Fairfait, who dissuaded him from sending an expedition to perish by yellow fever in Santo Domingo. A powerful fleet, carrying an army under command of Gen. Victor Leclerc, appeared on 29 Jan., 1802, in the Bay of Samana, and, dividing his forces into four divisions, the general-in-chief made sail for Cape Français. Toussaint's army numbered then 20,000 trained soldiers, twice Leclerc's forces, yet he did not oppose the landing, but instructed Henry Christophe to set fire to the town, 6 Feb., 1802. The whole island readily accepted the French rule, yet nothing was gained so long as Toussaint refused to make his submission. Leclerc tried hard to conciliate him, choosing as his ambassadors Toussaint's two sons, who had been brought from school in France to deliver to their father a letter from the first consul, commending Toussaint's administration and maintaining him in the office of commander-in-chief. But as Toussaint demanded that the French forces should re-embark immediately, the captain-general proclaimed him an outlaw on 17 Feb. A sanguinary conflict ensued with varying success, the French holding the seaports and the blacks defying them in their mountain-fastnesses, and Leclerc, finding it impossible to conquer the island by force, sought to win over the negro generals, and succeeded in part, Christophe and Dessalines making their submission. Leclerc, nevertheless, was most anxious to treat, as out of a total of 23,000 men, 5,000 were already dead and upward of 6,000 in the hospitals. He consented, therefore, to pardon Toussaint, and assigned him for residence his estate of Sancey, near Gonaïves, 1 May, 1802. It was alleged by the French authorities that Toussaint was continuing to conspire against them, and a correspondence with his former adjutant, Joseph Fontaine, which has never been published, having been seized, Leclerc resolved to arrest him. Gen. Brunet invited Toussaint to a conference at Gorges, and both parties went, accompanied by twenty guards, but the negroes were easily overcome, and Toussaint was embarked on the frigate "La Créole" and transported to Cape Français. There he was transferred on the ship "Le Héros" and sent with his family to France, arriving at Landerneau, 10 Aug., and at Paris, 17 Aug., 1802. There he was met by Gen. Caffarelli, an aide-de-camp of Bonaparte, transported to the castle of Joux, and closely confined. Stories of harsh treatment have been circulated; it has even been said that he was subjected to the intense cold with insufficient clothing and food, and that finally he died from hunger during an absence of the governor of the castle, or, as some say, from poison; but there is no positive proof of all this. It must be borne in mind that Toussaint was at that time sixty years old, that he had never before left Santo Domingo, and was unaccustomed to the severe winters of the Jura mountains. Moreover, the governor of the castle not only had special orders for the welfare of his prisoner, but became his friend, as is shown by Toussaint's correspondence. Toussaint probably died from apoplexy, provoked by anger, resentment, and humiliation at his ill fortune. In person Toussaint was short of stature and of unprepossessing appearance. He was temperate and hardy, often riding fifty leagues without stopping, and sleeping but two hours. In his army he maintained the strictest discipline, and his soldiers looked on him as a superior being. His life has been written by Charles de St. Rémy (Paris, 1850), by John R. Beard (London, 1853), by Charles W. Elliot (New York, 1855), and by James Redpath (Boston, 1863), and he forms the subject of one of Wendell Phillips's most celebrated lectures. Toussaint's family was transported to France with him, and assigned a residence in Agen with a pension from the government. His wife died there in May, 1816, and his third son soon afterward. The two eldest, Isaac and Placide, having tried to escape in 1805, were imprisoned in Belle-Isle till 1815. They settled afterward in Bordeaux. Placide, who died in 1843, published "Vie de Toussaint l'Ouverture" (Bordeaux, 1825). Isaac died in 1850.

TOUSSARD, Louis (toos-sar), Chevalier de, French soldier, b. in Burgundy in 1749; d. in New Orleans, La., in 1821. He studied at the school of artillery of La Pèrre, and was a lieutenant when he resigned at the beginning of the war for independence and came to this country with Chevalier de Loyanté through means that were furnished by Caron de Beaumarchais. In June, 1777, upon Silas Deane's recommendation, he received a lieutenant's commission and was attached to Washington's staff. Later he was aide-de-camp to Gen. Lafayette, assisted in the battle of the Brandywine, and lost an arm during the retreat from Rhode Island in the autumn of 1778. Soon afterward he was brevetted lieutenant-colonel and awarded by congress a pension for life. He assisted in the capture of Yorktown in 1781, and fought in the south with Lafayette till the conclusion of peace. In 1784 he was made a knight of Saint Louis, a colonel in the French service, and appointed inspector of the artillery of the French West Indies. He was at Santo Domingo at the beginning of the troubles in 1790, and fought on the royalist side. In 1794 he fell into the hands of the negroes, but through the intervention of the U. S. consul was placed on board a vessel bound for New Orleans. He petitioned congress for his reinstatement in the army, which was granted, and in February, 1795, he was made major of the 2d artillery, being promoted its lieutenant-colonel early in 1800. The regiment was disbanded in January, 1802, and he retired to private life. In 1812-'15 he held the office of French consul at New Orleans. His works include "American Artillerist's Companion" (2 vols., Philadelphia, 1809; revised ed., 1821).

TOWER, Fayette Bartholomew, civil engineer, b. in Waterville, N. Y., 29 Jan., 1817; d. there, 16 Feb., 1857. He received such education as the local schools afforded, and chose the profession of civil engineering. In 1837 he was appointed on the Croton aqueduct, and he continued on that work until its completion in 1842. During the ensuing five years he made Waterville his residence, and at that time prepared his "Illustrations of the Croton Aqueduct," consisting of a series of twenty-one plates, with text (New York, 1843). About 1848 his health led him to seek a milder climate, and he settled in Cumberland, Md. He was chosen to the Maryland legislature, and later was elected mayor of Cumberland. His health continued to fail, and in 1856 he returned to Waterville and died soon afterward.

TOWER, Zealous Bates, soldier, b. in Cohasset, Mass., 12 Jan., 1819. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1841, first in a class of fifty-two, among whom were Horatio G. During the years 1843-'6 he was engaged on the defences of Hampton Roads. He served with great credit in the war with Mexico in 1846-'8, especially at Cerro Gordo, Contreras (where he led the storming column), Chapultepec (where he was wounded), and in the final assault and capture of the city of Mexico. He became 1st lieutenant in April, 1847, and captain, 1 July, 1855. During 1848-'61 he was engaged upon river and harbor improvements, on the building of the San Francisco custom-house, and on the board to project the defences of the Pacific coast. He was promoted major of engineers, 6 Aug., 1861, and assigned as chief engineer of the defence of Fort Pickens. For his conduct there he was appointed a brigadier-general of volunteers, 23 Nov., 1861, the date of the bombardment. He participated, in command of troops, in the operations in northern Virginia, under Gen. Nathaniel P. Banks and Gen. John Pope, until the second battle of Bull Run, 30 Aug., 1862, where he was severely wounded. Upon his recovery he served as superintendent of the U. S. military academy at West Point from July till September, 1864, when he rejoined the armies in the field as chief engineer of the defences of Nashville, took part in the battle, and held responsible staff offices in the military divisions of the Mississippi and Tennessee until the close of the war. He was promoted lieutenant-colonel of engineers in 1865, and mustered out of volunteer service, 15 Jan., 1866. Thereafter Gen. He received eight brevets for "gallant and meritorious service" in war—from 1st lieutenant, 18 April, 1847, for Cerro Gordo, to major-general, U. S. army, 13 March, 1865. Gen. The son began life as a merchant, but afterward studied law, and, removing to Alabama, was admitted to the bar in 1824. After editing a political newspaper there, he returned to Georgia in 1826, settled in Talbot county, where he practised law, and served in both branches of the legislature. He was elected to congress, and served from 1835 till 1839 and from 1845 till 1847. In the latter year he was elected governor of Georgia for two years, and at the end of his term he was re-elected.

His paternal grandfather, David was a surgeon in the Massachusetts line during the Revolution, and his maternal grandfather was Elbridge Gerry. His father, David S. Townsend, was an officer of the U. S. army and lost a leg at the battle of Chrysler's Field in the war of 1812. Edward was educated at Boston Latin-school and at Harvard, and was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1837. Scott in 1861. He was brevetted brigadier-general, U. S. army, 24 Sept., 1864, "for meritorious and faithful service during the rebellion," and major-general, 13 March, 1865, for "faithful, meritorious, and distinguished services in the adjutant-general's department during the rebellion." He was retired from active service, 15 June, 1880. During the entire civil war Gen. Townsend was the principal executive officer of the war department, and was perhaps brought into more intimate personal contact with President Lincoln and Sec. Stanton than any other military official. As adjutant-general of the army he originated the plan of a U. S. military prison, urged legislation on the subject, and established the prison at Fort Leavenworth, Kan. Gen. Townsend is a member of the Society of the Cincinnati. He is the author of "Catechism of the Bible—The Pentateuch" (New York, 1859); "Catechism of the Bible—Judges and Kings" (1862); and "Anecdotes of the Civil War in the United States" (1884).

TOWNSEND, Frederick, soldier, b. in Albany, N. Y., 21 Sept., 1825. He was graduated at Union college in 1844, and admitted to the bar. Having a leaning toward military matters, he became adjutant-general of the state in 1856. He found the militia in a most disordered condition and addressed himself to the task of making it what it ought to be. He prepared an annual report from this department for the first time, and he was re-appointed by the next governor of the state. To his efficiency is due the fact that the state of New York sent so many troops to the field in the civil war. He declined a reappointment as adjutant-general in 1861, and organized a regiment, being commissioned colonel. He took part in the battle of Big Bethel, but soon afterward he was commissioned a major in the regular army and resigned his colonelcy. As major his duties led him to organize troops in Columbus, Ohio. Afterward he participated in the battles of Pea Ridge, Stone River, and other engagements at the west. In 1863 he was detailed as assistant provost-marshal-general in Albany, which position he filled for several years. In 1867 he was ordered to California and made a thorough inspection of all the military posts in Arizona. In 1868 he resigned from the army, and he has resided in Albany since that time. In 1878 he was appointed a brigadier-general in the state militia, and he afterward became adjutant-general of the state under Gov. Alonzo B. Cornell. In this post he again addressed himself to the condition of the citizen soldiers and increased their numbers to 12,000 effective men. He successfully urged the adoption of a state service uniform and a state military camp.—His brother, Howard, physician, b. in Albany, N. Y., 22 Nov., 1823; d. there, 16 Jan., 1867, was graduated at Union in 1844, and at the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania in 1847. Establishing himself in his native city, he was surgeon-general of the state in 1851-'2, and afterward professor in the Albany medical college. Dr. Townsend was the author of "The Sunbeam and the Spectroscope" (Albany, 1864); "Food and its Digestion" (1866); and "Sinai Bible" (1866).

Stephen Townsend, a Methodist clergyman for half a century, studied and practised medicine at the age of fifty, and at seventy obtained the degree of Ph. D. by actual university study. The son was educated mainly in Philadelphia, where he began writing for the press and speaking in public, and in 1860 adopted the profession of journalism. In 1862 he was a war-correspondent of the New York "Herald," describing for that journal McClellan's peninsula campaign and Pope's campaign in northern Virginia. Later in the year he went to Europe, where he wrote for English and American periodicals, and lectured on the civil war. In 1864 he became war-correspondent of the New York "World," was permitted to sign his letters, and quickly made a reputation as a descriptive writer. After the war he became a professional lecturer, continuing also his miscellaneous writing for the press, and, going to Europe, described the Austro-Prussian war of 1866. His pen-name, "Gath," was first used in 1868 in letters to the Chicago "Tribune." In 1885 he built a house on the battle-field of Crampton's Gap, South Mountain, Md., where a small village has since sprung up, to which he gives the name Gapland. His publications in book-form are "The Bohemians," a play (New York, 1862); "Campaigns of a Non-Combatant" (1865); "Life of Garibaldi" (1867); "Real Life of Abraham Lincoln" (1867); "The New World compared with the Old" (1868); "Poems" (1870); "Washington Outside and Inside" (1871); "Mormon Trials at Salt Lake" (1872); "Washington Re-built" (1873); "Tales of the Chesapeake" (1880); "Bohemian Days" (1881); "Poetical Addresses" (1883); "The Entailed Hat" (1884); "President Cromwell," a drama (1885); "Katy of Catocin," a novel (1886); and a campaign life of Levi P. When he grew older he developed a fondness for natural history, and was associated with John J. Audubon in the preparation of his "American Ornithology," in which many of the descriptions are from his pen. During 1833-'7 he made extensive journeys in the western states and across the Rocky mountains with Thomas Nuttall. Subsequently he visited the Sandwich islands and South America, and then for some years had charge of the department of birds in the Smithsonian institution. While in Washington he practised dentistry, and so acquired the title of doctor. He was a member of the Philadelphia academy of natural sciences, and a contributor to its proceedings. Dr. Townsend was the author of "A Narrative of a Journey across the Rocky Mountains to the Columbia River" (Boston, 1839), published in England under the title "Sporting Adventures in the Rocky Mountains" (London, 1840), and of "Ornithology of the United States," only the first part of which was issued (Philadelphia, 1839).

TOWNSEND, Luther Tracy, clergyman, b. in Orono, Me., 27 Sept., 1838. He was professor of exegetical theology in Boston university in 1867-'8 and of historical theology in 1869-'73, and since the last date has occupied the chair of practical theology. Dartmouth gave him the degree of D. D. in 1871. Martin S. Townsend

He was district attorney of Rensselaer county in 1842-'5, and in 1867-'8 he was a member for the state at large of the Constitutional convention. He was elected to congress as a Republican for two successive terms, serving from 6 Dec., 1875, till 3 March, 1879. He was a member of various important committees, and among the ablest debaters in that body. Declining a renomination, he was appointed district attorney for the northern district of New York, which office he held for nearly eight years. He received the degree of LL. D. in 1866 from Williams.—His brother, Randolph Wanton, lawyer, b. in Hancock, Mass., 4 May, 1812, was graduated at Williams in 1836, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1838, and settled in New York city, soon attaining a good standing at the bar, where he has practised successfully for half a century. Her other works are "The Brother Clerks" (New York, 1859); "Poems" (Philadelphia, 1870); "The Captain's Story" (1874); and "Down the Bayou, and other Poems" (Boston, 1884). Her most important short poems are "Creed," "A Woman's Wish," "The Bather," and "The Wind." She was officially appointed to deliver the poem on the opening of the New Orleans exposition in 1884, and that at the unveiling of the statue of Gen. Albert Sidney Johnston in 1887.

He was afterward captain of the Ancient and honorable artillery company, and in 1703 was colonel of the Boston regiment. In 1707 he was an agent to superintend the military forces that were sent against Port Royal. He married a daughter of Gov. John Leverett, was a patron of art and literature, and a public-spirited citizen.—His grandson, Alexander, lawyer, b. in Boston, Mass., in 1784; d. there, 13 April, 1835, was graduated at Harvard in 1802, and studied law. He became a large owner of real estate, was active in city politics, and delivered many addresses in Faneuil hall. In 1810 he was appointed by the authorities to deliver the Fourth-of-July oration.—Alexander's sister, Eliza, poet, b. in Boston in 1789; d. there, 12 Jan., 1854, was educated in her native city, and began her literary career by contributing anonymous rural and religious essays to the "Monthly Anthology," "Unitarian Miscellany," and "Portfolio." She was the first native woman poet in her state to receive the praise of judicious critics. Her writings include verses on "The Incomprehensibility of God"; an "Occasion Ode" (1809), in which she commented severely on the career of Napoleon, who was then at the summit of his greatness; "Lines to Robert Southey" (1812); and the "Rainbow"—all of which appeared in magazines. Her "Poems and Miscellanies" were collected by her sister, Mary P. Townsend, and printed privately (Boston, 1856).

S. navy the same year as a midshipman. He served in the Mexican war in 1846-'7, was engaged in the capture of Vera Cruz, became 1st lieutenant in 1850, and resigned from the navy in 1851. At the beginning of the civil war he re-entered the service as acting lieutenant, participated under Admiral David G. Farragut in the passage of the forts below New Orleans, and the taking of that city, and did efficient service in command of the "Miami" in the sounds of North Carolina. He was restored to the regular navy in 1862, with the rank of commander, was in charge of the iron-clad "Essex" at the siege of Port Hudson, and was subsequently division commander under Admiral David D. Porter, and in the Red river campaign. He became captain in 1866, and afterward was ordered to the East Indian squadron, where his conduct of affairs at Newchwang, China, preserved the peace of the port, and at the same time did not interfere with the authority of the native officials.

TOWNSEND, Thomas S., compiler, b. in New York city, 27 Aug., 1829. His father, John R., was a well-known member of the New York bar. The son received a classical education, and at an early age entered the mercantile firm of Lawrence, Trimble and Co., New York city. In 1860 he determined to form a chronological history of every important occurrence in connection with the impending civil war by preserving from the newspapers every statement of value relating to any circumstance that directly or indirectly led to secession, to national complications growing out of the struggle, to the cause, conduct, and results of the rebellion, to personal records of soldiers from the lowest to the highest rank, and to the military and civil history of the Union and the Confederacy. This journalistic record comprises about 120 volumes containing 60,000 pages. William Cullen Bryant said of it: "The age has given birth to few literary undertakings that will bear comparison with this work. The forty academicians who compiled the dictionary of the French language had a far less laborious task." This collection is now in Columbia college library, New York city. He has delivered numerous lectures and addresses on the subject of the war, including an oration on Memorial day, 1885, in Brooklyn, N. Y., on "The Empire State in the Rebellion."

TOWNSHEND, George, first Marquis, soldier, b. in Norfolk, England, 28 Feb., 1724; d. 14 Sept., 1807. He was the eldest son of the third Viscount Townshend, whom he succeeded in May, 1767. He entered the British army at an early age, and took part in the battles of Dettingen, Fontenoy, Culloden, and Laffeldt. In 1747 he entered parliament. He went out to Canada in 1759 as brigadier-general, and commanded a division under Wolfe, succeeding that officer in command when Wolfe fell at Quebec. Five days later he received the capitulation of the city. He then returned to England, was present at the battle of Fellinghausen in 1761, and served in Portugal in 1762. He became a privy councillor after succeeding to the title, and was lord-lieutenant of Ireland from 1767 till 1772. He was master-general of the ordnance in the latter year, and was created Earl of Leicester in 1784 and Marquis Townshend in 1787. He was a man of "quick perception but unsafe judgment." He is said to have received the capitulation of Quebec as though the achievement had been his own, and in his official report of the battle he omitted the name of Wolfe, whom he indirectly censured. Hurrying away from the citadel, which he believed to be untenable, he returned home, and was soon engaged in assisting his brother Charles in the latter's attempt to make the colonies submit to an odious system of taxation.—His brother, Charles, statesman, b. in England, 29 Aug., 1725; d. there, 4 Sept., 1767, entered parliament when only twenty-two years old, and soon achieved a brilliant reputation as an orator and a supporter of the Pelham administration. He was appointed a commissioner of trade and plantations in 1749, and a commissioner for executing the office of lord high admiral in 1751; was a lord of the admiralty in 1754, and treasurer of the chamber and member of the privy council in 1756. From 1761 till 1763 he was secretary of war, and in February of the latter year he was made first lord of trade and plantations. He was subsequently paymaster of the forces and chancellor of the exchequer. From the period of his introduction to office through the commission for the colonies, Townshend made a special study of American affairs. His plan for governing the American colonies was to extract as large a revenue as possible from them by onerous imposts levied without the slightest regard to their rights. In 1765 he had heartily supported Grenville's stamp-act, although he subsequently voted for its repeal, and was in favor of burdening the colonies with an expensive civil list and a standing army. He was also of opinion that the various charters that had been granted to them at different times, and which every ministry of Charles II. had spared, should be annulled, a uniform system of government set up in their stead, and the royal governors, judges, and attorneys made independent of the people. "I would govern the Americans," he said, "as subjects of Great Britain. I would restrain their trade and their manufactures as subordinate to the mother country. These, our children, must not make themselves our allies in time of war and our rivals in peace." The eclipse of Chatham in March, 1767, left Townshend, who had been chancellor of the exchequer since the preceding August, and whom Chatham had vainly endeavored to have dismissed from office, "lord of the ascendant." From that moment he ruled the ministry in all matters relating to America, and succeeded in carrying through parliament a bill taxing the colonies that was far more burdensome than the stamp-act that had nearly created a revolution. Thus the latter left the civil officers dependent on the local legislatures, and preserved the proceeds of the American tax in the exchequer. The revenue collected under Townshend's bill, on the other hand, was to be under the sign manual at the king's pleasure, and could be burdened at will by pensions to Englishmen. By providing an independent support for the crown officers, it virtually did away with the necessity for colonial legislatures, as governors would have little inducement to call them, and an angry minister might dissolve them without inconvenience. When it was suggested to Townshend that the army might perhaps be safely withdrawn from America, in which case expense would cease and no revenue be necessary, he replied: "The moment a resolution shall be taken to withdraw the army, I will resign my office and have no more to do in public affairs. I insist it is absolutely necessary to keep up a large army there and here." Townshend only lived a few months after the successful passage of his bill, which, by its tax on tea and similar imports, lost England her colonies, and was about to be intrusted with the formation of a new ministry, when he was suddenly carried off by a fever at the early age of forty-one. "He was," says Bancroft, "a man of wonderful endowments, dashed with follies and indiscretion. Impatient of waiting, his ruling passion was present success. . . . In the house of commons his brilliant oratory took its inspiration from the prevailing opinion; and, careless of consistency, heedless of whom he deserted or whom he joined, he followed the floating indications of the loudest cheers." He had been courted by all parties, but never possessed the confidence of any. If his indiscretion forbade esteem, his good humor dissipated hate. He had clear conceptions, great knowledge of every branch of administration, and indefatigable assiduity in business. Burke styled him "the delight and ornament of the house of commons, and the charm of every private society that he honored with his presence." Macaulay refers to him as "a man of splendid talents, of lax principles, and of boundless vanity and presumption," who "would submit to no control." See his "Essay on the Earl of Chatham" and "Charles Townshend, Wit and Statesman," by Percy Fitzgerald (London, 1866).—Another brother, Roger, British soldier, b. in England about 1730; d. near Ticonderoga, N. Y., 25 July, 1759, entered the army at an early age, and became a lieutenant-colonel on 1 Feb., 1758. He served as adjutant-general of the expeditionary force that was sent against Louisburg, was deputy adjutant-general of Gen. Sir

Jeffrey Amherst's expedition against Fort Ticonderoga, and was killed there in the trenches by a cannon-ball, and taken to Albany for burial.

TOWNSHEND, Norton Strange, educator, b. in Clay-Coton, Northamptonshire, England, 25 Dec., 1815. He came to this country in 1830, and settled with his parents in Avon, Ohio, where he attended school and also taught. Subsequently he began the study of medicine, and was graduated in 1840 at the College of physicians and surgeons in New York. He then went abroad, and, after attending the World's anti-slavery convention in London in July, 1840, as the delegate of the Anti-slavery society of Ohio, he studied in the hospitals of Paris, Edinburgh, and Dublin. In 1841 he returned to Elyria, Ohio, where he settled in the practice of his profession, but in 1848 he was elected to the Ohio legislature, where he was active in securing a repeal of the "black laws" of that state and the return of Salmon P. Chase to the U. S. senate. He was a member of the convention that in 1850 framed the present constitution of Ohio, and in the same year was elected as a Democrat to congress, serving from 1 Dec., 1851, till 3 March, 1853. At the end of his term he was elected to the Ohio senate, where he introduced measures that led to the founding of an asylum for training imbecile youth, of which institution he was a trustee for twenty-one years. Later he was active with Dr. John S. Newberry and others in the movement that aimed to establish an agricultural college in Ohio. In 1858 he was chosen a member of the board of agriculture and served till 1863, also in 1868-'9. Early in 1863 he was appointed medical inspector in the U. S. army, and he served in that capacity until the end of the civil war. In 1867 he was named a member of the committee that was appointed to examine and report upon the system of wool appraisement and duties in the custom-houses of Boston, New York, and elsewhere, prior to the tariff revision of that year. He was appointed professor of agriculture in Iowa agricultural college in 1869, but resigned a year later to accept the appointment of trustee and assist in founding the Agricultural and mechanical college of Ohio, in which institution, now known as the University of Ohio, he has held since 1873 the chair of agriculture.

TOWNSHEND, Richard Wellington, member of congress, b. in Prince George county, Md., 30 April, 1840. He was educated in public and private schools at Washington, D. C.; removed in 1858 to Illinois, and, after teaching for some time in Fayette county, studied law, and was admitted to the bar at McLeansborough in 1862. He was clerk of the county court of Hamilton county from 1863 till 1868, and district attorney for the next four years. He was a delegate to the National Democratic convention in 1872. He settled in Shawneetown in 1873, was elected a member of congress in 1876, and has since been continuously re-elected, serving in the congress which began its sessions on 5 March, 1887, as chairman of the committee on military affairs. He was the author of the proposition to secure the establishment of an American Zollverein, which was embodied in a bill passed by congress in 1888.

TOWSON, Nathan, soldier, b. near Baltimore, Md., 22 Jan., 1784; d. in Washington, D. C., 20 July, 1854. He was educated at the common schools, and at the beginning of the war with Great Britain was appointed captain in the 2d U. S. artillery, 12 March, 1812. He was transferred to the corps of artillery in May, 1814, and to the light artillery, 17 May, 1815. He served with distinction during the war of 1812, particularly in the capture of the brig "Caledonia" from under the guns of Fort Erie, 8 Oct., 1812, for which he was brevetted major, and for gallantry at the battle of Chippewa, 5 July, 1814, he was brevetted lieutenant-colonel. In the assault upon Fort Erie in August of the same year he again distinguished himself, and received the recognition of the government as a brevet colonel. He was appointed paymaster-general of the army in 1819, and in 1821 colonel of the 2d artillery. The senate failed to confirm the president's nomination, and Col. Towson was reappointed paymaster-general, 8 May, 1822. He was brevetted brigadier-general, 30 June, 1834, and major-general, 30 May, 1848, for meritorious conduct during the war with Mexico.

TOY, Crawford Howell, educator, b. in Norfolk, Va., 23 March, 1836. He was graduated at the University of Virginia in 1856, studied at the University of Berlin in 1866-'8, was professor of Hebrew in the Southern Baptist theological seminary at Greenville, S. C., and Louisville, Ky., in 1869-'79, and since 1880 has occupied that chair at Harvard. Besides articles on Semitic philology and biblical criticism he has published "History of the Religion of Israel" (Boston, 1882), and "Quotations in the New Testament" (New York, 1884).

TRACY, Marquis Alexandre De Prouville de, governor of Canada, b. in France in 1603; d. there in 1670. He was a lieutenant-general in the French army, and in 1655 retook Cayenne from the Dutch, and brought several of the adjacent islands under French authority. In 1664 he was appointed viceroy of Canada, which at that time was an object of considerable attention at the French court, especially in what was known as the parti dévot. So, when Tracy set sail, a throng of young nobles embarked with him, and the king gave him 200 soldiers, and promised that 1,000 more should follow. All Quebec was on the landing-place when he arrived, 30 June, 1665, and he debarked with a pomp and ceremony such as the city had never before seen. He soon won the fervent admiration of the inhabitants by his piety, and at the same time he betrayed a lack of no qualities needful in his position. After a severe campaign, he subdued the Iroquois Indians, concluding a peace with them that lasted nearly twenty years. He then went on an expedition against the Mohawks, at the head of a force of 1,200 French soldiers, and laid their country waste, taking possession, in the name of the king, of all their lands. The Mohawks sued for peace, and received Jesuit missionaries. The English, hearing of Tracy's advance, claimed the country he invaded, and Sir Richard Nicolls, governor of New York, wrote to the New England governors, begging them to join him against the French. But the New England governors were not prepared for war, and, fearing that their Indian neighbors might take part with the French, hesitated to act. The treaty of Bréda in 1667 secured peace for a time between the rival colonies. Tracy returned to France in 1667. "The Jesuits," says Parkman, "resumed their hazardous mission to the Iroquois, and Tracy's soldiers having made peace, the Jesuits were the rivets to hold it fast. Of all the French expeditions against the Iroquois, that of Tracy was the most productive of good."

He removed to New York city in 1849, and continued in active practice there until his death, and for many years in partnership with his brother William. With great capacity and ability for work he early achieved a front rank at the bar, especially as counsel for several charitable societies. In 1879-'82

he was president of the New York association of Yale alumni, and for many years took an active part in the annual conventions of the Protestant Episcopal church of the diocese of New York. He married Louisa, daughter of Gen. Joseph Kirkland, of Utica, N. Y. In 1872 he returned to Marsova, where he has since resided, occupying a chair in the theological seminary, and engaging in missionary work. He subsequently edited the "Chronicle" at Windsor, Vt., for five years, and the Boston "Recorder" for one year. He then became secretary of the Massachusetts colonization society, and of the American colonization society for Massachusetts, which posts he held until his death. The University of Vermont gave him the degree of D. D. in 1859. He was associated with Prof. Henry B. Smith for several years in the editorship of the "American Theological Review." He was subsequently a financial agent of the American board, and held various Congregational charges in Ohio, Minnesota, and Wisconsin. He contributed many articles to the "Bibliotheca Sacra," and is the author of "Duty to the Heathen" (Boston, 1859).

Phineas was graduated at Yale in 1806, admitted to the bar of Utica, N. Y., in 1811, and in 1813 settled in Batavia, N. Y. He was chosen to congress in 1826 by the anti-Masonic party to fill a vacancy, and served by re-election till 1833, when he declined a renomination. He was a presidential elector in 1840, became first judge of Genesee county in 1841, and held office till 1846, when he retired from professional life.—His brother, Albert Haller, jurist, b. in Norwich, Conn., 17 June, 1793; d. in Buffalo, N. Y., 12 Sept., 1859, began the study of medicine with his father, but soon abandoned it for the law, was admitted to the bar in 1815, and settled in Buffalo. He rose to a high place in the bar of western New York. At the age of twenty-four Mr. Tracy was elected a representative to the 16th congress, but he reached his twenty-fifth birthday anniversary before the assembling of congress on 6 Dec., 1819, and was thereby not excluded by the constitutional limit as to age. He was returned to the 17th and 18th congresses, and gained a reputation during his term of six years' service. In 1830 Mr. Tracy was chosen state senator, serving eight years. That body was then the court of errors. Exercising the functions of a court of last resort, and as a member of this court, Mr. Tracy achieved his greatest distinction. He was one of the ablest lawyers of the senate, and his opinions and decisions have been standard authority upon questions that were litigated then. Mr. Tracy was a candidate for U. S. senator in the famous election of 1839. After this contest he retired from public life.

TRACY, Roger Sherman, sanitarian, b. in Windsor, Vt., 9 Dec., 1841. He was graduated at Yale in 1862, and, after teaching for five years, took his medical degree at the College of physicians and surgeons of Columbia in 1868. In 1832 she married Lieut. Thomas Traill, of the Royal Scotch fusiliers, and soon afterward they emigrated to Canada and settled in Douro, Ont., in 1833. She subsequently lived at Peterborough, Rice Lake, and is now, and has been for many years, residing at Lakefield. For some time past Mrs. Traill has been engaged in writing "A Family Record."

TRAIN, Charles, clergyman, b. in Weston, Mass., 7 Jan., 1783; d. in Framingham, Mass., 17 Sept., 1849. He was graduated at Harvard in 1805, licensed to preach as a Baptist in Newton in May, 1806, and in the autumn of 1807 took charge of Framingham academy, at the same time preaching on alternate Sundays at Framingham and Weston. He was ordained a minister in Framingham on 30 Jan., 1811, and was appointed pastor of the Baptist churches in Weston and Framingham. In 1826 the connection between the two branches was dissolved, and he became pastor of Framingham alone, in which town a new church was dedicated in 1827. He resigned his charge in 1839. A considerable part of his life was devoted to public affairs. He was elected a member of the Massachusetts legislature in 1822, and continued to represent his district for the following seven years, except during 1827, when his extreme views on temperance offended his constituents. In 1829 he was elected to fill a vacancy in the state senate by the two branches of the legislature, and in 1830 he was chosen senator by the people. He was the first to take steps for the formation of a legislative library, and to propose a revision of the laws affecting common schools, while Amherst college was largely indebted to his exertions for its charter. He acquired considerable celebrity as a preacher and public speaker, and published various addresses, orations, and sermons between 1810 and 1830.—His son, Charles Russell, lawyer, b. in Framingham, Mass., 18 Oct., 1817, was graduated at Brown in 1837, studied law at Harvard, and was called to the bar in 1841. He was ordained to the ministry in 1836, as pastor of the Baptist church in Haverhill, Mass., and he continued in that relation for twenty-three years, resigning his pastorate to accept the professorship of sacred rhetoric and pastoral duties in Newton theological seminary. TRAIN, George Francis, author, b. in Boston, Mass., 24 March, 1829. He is a son of Enoch Train. He engaged in business in Boston for several years and then went to Australia in 1853, where he founded the house of Caldwell, Train, and Co. He travelled extensively, went to England, and made vigorous efforts to introduce street-railways into Birkenhead and London in 1859, but met with violent opposition and was unsuccessful. He lectured in Great Britain and Ireland before large audiences, especially in the latter country, and, although his manner and language were singular, his sarcasms on English society were often incisive and eloquent. He returned to the United States in 1862, and since that time has been widely known on account of his eccentricity. He has written "An American Merchant in Europe, Asia, and Australia" (New York, 1857); "Young America Abroad" (1857); "Young America in Wall Street" (1858); "Spread-Eagleism" (1859; London, 1860); "Every Man his own Auto-

He afterward studied medicine, began practice, and settled in New York city in 1840, where he became a hydropathist. In 1843 he founded an establishment in that city for the water-cure treatment, and opened, in connection with it in 1853, a medical school for both sexes, which was chartered in 1857 under the title of the New York hygieio-therapeutic college. It was afterward removed to Florence, N. J. He edited the "New York Organ," a weekly temperance journal, and the "Hydropathic Review," a quarterly magazine, from 1845 to 1848, was also the editor of other medical journals, and the author of "Hydropathic Encyclopedia" (New York, 1852); "New Hydropathic Cook-Book" (1854); "Prize Essay on Tobacco" (1854); "Uterine Diseases and Displacements" (1855); "Home Treatment for Sexual Abuses"; "The Alcoholic Controversy" (1856); "The Complete Gymnasium" (1857); "Illustrated Family Gymnasium" (1857); "Diseases of the Throat and Lungs" (1861); "Diphtheria" (1862); "Pathology of the Reproductive Organs" (1862); "The True Temperance Platform, or an Exposition of the Fallacy of Alcoholic Medication" (1864-'6); "Hand-Book of Hygienic Practice" (1865); "Sexual Physiology" (1866; London, 1867); "Water-Cure for the Million" (1867); "Digestion and Dyspepsia" (1874); "The Human Voice" (1874); and "Popular Physiology" (1875).

TRANCHEPAIN DE SAINT AUGUSTINE, Marie de, mother superior, b. in Rouen, France; d. in New Orleans, La., 11 Nov., 1733. She belonged to an old Huguenot family, but became a Roman Catholic, and, shortly after her conversion in 1699, entered the Ursuline order. She conceived the idea of founding a convent in this country, and, although she met with great difficulties, finally procured money and companions for her purpose. She sailed for Louisiana on 22 Jan., 1727, accompanied by seven professed nuns, a novice, and two seculars, and reached New Orleans on 7 Aug. The Ursuline convent that she founded was not opened until 1734. The building is still standing, and is the oldest in the city. She also managed a hospital, an academy for young ladies, a school for the poor, an orphan asylum, and an institution for the religious instruction of negroes.

Mr. Trask became specially known for his efforts against the use of tobacco, in opposition to which he labored earnestly with voice and pen. He delivered many lectures throughout the United States, and was the author of many anti-tobacco tracts.

TRASK, William Blake, antiquary, b. in Dorchester, Mass., 25 Nov., 1812. He is a descendant of Capt. William Trask, who emigrated to New England before John Endicott in 1628, and having settled at Salem, Mass., became subsequently an intimate friend of that governor, a deputy to the general court, and a commander in the Pequot wars. William Blake received an English education at the common schools, and in 1828 was apprenticed to a cabinet-maker. He worked at his trade in his native town until 1835, when he went to Pennsylvania; but he returned to Dorchester in 1837. He served for three years on the school committee of Dorchester, and in 1850 became assessor. He was obliged to resign this post, owing to failing health, and soon afterward began to develop an interest in historical and antiquarian studies. He gave valuable aid to several writers by supplying them with the fruits of his investigations. He copied the ancient town-records of Boston and made fac-similes of autographs for Samuel G. Drake's history of that city, and was of great aid to Gen. William H. Sumner in preparing a "History of East Boston" (Boston, 1858). He contributed to the "New England Historical and Genealogical Register," made copies of entire documents from the Massachusetts archives for this publication, and prepared indexes of names as well as general indexes for the nineteen volumes from 1851 till 1869. The "History of Dorchester" (Boston, 1859) owed much to his researches, and 137 pages, comprising a fifth of the work, were written by him. He published a "M memoir of Andrew H. Ward" (Boston, 1863), and edited "The Journal of Joseph Ware" (1852); "Baylie's Remarks on General Cobb" (1864); "The Bird Family" (1871); and "The Seaver Family" (1872). Subsequently he assisted Mr. Strickland in the construction of the U. S. mint and other Philadelphia buildings. He was engaged on the Columbia railroad in 1831, was appointed principal assistant engineer of the Philadelphia, Wilmington, and Baltimore railroad in 1835, and in 1836 became engineer of the Philadelphia and Trenton railroad, but during the latter part of the same year passed to the service of the Hiawasse railroad, from Tennessee to Georgia, of which he was chief engineer for six years. In 1844-'9 he was associated with George M. Totten in the construction of the canal del Dique, connecting the Magdalena river with the Bay of Carthagena, and again with Mr. Totten, in 1850, he made the surveys for the Panama railroad. On his return to Philadelphia in 1854 he published a report of his work. He next examined and reported on the harbor of Arecibo, in Porto Rico, and then became engineer of the Coal Run railroad in northeastern Pennsylvania. He surveyed in 1856 the Lackawanna and Lanesborough railroad in Susquehanna county, Pa., and in 1857 the route for an interoceanic railroad through Honduras. He examined and reported on the harbor of Montreal in 1858, and arranged a system of docks for that city. After 1864 he gradually retired from the practice of his profession, although continuing his consulting work, and he was frequently called upon to testify as an expert on questions of engineering. Mr. Trautwine was a member of scientific bodies, and a contributor of professional papers to technical journals. His works include "Method of Calculating the Cubic Contents of Excavations and Embankments" (Philadelphia, 1851); "Field Practice of Laying out Circular Curves for Railroads" (1851); and "Civil Engineer's Pocket-Book" (1872).

TRAVIS, Joseph, clergyman, b. in Maryland, 13 Sept., 1786; d. in Mississippi, 16 Sept., 1858. He became an itinerant minister of the Methodist Episcopal church in 1806, and served in South Carolina, Georgia, Louisiana, and Tennessee. His "Autobiography" was edited by the Rev. Thomas O. Summers, D. D. (Nashville, 1856).

TRAVIS, William Barrett, soldier, b. in Conecuh county, Ala., in 1811; d. near San Antonio, Tex., 6 March, 1836. He was admitted to the bar about 1830, and practised in Claiborne, Ala., but became financially embarrassed, and, leaving that place about 1832, went to Texas, where he afterward took up arms in the struggle for the independence of that country. At the head of 140 men he was besieged in the old mission station of San Antonio de Valerio, which had been named Fort Alamo (see illustration), by Gen. Santa-Anna, with 4,000 Mexicans, on 23 Feb., 1836. The fort was defended for ten days, frequent assaults being repelled with great slaughter, while not a man in the fort was injured. Many appeals for re-enforcements were sent out, but only thirty-two men could get through the Mexican lines. Finally, on 6 March, three assaults were made, and in the hand-to-hand fight that followed the last, the Texans were overpowered. They fought desperately, with clubbed muskets, till only six were left, including Travis, David Crockett, and James Bowie. These surrendered under promise of protection; but when they were brought before Santa-Anna he ordered them to be cut to pieces. In the bloody defeat of the Mexicans at San Jacinto shortly afterward, the Texan battle-cry was "Remember the Alamo." In person Travis was of fine stature, with regular features, blue eyes, and auburn hair.

TREADWELL, Daniel, inventor, b. in Ipswich, Mass., 10 Oct., 1791; d. in Cambridge, Mass., 27 Feb., 1872. He early displayed inventive talent, his first device, made when he was quite young, being a machine for producing wooden screws. In 1818 he devised a new form of printing-press, and in 1819 went to England, where he conceived the idea of a power-press. This was completed in a year after his return, and was the first press by which a sheet was printed on this continent by other than hand power. It was widely used, and in New York city large editions of the Bible were published by its means. In 1825 he was employed by the city of Boston to make a survey for the introduction of water, and in 1826 he devised a system of turnouts for railway transportation on a single track. He completed the first successful machine for spinning hemp for cordage in 1829. Works capable of spinning 1,000 tons a year were erected in Boston in 1831, and by machines that he furnished in 1836 to the Charlestown navy-yard all the hemp was spun and the cordage made for some time for the U. S. navy. These machines were used in Canada, Ireland, and Russia, and one of them, called a circular hackle or lapper, has been generally adopted wherever hemp is spun for coarse cloth. In 1835 he perfected a method for making cannon from wrought-iron and steel, resembling the process that was subsequently introduced by Sir William Armstrong. He patented it and received government contracts, but the great cost of his cannon prevented a demand for them. From 1834 till 1845 he was Rumford professor in Harvard, and in 1822, with Dr. John Ware, he established and conducted the "Boston Journal of Philosophy and the Arts." His publications include "The Relations of Science to the Useful Arts" (Boston, 1855); "On the Practicability of constructing a Cannon of Great Calibre" (Cambridge, 1856); and "On the Construction of Hooped Cannon," a sequel to the foregoing (1864).

TREADWELL, John, statesman, b. in Farmington, Conn., 23 Nov., 1745; d. there, 19 Aug., 1823. He was graduated at Yale in 1767, studied law, and began to practise in Farmington. He was elected a member of the legislature in 1776, and continued to take part in it until 1785, when he was appointed a member of the governor's council. He sat in the Continental congress from 1785 to 1786. In 1789 he became judge of probate and of the supreme court of errors, which office he held until 1809. He afterward served as judge of the court of common pleas for three years. He was made lieutenant-governor of Connecticut in 1798. He was one of eight that were delegates both to the convention at Hartford that ratified the constitution of the United States in 1788, and of the convention, thirty years afterward, that formed the state constitution. In 1809-'11 he was governor of Connecticut. Gov. Treadwell took an active part in the management of the school fund of Connecticut, and was president of the American board of commissioners for foreign missions during the latter years of his life. He received the degree of LL. D. from Yale in 1800.

TREADWELL, John Goodhue, physician, b. in Salem, Mass., 1 Aug., 1805; d. there, 6 Aug., 1856. He was the son of a physician of Salem, from whom he inherited a large fortune. After his graduation at Harvard in 1825 he adopted the medical profession, and settled in his native town. Dr. Treadwell bequeathed his farm at Topsfield to the Essex county agricultural society, to be used for scientific experiments in agriculture, and to Harvard an estate valued at about $100,000, to be applied to the foundation and maintenance of a professorship of physiology and anatomy. He also left his medical library to the same institution.

TREADWELL, Seymour Boughton, politician, b. in Bridgeport, Conn., 1 June, 1795; d. in Jackson, Mich., 9 June, 1867. His parents removed in his infancy to Monroe county, N. Y., where he was educated. He taught in western New York and Ohio, and in 1830 engaged in trade in Albion, N. Y., where he began to attract notice as a temperance and anti-slavery advocate. He removed to Rochester in 1837, and went to Michigan in 1839 to conduct the "Michigan Freeman," an anti-slavery organ, at Jackson. He took an active part in all the conventions and movements of the Abolitionists, supporting James G. Birney for president in 1840 and 1844 and John P. Hale in 1852. In 1854 he was nominated by the Free-soil party for commissioner of the state land-office and twice elected. He acquired note, especially by a remarkable state paper in which he denied the constitutionality of the payment by the state of the expenses of the judges of the supreme court. The correctness of his views on the question was maintained by the state auditors in opposition to the attorney-general. He lived in retirement after 1859 on a farm near Jackson. He became first known to the public as the author of a work entitled "American Liberties and American Slavery Morally and Politically Illustrated" (Rochester, 1838).

TREAT, Robert, governor of Connecticut, b. in England in 1622; d. in Milford, Conn., 12 July, 1710. Early in the 17th century he came to Wethersfield, Conn., with his father, Richard, who died there in 1669. The latter was a deputy from 1644 till 1658, assistant or magistrate from 1658 till 1665, and a patentee of the charter that was granted to Connecticut by Charles II. in 1662. His estate of about 900 acres in what is now Glastonbury was long known as the Treat farm. The son removed to Milford in 1639, and, although only eighteen years of age, was appointed one of nine men to survey and lay out the land. He was a deputy in 1653-'9 and again in 1665, and was assistant from 1659 till 1664. Mr. Treat was active in opposing the movement for consolidation of Connecticut and New Haven. The dissatisfied faction of the New Haven colony determined to seek another settlement, and the result was the founding of Newark, N. J. Robert Treat went with them, and was the first town-clerk of the new settlement as well as a deputy to the 1st assembly from 1667 till 1672. He was also granted a home lot of eight acres there. In 1672 he returned to Milford, where he had been made lieutenant in the train-band in 1654, and promoted captain in 1661. He became major in 1673. In 1675 he was chosen commander-in-chief of the forces for the war with King Philip, and drove the Indians from Northfield and Springfield. In their assault upon Hadley he put them to flight, and he took an active part in the destruction of the fort of the Narragansetts, 19 Dec., 1675. Maj. Treat is said to have been the last to leave the fort. He was elected deputy governor of Connecticut in 1676, and served till 1683, when he was elected governor. He was chosen again to the former post in 1698 and served till 1708. In 1683 he was elected governor and served till 1698, not including the two years under Sir Edmund Andros. In 1683 a dispute arose with the governor of New York, who claimed that Rye, Greenwich, and Stamford belonged to his jurisdiction. Gov. Treat was chosen one of the commissioners to settle the controversy, and a compromise was made by giving up Rye and retaining the two other towns. When King James II. determined to withdraw their charters from the colonies and place them under a governor appointed by the crown, the loss of the liberties of the colony seems to have been a foregone conclusion from the very beginning to Mr. Treat's mind, and he determined to delay the calamity as long as possible. According to the "instructions" that he drew up for the colony's agent, his duty was first to prevent if possible the loss of the charter, and secondly, failing in this, to plead that the colony might not be divided and united to others, but allowed to remain intact. Subsequently the hope was expressed that if Connecticut was to be united with some other colony, she might be annexed to Massachusetts rather than to New York. When Gov. Andros demanded the surrender of the charter, the governor and council replied that they could not comply with the request till they had heard from the king. Finally Andros went to Hartford on 31 Oct., 1687, to take charge of the government, and, according to Dummer, an almost contemporary writer, he "seized their charter for the king." It is commonly supposed that he did not obtain the charter. (See ANDROS.) There is no record that he ever demanded it of the assembly. He had gained possession of the government, was loyally received by the people, and, moreover, the proceedings of the next day prove that Andros could have known nothing of the hiding of the charter from him. This act of disloyalty would certainly have caused trouble; but the hiding of a charter may have been strictly true, though there is no mention of it in the records or by contemporary writers. On 1 Nov., Gov. Treat, though on various pretexts he had refused to surrender the charter for about two years, was made one of Gov. Andros's council, and within a week colonel of militia in New Haven county. Connecticut suffered less from the tyrannical acts of Andros than any other of the colonies, doubtless owing to the guidance of Mr. Treat. On 9 May, 1689, after the rebellion against Andros, Gov. Treat and the old magistrates under the charter resumed the offices from which they had been deposed in 1687.—His son, Samuel, clergyman, b. in Milford, Conn., in 1648; d. in Eastham, Mass., 18 March, 1717, was graduated at Harvard in 1669, received a call to Eastham, on Cape Cod, in 1672, and was ordained in 1675 at a salary of £50 a year, which was subsequently increased, besides several grants of land. He had about 500 Indians under his pastoral care, whose affections he so effectually gained by visiting their wigwams and joining in their festivities that they looked upon him as a father. He translated the "Confession of Faith" into the Nauset dialect for the use of the Indians. In 1678 and in 1713 he preached the election sermon, the former at Plymouth. He was the grandfather of Robert Treat Paine, the signer of the Declaration of Independence, and the great-grandfather of the Rev. James Freeman, the first Unitarian clergyman of Boston.—Samuel's great-grandson, Joseph, soldier, b. in Bangor, Me., 8 Dec., 1775; d. there, 27 Feb., 1853, became a civil engineer, but was commissioned captain in the 21st U. S. infantry on 12 March, 1812. Owing to the envy of some of his superior officers, he was accused of cowardice at the battle of Chippewa, 5 July, 1814; but upon trial he was honorably acquitted, none of his accusers appearing against him. He was mustered out in 1815, in 1817 and 1818 was a member of the general court of Massachusetts, and in 1820 of the Maine constitutional convention. He afterward became brigadier-general in the state militia. Gen. Treat published a pamphlet entitled "The Vindication of Capt. Joseph Treat, late of the 21st U. S. Infantry, against the Atrocious Calumnies Comprehended in Maj.-Gen. Brown's Official Report of the Battle of Chippewa" (Philadelphia, 1815).—Samuel's descendant in the seventh generation, John Harvey, author, b. in Pittsfield, N. H., 23 July, 1839, removed to Andover, Mass., in 1856, and was graduated at Harvard in 1862, after which he engaged in business with his father in Lawrence, Mass. In 1869 and 1875 he travelled extensively in Europe and the East. He is a member of historical societies in this country and England. In 1888 he presented to Harvard a large collection of rare books and to its Museum of comparative zoölogy his large collection of entomological specimens. In addition to various privately printed pamphlets on theological and archaeological subjects, he is the author of "Notes on the Rubrics of the Communion Office, with a Review of the Decisions of the Privy Council and Observations on Modern Ritualism," with an introductory letter by the Rev. Morgan Dix, S. T. D. (New York, 1882); "Truro Baptisms, 1711-1800" (Lawrence, 1886); "The Catholic Faith, or the Doctrines of the Church of Rome Contrary to Scripture and the Teaching of the Primitive Church," with an introduction by the Rev. James A. Bolles (Nashotah, Wis., 1888); and has a "Genealogy of the Treat Family" in preparation.—Joseph's descendant, Samuel, jurist, b. in Portsmouth, N. H., 17 Dec., 1815, was graduated at Harvard in 1837, taught while studying law, and in 1839 became principal of an academy in Geneseo, N. Y. In 1841 he removed to St. Louis, Mo., where he was admitted to the bar, appointed judge of the court of common pleas in 1849, and again held this office in 1851-'7. On 3 March, 1857, he was appointed U. S. judge for the eastern district of Missouri, which office he resigned on 15 Feb., 1887. Judge Treat was a corporator of Washington university, St. Louis, from which he received the degree of LL. D. in 1879. See "Proceedings of the St. Louis Bar on the Retirement of Hon. Samuel Treat" (St. Louis, 1887).—Samuel's cousin, Samuel Hubbel, jurist, b. in Plainfield, Otsego co., N. Y., 21 June, 1811; d. in Springfield, Ill., 27 March, 1887, was of the seventh generation from Matthias Treat, and his grandfather, Theodore, served in the Revolutionary army from 1775 till 1780. He worked on his father's farm and studied law in Richfield, where he was admitted to the bar. In 1834 he walked to Springfield, Ill., formed a law-partnership, and practised until 1839, when he was appointed judge of the state circuit court and held this office until 1841. He was transferred to the supreme bench in that year, and served till 3 March, 1855, when he was appointed by President Pierce to the office of U. S. judge for the southern district of Illinois, which post he held at the time of his death. His library was one of the finest private collections in the state, and he was active in the diocesan convention of the Protestant Episcopal church in Illinois. With Walter B. Scates and Robert S. Blackwell he compiled, with notes, "Illinois Law Statutes," embracing all of the general laws in force, 1 Dec., 1857 (2 vols., Chicago, 1858).

TREDWELL, Thomas, jurist, b. in Smithtown, Long Island, N. Y., in 1742; d. in Plattsburg, N. Y., 30 Jan., 1832. He was graduated at Princeton in 1764, and was a member of the New York provincial congress in 1774-'5 and of the State constitutional convention of 1776-'7. In 1788 he was a delegate to the convention that ratified the constitution of the United States. He sat in the assembly from 1777 till 1783, and in the state senate in 1786-'9 and 1803-'7, was first judge of the court of probate in 1778-'87, and surrogate of Suffolk county in 1787-'91. From 1791 till 1795 he was a member of congress. Judge Tredwell was an original proprietor of Plattsburg, N. Y., represented Clinton and Essex counties in the State constitutional convention of 1801, and was surrogate of Clinton county in 1807-'31.

TREGO, William Henry, expressman, b. in Middleburg, Carroll co., Md., 18 Feb., 1837. He was educated at the Baltimore public schools, entered the service of Adams express company at Baltimore in 1852, and passed through various grades to the superintendency in 1856. During the civil war he had charge of the transportation of express matter for troops in the southern states. In 1877 he projected and organized on the Baltimore and Ohio railroad system the first trunk-line railway express in the United States, and he was intimately associated with its subsequent history. In 1887 he organized the railway express over the Erie system, allied with the Baltimore and Ohio express, and he brought about other railway express alliances which, under rulings of the U. S. supreme court, acquired an area rivalling that of corporate expresses, and advantages that seemed to menace the existence of the latter. Previously all express business on railroads was done by express companies as separate corporations, paying the railroads a certain percentage of the earnings for hauling, usually forty per cent. Under the railway express system the railway company performed the service directly, and secured the entire profit. The large financial interests that were involved placed the wealthy corporate expresses on the defensive. The question promised to become important in American railway management. The railway express that had been founded by Mr. Trego grew to great proportions in spite of a combined corporate opposition of ten years, when peculiar circumstances banished it as an institution from the United States. Early in 1887 a new management of the Philadelphia and Reading road sold that company's express to corporate interests. Later, the same year, embarrassments impelled the Baltimore and Ohio railroad to part with its express, and in 1888 the remaining railway express, the Erie, succumbed to allied pressure, and was sold.

TREJO, Hernando de (tray'-ho), Spanish adventurer, b. in Truxillo, Estremadura, about 1510; d. in Asuncion, Paraguay, in 1555. He served in Italy, went to Mexico about 1540, and in 1550 to La Plata with Juan de Salazar de Espinosa. They encountered heavy seas and hurricanes, and the adventurers became dissatisfied. Dissensions following between the chief pilot and Juan de Salazar, the latter was deposed from the command and Trejo was elected in his place. But the latter, fearing that the adelantado of La Plata would punish him for his rebellion, landed Salazar at San Vicente and sailed to the south, intending to found a settlement. Driven by contrary winds, he landed early in 1551 in a bay a few miles north of Santa Catalina island and south of Cananea. There he founded the city of San Francisco and tried to explore the interior, but the warlike Indians checked his progress and cut off his supplies. The adventurers greatly suffering from want, Trejo determined in 1553 to abandon the colony and set out for Asuncion. Sailing up Itabucu river and otherwise following the route that had been explored a few years before by Cabeza de Vaca, he entered the territory of the Guaranis, where he was assailed by the Indians, but he defeated them and pursued his march toward Asuncion, suffering great hardships and arriving at last in May, 1554, after a march of six months. He was imprisoned there by Martinez de Irala, and, being released by order of the court, was appointed governor of the city, dying a few weeks later. He had married in San Francisco one of the daughters of the deceased adelantado-elect, Sanabria.—Their son, Hernando de Trejo y Sanabria, b. in San Francisco in 1553; d. in Rio de Janeiro in 1614, became a Franciscan, and is counted among the first apostles of Brazil. He was elected in 1603 provincial of the latter country, and founded colleges and built churches everywhere, interesting himself to the last in the welfare of the Indians, especially of the half-breeds, or Mamalucos, and became their legislator. He left a valuable manuscript, "Arte de la lengua de los Mamalucos," which is preserved in the archives of Simancas.

TREJO, Rafael de, Spanish soldier and historian, b. in Estremadura in the last quarter of the 15th century; d. in Mexico about 1540. Little is known of his life except that he was an officer in the band of adventurers that accompanied Hernan Cortes to the conquest of Mexico. He seems to have been an educated man, as he wrote an account of the accidents of the conquest, under the title of "Memorial de algunas cosas dignas de saberse en la conquista de Nueva España," the manuscript of which, according to Torquemada, who confesses that he used some of the contents, existed in the government archives of Simancas, but has not yet been found.

TREMAIN, Henry Edwin, soldier, b. in New York city, 14 Nov., 1840. He was graduated at the College of the city of New York in 1860 and then entered Columbia law-school. On 17 April, 1861, he enlisted in the 7th New York regiment as a private, and served through its two months' campaign about Washington, after which, on 13 July, he entered the National volunteer service as 1st lieutenant of the 2d New York fire zouaves. During the peninsular campaign he was on Gen. Daniel E. Sickles's staff, and was in the battles of Williamsburg, Fair Oaks, and Malvern Hill. He was then transferred to Gen. John Pope's army, and engaged at Bristow Station and the second battle of Bull Run, where he was captured while endeavoring to check a temporary panic and the rapid advance of the enemy. After several months' confinement in Libby prison he was exchanged, resumed duty on Gen. Sickles's staff as assistant inspector-general, and was present at Fredericksburg and Chancellorsville, where he served as an aide to Gen. Joseph Hooker. Meanwhile, on 25 April, 1863, he had been commissioned major, and was chief staff officer to Gen. Sickles at the battle of Gettysburg. He was on Gen. Daniel Butterfield's staff at Chattanooga, and took part in the battles of Dalton and Resaca. In 1864 he was ordered to the Army of the Potomac and served successively on the staffs of Gen. David M. Gregg and Gen. George Crook, participating in the cavalry battles under these officers, until the surrender of the Army of Northern Virginia. He was brevetted brigadier-general of volunteers on 30 Nov., 1865, and continued on duty in the Carolinas until his discharge on 29 April, 1866. Gen. Tremain then resumed his law studies and was graduated in 1867, after which he entered into practice, forming in 1868 the firm of Tremain and Tyler. From 1870 till 1885 he was usually retained either by or against the government in its legal controversies in New York, and he was connected with the Marié-Garrison litigation involving the title to the Missouri Pacific railroad. He has been active as a Republican in political canvasses, and for five terms, beginning in 1871, he has been president of the associate alumni of the College of the city of New York. On 19 April, 1887, he was elected colonel of the veterans of the 7th regiment, the oldest organization of its kind in this country. His campaign notes of "Last Hours of Sheridan's Cavalry" were edited by John Watts de Peyster (1885).

TREMAIN, Lyman, lawyer and statesman, b. in Durham, Greene co., N. Y., 14 June, 1819; d. in New York city, 30 Nov., 1878. After passing through college, he studied law, and was called to the bar in 1840. He began practice in his native county, and continued it in Albany, was elected supervisor of Durham in 1842, and became district attorney in 1844. In 1846 he was elected surrogate and county judge of Greene county, and in 1858 he became attorney-general of the state of New York. He was sent to the assembly in 1866-'8, and in 1872 was elected congressman as a Republican over Samuel S. Cox, serving from 1 Dec., 1873, to 3 March, 1875.—His son, Lyman, soldier, b. in Durham, Greene co., N. Y., in June, 1843; d. near Petersburg, Va., 6 Feb., 1865, entered Hobart in 1860, but abandoned his studies in 1862, and entered the National army. He was appointed adjutant of the 7th New York heavy artillery, served in the defenses of Washington, and was afterward made assistant adjutant-general, with the rank of captain, on the staff, in Kilpatrick's division of the Army of the Potomac. In December, 1864, he was commissioned lieutenant-colonel of the 10th New York cavalry. He commanded this regiment at the battle of Hatcher's run, where he received the wound of which he died.

TRENCHARD, Edward, naval officer, b. in New Jersey in 1784; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 3 Nov., 1824. He was descended from the English family of Trenchards, of Somersetshire and Wolverton, one of whom settled at Salem, N. J., and his grandfather, George Trenchard, was attorney-general of West New Jersey. Edward was appointed a midshipman in the U. S. navy on 30 April, 1800, and became lieutenant on 18 Feb., 1807; commandant, 24 July, 1813; and captain, 5 March, 1817. During the war of 1812-'15 he served with Col. Isaac Chauncey on Lake Ontario, and commanded the "Madison" during some of her engagements on the lake, and rendered meritorious services in the blockade of Kingston, and other operations. He had the sloop "John Adams" in the Mediterranean squadron after the Algerine war in 1815-'17, was promoted to captain, 5 March, 1817, and commanded the sloop "Cyane" on the coast of Africa in 1819-'22.—His son, Stephen Decatur, naval officer, b. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 10 July, 1818, was appointed a midshipman in the U. S. navy, 23 Oct., 1834, after making a cruise as acting midshipman in the European squadron in 1832. He was at the naval school in Philadelphia in 1839-'40, became passed midshipman, 16 July, 1840, and was on coast survey duty in 1845-'6. During this service Trenchard was on board the brig "Washington" when she was wrecked off the coast of North Carolina, and was one of the few that were saved. He was made lieutenant, 27 Feb., 1847, was on the "Saratoga" in Mexico in that year, and while again on coast survey duty in 1853-'7 rescued the British bark "Adieu" off Gloucester, Mass., when in great peril, saving all hands and the entire cargo, for which service he was presented with a sword by the queen of England, and a watch by the underwriters of the bark. He was in the "Powhatan" on her diplomatic cruise to China and Japan in 1857-'60, and acted as aide, or flag-lieutenant, to Com. Josiah Tatnall, and was with the commodore when he visited the British Admiral Hope. Lieut. Trenchard was slightly wounded at the battle of Peiho River. During the civil war he was one of the first officers to go on duty, as he was ordered to command the "Keystone State" on 19 April, 1861. He went with that steamer to Norfolk navy-yard; but the yard was burning when the "Keystone State" arrived, and the vessel assisted in rescuing such property as was saved. Lieut. Trenchard was ordered on 19 June, 1861, to the "Rhode Island," which was first used as a supply and special despatch ship, but she was afterward converted into a heavily armed cruiser and ordered to the North Atlantic squadron. While the "Rhode Island" was towing the "Monitor" from Hampton Roads to Beaufort, N. C., the latter foundered off Cape Hatteras, but, through the exertions of the officers and crew of the "Rhode Island," the majority of the "Monitor's" crew were saved. His vessel was afterward attached to the special West Indian squadron to look after the "Alabama" and "Florida," and also to the South Atlantic squadron for a short time. During her early service as a cruiser she captured several valuable prizes. Trenchard was made commander in July, 1862, and took an active part in both bombardments of Fort Fisher and its capture. He became captain in July, 1866, and commodore, 7 May, 1871, was on the examining board in 1871-'2, and served as light-house inspector and on headquarters duty in 1873-'5. He was promoted rear-admiral, 10 Aug., 1875, and commanded the North Atlantic squadron in 1876-'8. In 1876 Admiral Trenchard had twenty-one vessels in his squadron, which was the largest since the war. He was engaged in large railroad operations in the West Indies when the civil war began in 1861, and was on the point of setting out from Cuba when he was assigned to the command of the non-uniformed volunteers that were organized to defend Baltimore from northern troops. He entered the military service of the state of Virginia in May, 1861, as colonel of engineers, and was ordered by Gen. Robert E. Lee to take charge of the construction of the field-works and forts for the defence of Norfolk. Upon their completion he was promoted brigadier, and ordered to report to Gen. Joseph E. Johnston at Centreville, who directed him to locate and construct batteries at Evansport on Potomac river, so as to close that river against U. S. vessels. With them he effectually blockaded the river during the winter of 1861-'2. In November, 1861, he was assigned to the command of the 7th brigade of Ewell's division, and when Gen. Ewell was ordered to report to Gen. Thomas J. Jackson in May, 1862, Trimble took an active part in the campaign that ensued against Gen. Nathaniel P. Banks, Gen. John C. Frémont, and Gen. James Shields. He selected the Confederate position for the battle of Cross Keys, 8 June, 1862, with the consent of Gen. Ewell, who gives him credit for it in his report. He led his brigade at the battle of Gaines's Mills and the subsequent seven days' battles. At the battle of Slaughter's Mountain, 12 Aug., 1862, between the armies of Gen. John Pope and Gen. Jackson, he did good service, and on the night of 27 Aug., 1862, with the 21st North Carolina and 21st Georgia regiments, he captured Manassas Junction, with supplies of subsistence, clothing, and ammunition. For this Gen. Jackson recommended his promotion to be major-general. When Jackson was promoted to command a corps he selected Gen. Trimble to succeed him in command of his division. Trimble was wounded at the second battle of Bull Run, 28 Aug., 1862, was appointed major-general on 23 April, 1863, commanded a division of the 2d corps at Chancellorsville, and in June, 1863, Gen. Lee offered him the command of the valley district to form the left wing of the Army of Northern Virginia. He was in Gen. George E. Pickett's charge on the third day of the battle of Gettysburg, where he was wounded and captured, and lost a leg. He remained in prison at Johnson's island twenty-one months, and was exchanged in April, 1865. Hastening to rejoin Gen. Lee, on reaching Lynchburg he found that Lee had surrendered the day before at Appomattox. He then returned to Baltimore, where he remained until his death.

In the attack on the Tripolitan fleet he boarded one of the largest of the enemy's vessels, and had a hand-to-hand conflict with her commander, while he was armed with only a short pike. He received nine sabre-cuts across the head, but thrust his pike through his adversary, whereupon the Tripolitan crew surrendered. He also distinguished himself subsequently during the Tripolitan war, and received a vote of thanks and a sword from congress. The union proved unhappy, and in 1829 she came to this country and endeavored to establish herself in business in Cincinnati, Ohio. Failing in this enterprise, she returned to England in 1831, and published "Domestic Manners of the Americans," in which rude and ludicrous phases of American character and habits were depicted in a broad but witty caricature (2 vols., London, 1832). She subsequently led a career of great literary activity, travelled extensively on the continent, and became among the most voluminous of English female writers. Her first book was followed by a novel entitled "The Refugee in America" (1832), and "The Adventures of Jonathan Jefferson Whitlaw" (1836), both illustrative of the vulgar side of American manners and character. Her other writings include numerous novels, and "Belgium and Western Germany" (2 vols., London, 1834); "A Visit to Italy" (2 vols., 1842); and "Travels and Travellers" (1846).—Her son, THOMAS ADOLPHUS, is a voluminous author, and was for many years Italian correspondent of the New York "Tribune."—Another son, ANTHONY, (1815–1882), was connected with the British postal service in 1834–'67, and was sent by the government several times to this country to compare the English system with that in the United States. In 1801 he received the degree of master in pharmacy from the latter university. For a time he practised his art at the Hague and elsewhere, but soon went to Paris, where he became the pupil of the Abbé Haüy. In 1809 he was appointed by Louis Bonaparte, then king of Holland, scientific attaché of a naval expedition to Java, but he was captured by an English privateer, and, after confinement in Dunkirk, returned to Paris. He then made his way on an American sailing vessel from La Rochelle to Philadelphia, hoping thence to reach Java. Soon after his arrival in the United States, Louis Bonaparte relinquished the throne, and Java was surrendered to the English. In consequence he determined to remain in Philadelphia, where, in 1812, he assisted in founding the Academy of natural sciences, and was its president in 1812–'17. The first works in the United States for the manufacture of alum were organized by him in 1814 at Cape Sable, Md.; but the enterprise was unsuccessful. He returned to Philadelphia, and in 1821 was appointed professor of mineralogy in the Philadelphia museum. He delivered public lectures on that branch and on chemistry at the Philadelphia college of pharmacy, also making geological excursions into New Jersey, New York, and elsewhere. In 1825 he removed to New Harmony, Ind., with Robert Owen and others, but, becoming dissatisfied, settled in Nashville in 1827. He was appointed professor of chemistry, geology, and mineralogy in the University of Nashville in 1828, which chair he held until his death, and in 1831 he was made state geologist, an office he filled until 1849. Prof. Troost gathered an extensive collection of minerals, including about 15,000 specimens, as well as more than 5,000 geological specimens and various other articles, constituting a cabinet that at that time was considered the finest in the possession of a single individual in the United States. He was a member of many scientific and philosophical societies in the United States and Europe, and translated into Dutch Alexander von Humboldt's "Aspects of Nature." S. senate, having been chosen as a Democrat. After serving from February to December of that year, he resigned to accept a seat in the court of appeals of Mississippi, which he held till 1840. He then resumed his profession, and was vice-chancellor of the northern district of the state in 1855–'7, and professor of law in the University of Mississippi in 1860–'2. He ardently opposed the compromise that was made by the Federalists with the Yazoo speculators, and sustained the war measures against Great Britain in 1812. He became U. S. senator in 1816, having been elected to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of William W. Bibb, served two years, and in 1823 became governor of Georgia. The legislature of that year required the executive to "use his exertions to obtain from the United States the extinguishment of the Indian title to all their remaining territory in Georgia." Gov. Troup accordingly opened a correspondence with the secretary of war that resulted in the appointment of a commission that concluded a treaty with the Indians by which, in consideration of the payment of $27,491, the Creeks ceded to the state all their lands. During Gov. Troup's administration, Lafayette visited Georgia, and was entertained by him with great hospitality in the executive mansion. Troup was returned to the U. S. senate in 1828, but retired before the expiration of his term, on account of the failure of his health. He was an able advocate of state sovereignty, and, under the conviction that popular rights were imperilled, declared in 1833 "that he would have been carried from his death-bed to the capital rather than not have given his vote against the force bill." See his "Life," by Edward J. Harden (Savannah, Ga., 1859).

TROUP, Robert, soldier, b. in New York city in 1757; d. there, 14 Jan., 1832. He was graduated at Columbia in 1774, studied law under John Jay, and early in 1776 joined the Revolutionary army on Long Island as a lieutenant. He became aide to Gen. Nathaniel Woodhull shortly afterward, was taken prisoner at the battle of Long Island, and confined for some time in the "Jersey" prison-ship, but in the spring of 1777 was exchanged and joined the army in New Jersey. He became aide to Gen. Horatio Gates in August, and participated in the battle of Stillwater, and the surrender of Gen. Burgoyne, 17 Oct., 1777. In February, 1778, he was appointed by congress secretary of the board of war. On its dissolution in 1779 he went to New Jersey and completed his law studies with Judge William Patterson. After the peace he became judge of the U. S. district court of New York, held office for several years, and was a member of the assembly. He was the warm personal friend of Alexander Hamilton, and supported him in politics. During his latter years he resided in Geneva, N. Y., as principal agent of the great Pulteney estate. He published several pamphlets, including "Vindication of the Claim of Elkanah Watson" (New York, 1821), and "Letter on the Lake-Canal Policy of New York" (1822).

TROUSDALE, William, soldier, b. in Sumner county, Tenn., in 1790; d. in Nashville, Tenn., in March, 1872. He served as private and subsequently as lieutenant in the Creek war under Gen. Andrew Jackson, participating in the battles of Tallahatchie and Talladega. During the latter part of the second war with Great Britain he took part in the capture of Pensacola and the battle of New Orleans. In 1836 he served in the Seminole difficulties as major-general of militia. During the war with Mexico he was a colonel of infantry, and engaged in all the battles in the valley of Mexico, being wounded at Molino del Rey, and again in the attack on Chapultepec. In 1849-'51 he was governor of Tennessee, and in 1853-'7 he was U. S. minister to Brazil. After that service he did not again enter public life.

TROUVÉ, Claude, French clergyman, b. in the diocese of Tours, France, in 1642; d. probably in Canada about the close of the 17th century. He was educated by the Sulpitians in Paris, was ordained a subdeacon, and sent with François Salignac de la Motte Fénelon, the brother of the illustrious archbishop of Cambrai, to Canada in June, 1667. He was ordained a priest soon after his arrival. He was then appointed to take charge of an Iroquois mission at the western extremity of Lake Ontario. He reached the village of Kente on 28 Oct., 1668, and began his labors. He was joined by other missionaries the following year, and, with their aid, established missions at the villages of Gandaseteiagon and Ganeraske. He was at Port Royal in 1690, when that town was taken by Sir William Phipps, and was brought as a prisoner to Boston, contrary to the terms of the capitulation. He was exchanged toward the end of the year, and returned to Canada, where he continued his missionary labors.

TROW, James (tro), Canadian member of parliament, b. in Newtown, Montgomeryshire, Wales, 16 Dec., 1827. He was educated at Welchpool, came to Canada in 1841, taught for seven years, and has been warden of the county of Perth for twenty years. He represented South Perth in the legislative assembly in 1867-'71, was elected to the Dominion parliament in 1872, and re-elected in 1874, 1878, 1882, and 1887. He is a banker, connected with various financial institutions, and is one of the leaders of the Liberals in parliament. He wrote letters relative to the Franco-Prussian war, which were copied extensively in the Canadian press, and his contributions concerning the northwest territories were published in pamphlet-form, to the number of 80,000 copies, by the Dominion government, although it was then under the control of his political opponents.

TROW, John Fowler, printer, b. in Andover, Mass., 29 Jan., 1810; d. in Orange, N. J., 8 Aug., 1886. He was apprenticed to a printer in his native town for seven years, and, on attaining his majority, established the Nashua, N. H., "Herald," which was unsuccessful. He settled in New York city in 1833, formed a partnership in the printing business with John F. West, became sole owner of the establishment in 1836, and in 1842 admitted Jonathan Leavitt into the firm, but returned to the conduct of the business alone about 1848. He was one of the first to introduce electrotyping into the printing business, and adopted many inventions to facilitate type-setting and the manufacture of books. For many years he was active in the publication of directories, was interested in the "Wilson Business Directory" in 1849, and in 1852 began to issue "Trow's New York City Directory," which has since appeared yearly. In 1865 he issued the "United States Business Directory," an undertaking of greater magnitude than had ever before been attempted in this country. In 1855 he published a specimen-book of the typographic art, for which the University of New York conferred on him the title of University printer.

TROWBRIDGE, Edmund, lawyer, b. in Newton, Mass., in 1709; d. in Cambridge, Mass., 2 April, 1792. He was graduated at Harvard in 1728, and for some time bore the name of Goff, after an uncle. "This Goff," wrote John Adams in 1759, "had been attorney-general for twenty years, and commanded the practice in Middlesex and Worcester and several other counties. He had power to crush, by his frown or his nod, any young lawyer in his country." He became attorney-general of Massachusetts in 1749, and was a member of the council several years, but lost favor with the popular party in 1766, on account of his lukewarmness in resisting British aggressions. He was elevated to the supreme bench of Massachusetts the next year, and, notwithstanding his loyalist principles, is declared by all his contemporaries to have been the most profound lawyer in New England prior to the Revolution, and an honorable and upright judge. In the trial of Capt. Thomas Preston and other British soldiers for firing on the people in State street, Boston, 5 March, 1770, his fairness and ability commanded universal praise. But, although he was attached to the royal government, he did not approve of all its measures, and in 1772, alarmed at the aspect of affairs, he resigned his office and retired to private life. As an executor of John Alfred, a wealthy merchant of Boston, he had the power of determining to what the latter's bounty should be applied, and founded in Harvard the Alfred professorship of natural religion, moral philosophy, and civil polity. He was the last of the judges of the supreme court of Massachusetts that wore the scarlet robe and powdered wig.

TROWBRIDGE, John, physicist, b. in Boston, Mass., 5 Aug., 1843. He was prepared for Harvard at the Boston Latin-school, but was graduated at the Lawrence scientific school of that university in 1866. After graduation he was made a tutor, and he continued so until 1869, when he was called to the assistant professorship of physics in Massachusetts institute of technology. In 1870 he returned to Harvard to establish a laboratory course of instruction in physics, out of which has grown the Jefferson physical laboratory, which is now the largest of its kind in the United States. In order to secure this great means for advancing the study of physical science, Prof. Trowbridge did much in the way of personal solicitation, and also by publishing, both in journals and as pamphlets, papers upon the necessity of a well-equipped physical laboratory. His original investigations gained for him in 1873 the degree of S. D. from Harvard, and in 1880 he was made professor of experimental physics. In 1888 he was advanced to the Rumford professorship of the application of science to the useful arts, which chair he still (1888) holds. His scientific work has consisted largely of original investigations conducted under his direction and issued as "Contributions from the Physical Laboratory of Harvard College." His independent researches include papers on "Animal Electricity" (1872), in which he showed that the existence of the so-called muscular electric current had not been proved, although generally accepted at that time. He has devised among other instruments "A New Form of Galvanometer" (1871); "A New Induction Coil" (1875); and "A New Form of Mirror Galvanometer" (1876). His later papers have had much to do with electricity, and among his memoirs on this subject is "On Telegraphing without a Cable" (1884) and "Niagara Falls considered as a Source of Electricity" (1885). During 1887-'8 he instituted experiments that have proved the presence of carbon and platinum in the sun, and also a series which indicate the absence of oxygen-lines from the solar spectrum. Prof. Trowbridge, in addition to membership in many societies, was secretary of the American academy of arts and sciences in 1879-'84, and in the latter year presided over the physical section of the American association for the advancement of science. Then he delivered a vice-presidential address, on "What is Electricity?" which was very rich in suggestions concerning the possibilities of that science. He was a member of the International congress of electricians that met in Paris in 1883, and was a delegate to the U. S. congress of electricians that convened in Philadelphia in October, 1884. In 1878 he was chosen to membership in the National academy of sciences. Prof. Trowbridge was one of the editors of the "Annals of Scientific Discovery for 1869" (Boston, 1870), and since 1879 has been an associate editor of the "American Journal of Science," with charge of the notices on physics. His scientific papers exceed fifty in number, and he has published "The New Physics" (New York, 1884).

TROWBRIDGE, John Townsend, author, b. in Ogden, N. Y., 18 Sept., 1827. He was educated in the common schools, learned the elements of Latin, Greek, and French without a master, and, after teaching and working on a farm for one year in Illinois, settled in New York city, where he wrote for the journals and magazines. He removed to Boston about 1848, and in 1850, during the absence of Ben. Perley Poore in Washington, D. C., edited his paper, the "Sentinel," but wrote for it an editorial on the fugitive-slave law that nearly destroyed the popularity of the paper. He has since been connected with many magazines and newspapers, has led an active literary life, and was managing editor of "Our Young Folks" in 1870-'3. He was one of the original contributors to the "Atlantic Monthly"; and the "Vagabonds," "At Sea," and the "Pewee" among his poems, and the popular short story "Coupon-Bonds," appeared in that magazine. John Burroughs says of him: "He knows the heart of a boy and the heart of a man, and has laid them both open in his books. His 'Neighbor Jackwood' is the pioneer of novels of real life in New England, and the 'Vagabonds' is the first specimen, and one of the best, of what has come to be known as the Bret Harte school of poetry." Mr. Trowbridge has published numerous books of adventure, travel, and fiction, and his writings include "Father Brighthopes, or an Old Clergyman's Vacation" (Boston, 1853); "Burreliff" (1853); "Hearts and Faces" (1853); "Home Life Unveiled" (1853); "Martin Merrivale, his X-Mark" (1854); "Ironthorpe" (1855); "Neighbor Jackwood, a Novel of New England Life" (1857); "The Old Battle-Ground" (1859); "The Vagabonds, and other Poems" (1869); "The Drummer-Boy" (1863); "Cudjo's Cave" (1864); "The Three Scouts" (1865); "Lucy Arlyn" (1866); "The South, a Tour of its Battle-Fields and Ruined Cities" (Hartford, 1866); "Neighbors' Wives" (Boston, 1867); "The Story of Columbus" (1867); "Coupon Bonds, and other Stories" (1871); "The Jack Hazard Series" (5 vols., 1871-'5); "The Emigrant's Story, and other Poems" (1875); "The Silver Medal Series" (6 vols., 1877-'82); "The Book of Gold, and other Poems" (New York, 1878); "A Home Idyl, and other Poems" (1881); and "The Tide-Mill Series" (6 vols., Boston, 1882-'7).

TROWBRIDGE, William Petit, engineer, b. in Oakland county, Mich., 25 May, 1828. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1848 at the head of his class, and promoted 2d lieutenant in the corps of engineers. During the last year of his course he acted as assistant professor of chemistry, and after graduation he spent two years in the astronomical observatory at West Point, preparing himself for duty in the U. S. coast survey, to which he was ordered at his own request. In 1852 he was assigned to duty under Alexander D. Bache in the primary triangulation of the coast of Maine, which in 1852 was placed under his immediate charge. Later he executed surveys of Appomattox river, in Virginia, with a view to the improvement of its navigation, and also similar surveys of James river near Richmond. He also surveyed the Dutch gap, and recommended the "cut-off," or canal, that was subsequently constructed. In 1853 he was sent to the Pacific coast, where he conducted a series of tidal and magnetic observations extending through a period of three years along the coast from San Diego to Puget sound. He became 1st lieutenant, 18 Dec., 1854, returned from the west in 1856, and resigned from the corps of engineers on 1 Dec. to accept the professorship of mathematics in the University of Michigan, which chair he held for a year. At the solicitation of Supt. Alexander D. Bache he accepted the permanent appointment of assistant on the coast survey, and was engaged in preparing for publication the results of the Gulf stream exploration. In 1860 he was sent to Key West to superintend the erection of a permanent self-registering magnetic observatory, and in 1861 he prepared minute descriptions of the harbors, inlets, and rivers of the southern coast, for the use of the navy. Later he was ordered to execute a hydrographic survey of Narragansett bay, where there was a design to erect a navy-yard, but the results of the survey were not favorable to the project. Soon after the beginning of the civil war he was placed in charge of the engineer office in New York city, where his duties included the supply of materials for fortifications and other defences, and the construction and shipping of engineer equipage for armies in the field. He also was superintending engineer of the constructing of the fort at Willett's point, N. Y., of repairs of Fort Schuyler, N. Y., and in charge of works on Governor's island in New York harbor. In 1865 he became vice-president of the Novelty iron-works in New York city, with direction of their shops, where he remained for four years. He was then elected professor of dynamical engineering in the Sheffield scientific school of Yale until 1876, when he was called to take charge of the engineering department of the School of mines of Columbia, which place he now holds. Prof. Trowbridge held various state offices while he was in New Haven, notably that of adjutant-general with the rank of brigadier-general on the governor's staff in 1872-'6. The degree of A. M. was conferred on him by Rochester in 1856 and by Yale in 1870, that of Ph. D. by Princeton in 1879, and that of LL. D. by Trinity in 1880, and the University of Michigan in 1887. He is a member of scientific societies, and vice-president of the New York academy of sciences, was vice-president of the American association for the advancement of science, presiding over the section of mechanical science in 1882, and in 1878 was elected to the National academy of sciences. In addition to many papers in scientific journals and the transactions of societies of which he is a member, he has published "Proposed Plan for building a Bridge across the East River at Blackwell's Island" (New York, 1869); "Heat as a Source of Power" (1874); and "Turbine Wheels" (1879).

TROYES, Pierre de, French soldier, b. in France; d. at Niagara in 1687. He had seen much service both in France and Canada, and commanded a troop of eighty men in the Hudson bay expedition of 1686. He arrived at the head of Hudson bay on 20 June, and at once laid siege to Monsipi fort, on the Monsoni river, which he finally carried by assault. He held a command of regulars in Denonville's campaign of 1687. He was sent the same year to take charge, with 100 men, of a fort which had been erected at Niagara. But sickness attacked the garrison, which, with its commander, perished in a short time, according to Charlevoix in his "Histoire de la Nouvelle France." La Hontan in his "Nouveaux voyages" (The Hague, 1703) says that some escaped. See also "Histoire de l'Amérique Septentrionale," by De la Pothérie.

TRUDEL, François-Xavier Anselme, Canadian journalist, b. in Sainte Anne de la Perade, Quebec, 29 April, 1838; d. in Montreal, 15 Jan., 1890. He studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1861, and appointed queen's counsel in 1880. He was editor of "La Minerve" in Montreal in 1860, founded "L'Etendard," a French daily, of which he was part-proprietor and editor, and was also editor of "La Revue Canadienne" and "L'Ouvrier." He represented Champlain in the Quebec assembly in 1871-'73, and became a member of the Dominion parliament, 31 Oct., 1873. He was one of the authors of the "Programme Catholique" (1871), and wrote several political pamphlets. He was for several years president of the "Cercle littéraire" and the "Union Catholique" of Montreal.

TRUE, Charles Kittridge, educator, b. in Portland, Me., 14 Aug., 1809; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 20 June, 1878. He was graduated at Harvard in 1832, and was subsequently pastor of various Methodist churches, and principal of the Amenia seminary, N. Y. He was professor of moral and intellectual philosophy at Wesleyan in 1849-'60. Harvard gave him the degree of D. D. in 1849. He edited the "Oregonian and Indian Advocate" in 1839, in Boston, Mass., and was the author of "Elements of Logic" (Boston, 1840); "Shawmut, or the Settlement of Boston" (1845); "John Winthrop and the Great Colony" (New York, 1875); "Life and Times of Sir Walter Raleigh" (Cincinnati, Ohio, 1878); "Life and Times of John Knox" (1878); "Memoirs of John Howard" (1878); "The Thirty Years' War" (1879); "Heroes of Holland" (1882); and "Life of Capt. John Smith" (1882).

TRUGUET, Laurent Jean François (troogay), Comte, French naval officer, b. in Toulon, 10 Jan., 1752; d. in Paris, 26 Dec., 1839. He entered the navy in 1756, and had made eight cruises to the Gulf of Mexico and South America at the beginning of the war of 1778. He was then attached as lieutenant to the fleet of Count d'Estaing, took part in the assault on St. Lucia and in the engagement with Admiral Howe off Port Royal, Martinique, and at the siege of Savannah in September, 1779, saved D'Estaing's life. He was promoted captain, and assisted under De Guichen in the engagements with Admiral Byron off Dominica, and served afterward under De Grasse and Vaudreuil to the end of the cruise. He was promoted rear-admiral in 1792, and vice-admiral in 1794. He was secretary of the navy from November, 1795, till May, 1797, and made strenuous efforts to pacify Santo Domingo and the French colonies in the Antilles. He was ambassador in Spain in 1797-'8, and obtained the release of all the French citizens arrested in South America as republicans. Truguet was state councillor in 1801 and maritime prefect of Holland in 1811-'14, and was made admiral of France, 19 Nov., 1831.

TRUMAN, Benjamin Cummings, author, b. in Providence, R. I., 25 Oct., 1835. He was educated in Canterbury, Merrimack co., N. H., and adopted the profession of journalism. In 1862-'5 he served on the staff of Andrew Johnson, then military governor of Tennessee, and as a volunteer participated in the battles of Stone River, Nashville, Mobile, and other engagements. He afterward became private secretary to President Johnson, and in 1865-'6 was special commissioner to the southern states to inquire into the condition of the negroes and poor white inhabitants. He was special agent of the post-office department for the Pacific coast in 1866-'9 and again in 1878-'9, was president and secretary of the Southern district agricultural society of California in 1873-'7, and now (1888) is connected with the Pacific railroad company. He has published "The South after the War" (New York, 1867); "Semi-Tropical California" (1870); "Occidental Sketches" (1878); "Winter Resorts of California" (1880); "From the Crescent City to the Golden Gate" (1882); "The Field of Honor," a history of duelling (1884); and "Homes and Happiness in the Golden Gate" (1886).

TRUMBULL, Benjamin, historian, b. in Hebron, Conn., 19 Dec., 1735; d. in North Haven, Conn., 2 Feb., 1820. He was graduated at Yale in 1759, and received his theological education under Rev. Eleazer Wheelock, who delivered his ordination sermon in 1760, commending him to the people of North Haven as "not a sensual, sleepy, lazy, dumb dog, that could not bark back." He continued in that charge for nearly sixty years, his preaching being interrupted only by the Revolution, in which he served both as a volunteer and as chaplain. After the war he published a pamphlet sustaining the claim of Connecticut to the Susquehanna purchase, which influenced the decision of congress in her favor. Yale gave him the degree of D. D. in 1796. He published "Twelve Discourses on the Divine Origin of the Holy Scriptures" (Hartford, 1790); "General History of the United States of America" (3 vols., Boston, 1765-1810); and "Complete History of Connecticut from 1630 till 1713" (2 vols., Hartford, 1797). The manuscript collections from which this history is compiled are in the Yale library.—Benjamin's grandson, Lyman, senator, b. in Colchester, Conn., 12 Oct., 1813, began to teach at sixteen years of age, and at twenty was at the head of an academy in Georgia, where he studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1837. He removed to Belleville, Ill., and in 1841 was secretary of the state of Illinois. In 1848 he was elected one of the justices of the state supreme court. In 1854 he was chosen to represent his district in congress, but before his term began he was elected

Lyman Trumbull

U. S. senator, and took his seat, 4 March, 1855. Until that time he had affiliated with the Democratic party, but on the question of slavery he took a decided stand against his party and his colleague, Stephen A. Douglas, especially on the question of "popular sovereignty." In 1860 he was brought forward by some Republicans as a candidate for president. He had no desire to be so considered, and when his friend, Abraham Lincoln, was nominated, he labored with earnestness for his election. In 1861 he was re-elected to the U. S. senate, in which he did good service for the National cause, and was one of the first to propose the amendment to the Federal constitution for the abolition of slavery. He was one of the five Republican senators that voted for acquittal in the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, and afterward he acted with the Democratic party, whose candidate for governor of Illinois he was in 1880. Since his retirement from congress he has had a lucrative law-practice in Chicago.

TRUMBULL, James Hammond, philologist, b. in Stonington, Conn., 20 Dec., 1821. He entered Yale in 1838, and though, owing to ill health, he was not graduated with his class, his name was enrolled among its members in 1850, and he was given the degree of A. M. In 1842-'3 he assisted the Rev. James H. Linsley in the preparation of catalogues of the mammalia, reptiles, fishes, and shells of Connecticut. He settled in Hartford in 1847, and was assistant secretary of state in 1847-'52 and 1858-'61, and secretary in 1861-'4; also state librarian in 1854. Soon after going to Hartford he joined the Connecticut historical society, was its corresponding secretary in 1849-63, and was elected its president in 1863. He has been a trustee of the Watkinson free library of Hartford, and its librarian since 1863; and has been an officer of the Wadsworth athenæum since 1864. Dr. Trumbull was an original member of the American philological association in 1869, and its president in 1874-'5. He has been a member of the American Oriental society since 1860, and the American ethnological society since 1867, and honorary member of many state historical societies. In 1872 he was elected to the National academy of sciences. Since 1858 he has devoted special attention to the subject of the Indian languages of North America. He has prepared a dictionary and vocabulary to John Eliot's Indian Bible, and is probably the only American scholar that is now able to read that work. In 1873 he was chosen lecturer on Indian languages of North America at Yale, but loss of health and other labors soon compelled his resignation. The degree of LL. D. was conferred on him by Yale in 1871 and by Harvard in 1887, while Columbia gave him an L. H. D. in 1887. He has been a large contributor of articles to the proceedings of societies and to periodicals, notably on the significance of the word "Shawmut," the supposed Indian name of Boston (1866), the significance of "Massachusetts" (1867), and on the Algonkin name of "Manitou" (1870). His larger memoirs include "The Colonial Records of Connecticut" (3 vols., Hartford, 1850-9); "Historical Notes on some Provisions of the Connecticut Statutes" (1860-'1); "The Defence of Stonington against a British Squadron, August, 1814" (1864); Roger Williams's "Key into the Language of America" (Providence, 1866); "Thomas Lechford's 'Plain Dealing, or Newes from New England, 1642'" (Boston, 1867); "The Origin of McFingal" (1868); "The Composition of Indian Geographical Names" (1870); "The Best Method of studying the Indian Languages" (1871); "Some Mistaken Notions of Algonkin Grammar" (1871); "Historical Notes on the Constitution of Connecticut" (1872); "Notes on Forty Algonkin Versions of the Lord's Prayer" (1873); "On the Algonkin Verb" (1876); "The True Blue-Laws of Connecticut and the False Blue-Laws Invented by the Rev. Samuel Peters" (1876); "Indian Names of Places in and on the Borders of Connecticut, with Interpretations" (1881); and also edited "The Memorial History of Hartford County" (2 vols., Boston, 1886). The catalogue of Americana belonging to George Brinley was made by him at the time of the sale of the collection, 1879-'86, and gained for him the reputation of being perhaps the "most learned and acute bibliographer in America."—His brother, Henry Clay, author, b. in Stonington, Conn., 8 June, 1831, was educated privately and for a time studied in Williston seminary. In 1851 he removed to Hartford and engaged in railroad business, but in 1858 was appointed Sunday-school missionary for Connecticut, which office he held until 1862. He was commissioned to the 10th Connecticut regiment as a chaplain, ordained a clergyman of the Congregational church, and served until the close of the civil war, except during a part of 1863, when he was in prison in South Carolina and Virginia, having been captured before Fort Wagner. In 1865 he was appointed missionary secretary of the American Sunday-school union for New England, and in 1872 normal secretary of the same. He settled in Philadelphia in 1875, where he has since edited "The Sunday-School Times." During 1881 he travelled through Egypt, Arabia, and Syria, and while crossing the desert of Arabia Petraea located the biblical site of Kadesh Barnea on the southern boundary-line of Palestine, which had long been an object of research. He was Lyman Beecher lecturer at Yale in 1888. The degree of A. M. was conferred on him by Yale in 1866, and that of D. D. by Lafayette in 1881 and the University of the city of New York in 1882. His published books are many; the more recent have been republished in London, and include "Some Army Sermons" (Hartford, 1864); "The Knightly Soldier" (Boston, 1865); "A Useful Life and a Fragrant Memory" (Philadelphia, 1866); "Falling in Harness" (1867); "The Captured Scout of the Army of the James" (Boston, 1869); "Children in the Temple" (Springfield, 1869); "The Worth of an Historic Consciousness" (Hartford, 1870); "A Model Superintendent" (New York, 1880);

"Kadesh Barnea" (1884); "Teaching and Teachers" (Philadelphia, 1884); "The Blood Covenant" (New York, 1885); and "Yale Lectures on the Sunday-School" (1888).—Another brother, Gurdon, artist, b. in Stonington, Conn., 5 May, 1841, studied art under various teachers in Hartford, Conn., and also for a time under James M. Hart in New York. He is more successful in his paintings of fish, his best-known pictures being "Over the Fall," "A Plunge for Life," and "A Critical Moment." His last work in art was the illustration of Mrs. Annie Trumbull Slosson's "The China Hunters' Club" (New York, 1878). Of late years he has devoted himself principally to the study of ornithology, and has written "Names and Portraits of Birds which interest Gunners, with Descriptions in Language understood of the People" (New York, 1888).

TRUMBULL, John, poet, b. in Westbury (now Watertown), Conn., 24 April, 1750; d. in Detroit, Mich., 10 May, 1831. At five years of age, without the knowledge of any one but his mother, he began the study of Latin. In 1757 he passed his examination for admission to Yale, but, in consequence of his youth, he did not enter, and spent six years in study. He was graduated in 1767, and with his friend and fellow-student, Timothy Dwight, wrote papers in the style of the "Spectator," which they published in the Boston and New Haven journals in 1769. They became tutors at Yale in 1771, and Trumbull at the same time studied law, which he was licensed to practise in 1773. He published a poetical satire on the prevailing mode of education, entitled "The Progress of Dulness" (1772), adding the second and third parts a year later. In 1773 he entered the law-office of John Adams in Boston, and recorded his impressions of the spirit of freedom and resistance in an "Elegy on the Times," a poem of sixty-three stanzas on the port bill, and other colonial themes (Boston, 1774). He returned to New Haven in 1774, and, while practising law, wrote the first two cantos of "McFingal," a modern epic poem in Hudibrastic verse, in which he described the American contest and the character and customs of the times, and satirized the manner and extravagances of both his own countrymen and the British (Philadelphia, 1774). He married Sarah, daughter of Col. Leveret Hubbard, in 1776, and returned to Westbury, whence he removed to Hartford in 1781. He there completed "McFingal" (Hartford, 1782; 6th ed., London, 1793; new ed., with notes, Boston, 1826; revised and corrected, with notes by Benson J. Lossing, New York, 1860). Its popularity was great, and there were more than thirty pirated impressions of the poem in pamphlet and other forms. Two or three couplets of McFingal that still circulate as proverbs are generally credited to Samuel Butler, author of "Hudibras":

"No man e'er felt the halter draw,
With good opinion of the law," and,

"But optics sharp it needs, I ween,
To see what is not to be seen."

John Trumbull

After the peace, with David Humphreys, Joel Barlow, and Lemuel Hopkins, he wrote a series of essays that were designed to check, by the boldness of their satire, the then prevalent spirit of disorganization and anarchy. They were extensively copied in the newspapers, under the title of "American Antiquities, Extracts from the 'Anarchiad' and Other Papers." He became state's attorney for Hartford county in 1789, served in the legislature in 1792 and 1800, and in 1801-'19 was a judge of the superior court. In 1808 he received from the legislature the additional appointment of judge of the supreme court of errors, which he held till 1819. He was for several years treasurer of Yale, from which he received the degree of LL. D. in 1818. He removed to Detroit, Mich., in 1825, where he subsequently resided for six years.

TRUMBULL, Jonathan, patriot, b. in Lebanon, Conn., 12 Oct., 1710; d. there, 17 Aug., 1785. His ancestor came from England about 1639, and settled in Rowley, Mass., leaving three sons. His father, Joseph, was a merchant and farmer. Jonathan was graduated at Harvard in 1727, studied theology, and was licensed to preach, but in 1731 resigned the ministry to take the place of an elder brother in his father's store. He afterward adopted the profession of law, was a member of the assembly in 1733 and its speaker in 1739, became an assistant in 1740, and was re-elected to that office twenty-two times. He was subsequently judge of the county court, assistant judge of the superior court, and in 1766-'9 chief justice of that body. He was deputy governor in 1767-'8, and governor from 1769 till 1783, when he resigned. He refused to take the oath of office in 1765 that was required of all officials to support the provisions of the stamp-act. Bancroft says of him in this period of his career (1767): "He was the model of the virtues of a rural magistrate; profoundly religious, grave in manner, discriminating in judgment, fixed in his principles." His opinion was formed that if "methods tending to violence should be taken to maintain the dependence of the colonies, it would hasten separation," that the connection with England could be preserved "by gentle and insensible methods rather than by power and force." But on the declaration of war he threw his whole influence on the patriot side, co-operated with vigor in securing the independence of the colonies, and was the only colonial governor that espoused the people's cause. When Washington wrote to him of the weakness of his army in August, 1776, Trumbull convened his council of safety, and, although he had already sent out five Connecticut regiments, he called for nine more, and to those who were not enrolled in any train-band said: "Join yourselves to one of the companies now ordered to New York, or form yourselves into distinct companies, and choose captains forthwith. March on; this shall be your warrant. May the God of the armies of Israel be your leader." At these words the farmers, although their harvests were but half gathered, rose in arms, forming nine regiments, each of 350 men, and, self-equipped, marched to New York just in time to meet the advance of the British. In 1781, when Washington appealed to the governors of the New England states to "complete their Continental battalions," Trumbull cheered him with the words that he "should obtain all that he needed." He was the chosen friend and counsellor of Washington throughout the Revolution, who, says Jared Sparks, "relied on him as one of his main pillars of support, and often consulted him in emergencies." The epithet "Brother Jonathan," now applied as a personification of the United States, is supposed to owe its origin to Washington's habit of addressing Gov. Trumbull, and to the phrase that he often used when perplexed: "Let us hear what Brother Jonathan says." In 1783 he extolled Washington's last address in a letter to him dated 10 June of that year, as "exhibiting the foundation principles of an indissoluble union of the states under one federal head." In the next autumn, when he retired from public life after fifty years' service, he set forth to the legislature of Connecticut "that the grant to the Federal constitution of powers clearly defined, ascertained, and understood, and sufficient for the great purposes of the Union, could alone lead from the danger of anarchy to national happiness and glory." Washington wrote of him as "the first of patriots, in his social duties yielding to none." The Marquis de Chastellux, the traveller, who saw him when he was seventy years of age, describes him as "possessing all the simplicity in his dress, all the importance, and even all the pedantry, becoming the great magistrate of a small republic." Yale gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1779, and the University of Edinburgh the same in 1787. See his "Life" by Isaac W. Stuart (Hartford, 1857).—His son, Joseph, member of the Continental congress, b. in Lebanon, Conn., 11 March, 1737; d. there, 23 July, 1778, was graduated at Harvard in 1756, served in the Continental congress in 1774-'5, was commissary-general of the Revolutionary army from 19 July, 1775, till 2 Aug., 1777, and a commissioner of the board of war in 1777-'8, resigning in the latter year on account of the failure of his health. His services were highly eulogized in a report that was made to congress in 1779, and a commission on the sums he had disbursed was voted to his heirs.—Another son, Jonathan, statesman, b. in Lebanon, Conn., 26 March, 1740; d. there, 7 Aug., 1809, was graduated at Harvard in 1759, and for several years previous to the Revolution was a member of the legislature and speaker of the house. At the beginning of the war he entered the patriot army as a paymaster, and held that post till 1780, when he became aide-de-camp to Gen. Washington, with whom he remained until the peace. He was a member of congress in 1789-'95, having been chosen as a Federalist, was speaker of the house for the last four years of his service, and became U. S. senator in 1795, in place of Stephen M. Mitchell, who had resigned, but he himself resigned the next year to become lieutenant-governor of Connecticut. From 1798 until his death he was governor.—Jonathan's son, John, artist, b. in Lebanon, Conn., 6 June, 1756; d. in New York city, 10 Nov., 1843, entered Harvard at the age of sixteen, and was graduated the following year, 1773. As he has said himself, his "taste for drawing began to dawn early." While at college he studied Brooke Taylor's "Jesuit's Perspective" and William Hogarth's "Analysis of Beauty," and after returning to Lebanon he painted the death of Paulus Emilius at Cannæ. When the Revolutionary war opened, he joined signed and resumed his art-studies. His love for military life had not left him, however, and when, in 1778, a plan was formed for the recovery of Rhode Island from the British, he joined Gen. John Sullivan during the enterprise as volunteer aide-de-camp. In May, 1780, he sailed for France, whence, after a short stay, he went to London, with a letter from Benjamin Franklin to Benjamin West. He was soon arrested for treason, but after an imprisonment of eight months he was released, on condition of leaving the kingdom, West and John Singleton Copley becoming his sureties. When the close of the war enabled him to go again to England in January, 1784, he resumed his studies with West. He visited Paris in 1785, and there began the composition of his "Declaration of Independence." After a journey through the countries watered by the Rhine, he returned to London in the autumn of 1786. During this period he painted also his "Sortie from Gibraltar." A sketch on paper of this subject, now in the Boston athenæum, was made in 1787. A small picture of this he presented to West, and a second one he sold. A third, finished in 1789, was purchased by the athenæum at Boston. Another, also small, was painted for William Sharp to engrave from, and with the key in Trumbull's autograph is now in Philadelphia. In 1787 and 1789 he was again in Paris, where he painted the portrait of Thomas Jefferson. He was commissioned in the summer of 1790, by the corporation of New York city, to paint a full-length portrait of Washington, and in 1791 he executed a likeness of George Clinton. These are in the city-hall, New York. Another full-length portrait of Washington, representing him on the evening before the battle of Princeton, was painted for the city of Charleston in 1792. But, a picture of Washington as president being preferred, Trumbull executed a second. The first, now at Yale, was considered by the artist the best portrayal of him "in his heroic military character." He also executed in 1794 portraits of Gen. and Mrs. Washington, in the National museum, Washington, D. C. During this time he was also collecting a valuable series of portraits for his historical paintings. In May, 1794, he returned to England as secretary to John Jay, and in 1796 he was appointed fifth commissioner for carrying into execution the seventh article of the treaty of 1794. In June, 1804, he came again to the United States, settling in New York as a portrait-painter. At this time were painted the portraits of John Jay and Alexander Hamilton for the city of New York, and Timothy Dwight and Stephen Van Rensselaer, which are at Yale. In 1817 he was commissioned by congress to paint historical pictures for the rotunda in the capitol. The subjects were "The Declaration of Independence," "The Surrender of Burgoyne," "The Surrender of Cornwallis," and "The Resignation of Washington." The pictures were completed in 1824, and exhibited in various cities. They have been made familiar by engravings (notably the "Declaration," by Asher B. Durand), and have been the subject of much criticism. In 1816-'25 he was president of the American academy of fine arts. He subsequently projected a new series of historical pictures, but the paintings remained unsold. He was glad, therefore, to present his works to Yale, in return for an annuity of $1,000. In this final disposition of his works he made the condition that after his death the entire proceeds of the exhibition of the gallery were to be "perpetually appropriated toward defraying the expense of educating poor scholars in Yale college." A fire-proof gallery was erected by the college, and his pictures were arranged there under his own direction. On the completion of the new art-school building they were removed thither. He removed to New Haven in 1837, but in 1841 returned to New York, where he remained until his death. Trumbull's fame rests mainly on the four paintings in the capitol, the "Battle of Bunker Hill," and "Death of Montgomery," which two pictures still stand unexcelled in American historical painting, and on such strong portraits as those of Washington and Alexander Hamilton. The miniature likenesses in some of his pictures are at times more successful than his large portraits. His paintings comprise numerous copies, historical and scripture subjects, and portraits, including, besides those already mentioned, those of John Adams (1797); Jonathan Trumbull and Rufus King (1800); and Christopher Gore (1800). Several of his works, especially portraits, are in the New York historical society's rooms, the city-hall, New York, and other public institutions and private galleries, but most of them are in the gallery at Yale. There are five portraits of Trumbull—one by himself, painted in 1833, two by Samuel Waldo and Matthew H. Jouett, of which one is in the old gallery at Yale, beneath which he is buried, a good cabinet full-length by George W. Twibill, in the National academy, and one by Gilbert Stuart. A bust by Ball Hughes is at Yale. The most interesting account of Trumbull's life is found in his "Autobiography" (New York, 1841). See also Elizabeth B. Johnson's "Original Portraits of Washington" (Boston, 1882), and an article by John Durand, in the "American Art Review" for 1881. William Dunlap's account, though full, is prejudiced and unjust. Thomas S. Cummings, in his "Historic Annals of the National Academy," gives a full account of the part Trumbull played in opposing the formation of that institution.—A grandson of the first Jonathan, Joseph, congressman, b. in Lebanon, Conn., 7 Dec., 1782; d. in Hartford, Conn., 4 Aug., 1861, was graduated at Yale in 1801, admitted to the bar of Windham in 1803, settled in Hartford the next year, and practised his profession there till 1828, when he became president of the Hartford bank. He represented that city in the legislature in 1832-'48 and 1851, served in congress in 1834-'5, having been chosen as a Whig to fill the vacancy left by the resignation of William W. Ellsworth, and sat again in that body in 1839-'43. In 1849-'50 he was governor of Connecticut. Yale gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1849. He was active in fostering public internal improvements, and in many educational enterprises. During his later life he was president of a railroad company.

TRUSDELL, Charles Gregory, clergyman, b. in Montgomery, N. Y., 1 May, 1826. When he was eight years of age his father died, and the boy's educational advantages were limited to the common school and academy. In 1857, after working in mechanical and commercial pursuits, he felt called to preach. He ministered to Methodist congregations in Iowa, and in 1865 was appointed presiding elder of the Iowa City district. He was subsequently appointed pastor of the Grant place Methodist church of Chicago, where he preached till he was selected to superintend the distribution of money and other relief that was sent from all parts of the world for the sufferers of the great Chicago fire of October, 1871. That fund amounted to nearly $5,000,000. All of this and the many thousand dollars that are annually contributed by the people of Chicago for the relief of the deserving poor have been distributed, and a detailed account of the same kept under the direction of Mr. Trusdell as general superintendent of the Chicago relief and aid society. From 1 Oct., 1871, to 31 Oct., 1887, this amount was $6,486,999.45. In 1885 he was appointed presiding elder of the Chicago district of the Methodist church, and at the same time tendered his resignation as general superintendent, but it was not accepted.

TRUTCH, Joseph William, Canadian statesman, b. in Bath, England, 18 Jan., 1826. He was educated at Exeter, England, studied civil engineering under Sir John Rennie, removed to the Pacific coast in 1849, and till 1856 practised as a civil engineer in California and Oregon. He was subsequently assistant engineer on the Illinois and Michigan canal, and on the Illinois river improvement. In 1859 he removed to Victoria, British Columbia, and till 1864 was employed in the construction of public works for the colony. Chief among these were the section through the cañon of Fraser river, and the Grand Trunk railroad from Yale to Cariboo, including the Alexandria suspension-bridge over Fraser river. He was chief commissioner of lands and works and surveyor-general of British Columbia, and a member ex officio of the executive and legislative councils from 1864 till 1871, when British Columbia entered the Dominion. He was a delegate to Ottawa in 1870 to confer with the government of Canada as to the terms upon which British Columbia could enter the confederation, and in 1871 to Ottawa and London to settle finally the details of the arrangements for the union. Mr. Trutch was appointed, 5 July, 1871, lieutenant-governor of British Columbia, and on 9 Dec., 1879, he became resident agent of the Canadian government in British Columbia. In 1877 he was appointed a companion of the order of St. Michael and St. George.

TRUXTUN, Thomas, naval officer, b. on Long Island, N. Y., 17 Feb., 1755; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 5 May, 1822. He began a seafaring life when he was twelve years old, as an apprentice in the English packet "Pitt," and was impressed in England to serve in the frigate "Prudent," whence he obtained his discharge through friends. He declined the offer of a midshipman's warrant, served in the merchant marine, and quickly rose to command. In 1775 he had charge of the "Andrew Caldwell," in which he brought large quantities of powder to Philadelphia. In the latter part of that year he was seized off St. Kitt's by the frigate "Argo," and his vessel was condemned under the restraining act. He made his way to Philadelphia, where he arrived in time to enter on board the "Congress" as a lieutenant. This was the first private armed ship that was fitted out by the colonies. In 1776 several prizes were taken off Havana, one of which he took to New Bedford. In 1777 he aided in fitting out the ship "Independence," of which he took command and captured three large ships among other prizes off the Azores islands.

One of these was much more powerfully armed than his own vessel. On his return he fitted out the ship "Mars," twenty guns, and made a cruise in the English channel, capturing many prizes, which he sent to France. He then commanded the "Commerce" and other vessels, in which he brought needed cargoes of military stores for the army to Philadelphia. He had the ship "St. James" in 1781, and conveyed the U. S. consul-general to France, in this voyage disabling a British ship of thirty-two guns and returning with a valuable cargo. He was uniformly successful in all engagements with British vessels. After the war he commanded several East Indiamen. Upon the organization of the U. S. navy, he was selected as one of its six captains, 4 June, 1798, and assigned to command the frigate "Constellation," which was building at Baltimore. He was ordered with a squadron under his command to protect commerce in the West Indies, where he made numerous prizes. On 9 Feb., 1799, off Hen's island, he fell in with the French frigate "L'Insurgente," fifty guns, which was much more powerful than his own ship. An engagement ensued of more than an hour, when the enemy surrendered, a perfect wreck, after having twenty-nine of her crew killed and forty-four wounded. Truxtun lost one killed and two wounded. The prize was refitted and added to the navy. For this brilliant victory the merchants of Lloyd's coffee-house, London, sent him a present of plate worth 600 guineas. In January, 1800, he had a severe encounter with the French frigate "La Vengeance," fifty guns, which surrendered after a long engagement; but before Truxtun could secure the prize a squall came up and she escaped. For his gallantry in this action congress gave him a gold medal and a vote of thanks. In the same year he commanded the frigate "President" and a squadron of ten vessels in the West Indies. In 1802 he was appointed to command the squadron that was fitting out for the Tripolitan war, and went to Norfolk to join the "Chesapeake." He then asked to have a captain appointed to command the flag-ship, which was declined, and Truxtun's letter was construed to mean his resignation, which was accepted contrary to his wishes. He resided in New Jersey on a farm after he left the service, and subsequently removed to Philadelphia, where he was sheriff of the county in 1819-'21. The memory of Truxtun has been handed down in the navy as one of its most distinguished officers, and the brig "Truxtun" was named after him. He was the author of a work entitled "Remarks, Instructions, and Examples relating to Latitude and Longitude" (Philadelphia, 1794). Com. Truxtun had a large family, and eight of his grandsons were in the U. S. naval academy at one time.—His grandson, William Talbot, naval officer, b. in Philadelphia, 11 March, 1824; d. in Norfolk, Va., 25 Feb., 1887, entered the navy as a midshipman, 9 Feb., 1841, attended the naval academy for one year, and was graduated as a passed midshipman, 10 Aug., 1847. He cruised in the frigate "Brandywine" in 1847-'8 on the Brazil station, whence he returned in command of the prize-slaver "Independence." He served on the Pacific station in the ship "Supply" in 1849-'52, in the brig "Dolphin" in 1853 on special service in connection with laying the trans-Atlantic cable, and in 1854 with the Strain expedition to survey a route for a ship-canal across the Isthmus of Darien. He was promoted to master, 14 Sept., 1855, and to lieutenant the next day by action of the retiring board. He served in the brig "Perry" during the Paraguayan war in 1859-'60, and in the sloop "Dale," of which he succeeded in command in 1861, in the North Atlantic squadron, where he continued to serve throughout the civil war. He was promoted to lieutenant-commander, 16 July, 1862, and had the steamers "Alabama," "Chocura," and "Tacony" in succession. He participated in the operations in the sounds of North Carolina, in various engagements with the Confederate batteries, in the capture of Plymouth, N. C., and in both attacks on Fort Fisher. He was promoted to commander, 25 July, 1866, was superintendent of coal shipments for the navy in 1866-'7, commanded the sloop "Jamestown" in the Pacific squadron in 1868-'70 on a special survey, and was ordnance officer of the Boston navy-yard in 1871-'3. He was promoted to captain, 25 Sept., 1873, commanded the "Brooklyn," of the North Atlantic squadron, in 1873-'4, and the flag-ship of the South Atlantic station, 1874-'5. He was a member of the board of inspectors in 1876-'7, and served at the navy-yards at Boston and Norfolk in 1877-'81. He was promoted to commodore, 11 May, 1882, and was commandant of the Norfolk navy-yard in 1885-'6. He was promoted to rear-admiral by seniority, 18 Feb., 1886, but action on his nomination was delayed, and he was retired by law as a commodore, 11 March, 1886.

TRYON, Dwight William, artist, b. in Hartford, Conn., 13 Aug., 1849. He was a pupil during 1876-'81 at the École des beaux arts, and under Louis Jacquesson de la Chevreuse, Charles F. Daubigny, and Jean Baptiste Antoine Guillemet, in Paris. At the salon of 1881 he exhibited "Harvest Time in Normandy" and "On the Maas." Among his other works are "A New England Village," "A November Day," "Evening in Autumn," "Evening in a New England Village," "Starlight," and "Night." He was awarded gold medals at the American art association for his "Daybreak" in 1886, and "Moonlight" in 1887. He has been professor of art at Smith college, and director of the Hartford school of arts since 1885.

TRYON, George Washington, conchologist, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 20 May, 1838; d. there, 5 Feb., 1888. He was educated at the Friends' school in his native city, and then entered business, from which he retired in 1868. Thereafter he devoted his attention chiefly to his favorite study of conchology. He was an active member of the Philadelphia academy of natural sciences and began the movement in 1865 to devise methods for the erection of its present building. Through his liberality the conchological section contributed $3,000 to the work, and he gave an equal sum. In 1869 he was elected a curator of the academy, and under his direction the library and the numerous collections of the museum were arranged in the new building in 1876. He became conservator of the conchological section of the academy in 1875, and continued in that office until his death. The present condition of this large collection is due to his skill and labor, and he bequeathed money to preserve the shell specimens of the academy. Mr. Tryon was a member of various scientific societies, and edited in 1865-'71 the "American Journal of Conchology." He was a prolific writer on his specialty, and prepared numerous memoirs, including "On the Mollusca of Harper's Ferry" (1861); "Synopsis of the Recent Species of Gastrochaenidae" (1861); "Monograph of the Order of Pholadacea" (1862); and "Monograph of the Terrestrial Mollusks of the United States" (1865); "List of American Writers on Conchology" (New York, 1861); "Synopsis of the Species Strepomatidae" (1865). His larger works comprise "Land and Fresh-Water Shells of North America," including monograph on the genus Strepomatidae (4 vols., Washington, 1873); "American Marine Conchology" (Philadelphia, 1873); "Structural and Systematic Conchology" (3 vols., 1882); and "Manual of Conchology," including "Marine Shells," 9 vols., and "Land Shells," 3 vols. (1879-'85). With William G. Binney he edited "The Complete Writings of Constantine S. Rafinesque on Recent and Fossil Conchology" (Philadelphia, 1864).

TRYON, William, colonial governor, b. in Ireland about 1725; d. in London, England, 27 Feb., 1788. He received a good education, entered the British army, and served with credit as an officer. He married Miss Wake, a relative of the Earl of Hillsborough, secretary of state for the colonies, through whose influence he was appointed lieutenant-governor of North Carolina. He arrived there, 27 June, 1764, and on the death of Gov. Arthur Dobbs, 20 July, 1765, he succeeded him, and continued to administer the affairs of the colony till July, 1771, when he was appointed governor of New York. He suppressed the revolt of the "Regulators" in North Carolina, and treated the prisoners with great cruelty. At an expense of £15,000, which was voted by the assembly of that colony, he erected a magnificent residence at New Berne. He was detested by the patriots for his rigorous administration of the governments of the colonies over which he presided, and for the inhumanity he displayed on various occasions, especially for the destruction of Danbury, Fairfield, and Norwalk, Conn., by expeditions that he conducted in person. He resigned the governorship of New York, 21 March, 1778, and returned to England. He was made a colonel, 25 May, 1772; major-general, 29 Aug., 1777; lieutenant-general, 20 Nov., 1782; and colonel of the 29th foot, 15 Aug., 1783. He received the degree of LL. B. from King's college in 1774.

TSCHUDI, Johann Jakob von (choo' - de), Swiss traveller, b. in Glarus, 25 July, 1818. He studied the natural sciences and medicine in the universities of Neufchatel, Leyden, and Paris, and in 1838 sailed for Peru, where he sojourned five years, exploring the country and forming a rich collection of plants in the mountains of the interior. He went to Vienna in 1843, visited Brazil and other countries of South America in 1857-'9, and in 1860 was appointed minister of the Swiss republic to Brazil, which office he retained eight years, devoting most of that time to exploring the country and forming collections of plants for the museums of Neufchatel, Glarus, and Freiburg. In 1868 he was promoted minister to Vienna. His works include "Untersuchungen über die Fauna Perus" (St. Gall, 1844-'7); "Peruanische Reise-skizzen während der Jahre 1838-'42" (2 vols., 1846); "Die Ketchuasprache" (2 vols., Vienna, 1853); "Reise durch die Andes von Südamerika" (Gotha, 1860); "Die brasilianische Provinz Minas-Geraes" (1863); and "Reisen durch Südamerika" (5 vols., Leipsic, 1866-'9). He also edited, in association with Dr. Mariano Eduardo de Rivera, "Antigüedades Peruanas" (Vienna, 1851; translated by Rev. F. L. Hawks, New York, 1853).

TSONDATSAA, Charles, Indian convert, lived in the 17th century. He acted as guide to Father Brebeuf, and was converted to Christianity by that missionary. He was taken prisoner by the Iroquois in 1643, being one of the party that accompanied Father Jogues, but escaped to Three Rivers. He became the prop of the Christian religion among the Hurons, preached to them frequently, and made many converts. His pagan companions, on one occasion, induced him to enter an Indian vapor-bath. They then increased the heat, declaring that he must pronounce three words in favor of his titular demon if he would escape suffocation. He refused, and was almost dead when he was released. His only revenge on his torturers after he recovered was to say to them: "You nearly killed me, but you could not make me sin." He continued to labor for several years among his countrymen, and eventually converted nearly all his persecutors.

TUBMAN, Harriet, abolitionist, b. near Cambridge, Dorchester co., Md., about 1821. She was the child of slaves of pure African blood, whose name was Ross. Her original Christian name of Araminta she changed to Harriet. When about thirteen years old she received a fracture of the skull at the hands of an enraged overseer, which left her subject during her whole life to fits of somnolency. In 1844 she married a free colored man named Tubman. In 1849, in order to escape being sent to the cotton-plantations of the south, she fled by night, and reached Philadelphia in safety. In December, 1850, she visited Baltimore and brought away her sister and two children, and within a few months returned to aid in the escape of her brother and two other men. Thenceforth she devoted herself to guiding runaway slaves in their flight from the plantations of Maryland along the channels of the "underground railroad," with the assistance of Thomas Garrett and others. At first she conducted the bands of escaped slaves into the state of New York, but, when the fugitive-slave act began to be strictly enforced, she piloted them through to Canada. She made nineteen journeys, and led away more than 300 slaves. A reward of $40,000 was offered for her apprehension. Among the people of her race and the agents of the "underground railroad" she was known as "Moses." During the civil war she performed valuable service for the National government as a spy and as a nurse in the hospitals.

TUCK, Joseph Henry, inventor, b. in Dorchester, Mass., 12 March, 1812. He is a grandson of John Tuck, who was a chaplain in the Revolutionary army. Joseph was graduated at the Boston high-school, and afterward apprenticed to a watch-maker. He was subsequently employed in a candle-factory, where he brought to perfection his first invention, the endless wick. He went to England in 1837, began business as an engineer in London, and for twenty-five years was constantly engaged in the invention and introduction of improved machinery. He took out fifty-five patents in different countries. Among his inventions are a candle-machine, wrought-iron and bitumen gas- and water-pipes, a ventilating-machine, a dredging-machine, a rotary engine, a new system of breakwaters for harbors, and his steam-engine packing, the most profitable of his inventions. In spite of great opposition on the part of English engineers, he organized a company to lay the first submarine electric cable, between Dover and Calais, in 1848-'9. He derived no pecuniary advantage from this great enterprise, as he was defrauded of the profits by those whom he had aided in its promotion. He furnished plans for the excavation of the Suez canal, which were accepted by the contractors; but ill health forced him to abandon his connection with this enterprise, and he returned to the United States in 1865. His constitution had been so much injured by his long-continued and severe labors in Europe that he was forced to live in retirement for several years, but he engaged in real-estate operations in Brooklyn in 1869.

TUCKER, Henry Holcombe, clergyman, b. in Warren county, Ga., 10 May, 1819. He received his early education in Philadelphia, and entered the University of Pennsylvania in 1834, but finished his course in Columbian college (now university), Washington, D. C., where he was graduated in 1838. He then studied law, was called to the bar in 1846, and practised his profession until 1848, when he entered Mercer university with the view of preparing himself for the Baptist ministry. He was appointed pastor of the Baptist church in Alexandria, Va., in 1854, but feeble health compelled him to resign in less than a year. Since that time he has held no pastorate, but has preached in various parts of the United States. In 1856 he was elected professor of belles-lettres and metaphysics in Mercer university, which office he filled until 1862, when the university was for a time suspended by the war. In 1860 he received the degree of D. D. from Columbian university. He was elected president of Mercer university in 1866, and was principally instrumental in removing that institution from Penfield to Macon. He resigned in 1871, and spent a year in Europe, during which he assisted in the organization of a Baptist church in Rome, and officiated for several months in the American chapel in Paris. In 1874 he was elected chancellor of the University of Georgia, and he remained in this office until 1878, when he assumed the editorship of the "Christian Index" at Atlanta. He was the founder of the Georgia relief and hospital association, which rendered such great assistance to the sick and wounded of the south during the civil war. Besides a series of letters on "Religious Liberty" to Alexander H. Stephens (1855), which were the subject of wide comment, and several sermons, he has published "The Gospel in Enoch, or Truth in the Concrete: a Doctrinal and Biographical Sketch" (Philadelphia, 1868), and "The Old Theology restated in Sermons" (1884). One of his sermons, "The Position of Baptism in the Christian System" (1882), has been translated into Armenian, German, Greek, Spanish, Swedish, and Turkish. He is now editor and proprietor of the "Christian Index."

TUCKER, John, clergyman, b. in Amesbury, Mass., 19 Sept., 1719; d. in Newbury, Mass., 22 March, 1792. He was graduated at Harvard in 1741, studied theology, and on 20 Nov., 1745, was ordained as colleague minister of Newbury, Mass.

His theological opinions were Arminian, and in his controversies with Calvinistic clergymen he enlivened argument with wit and satire. The dissident members of his congregation seceded to join the Presbyterian society of which Jonathan Parsons was pastor. Mr. Tucker received the degree of D. D. from Harvard in 1787. Among his publications were "Four Sermons" (1756); "On the Doctrines and Uncharitableness of Jonathan Parsons" (1757); "An Account of an Ecclesiastical Council, to which is annexed a Discourse, being a Minister's Appeal to his Hearers as to his Life and Doctrines" (1767); and a Dudleian lecture at Harvard on "The Validity of Presbyterian Ordination" (1778).

TUCKER, Joshua Thomas, clergyman, b. in Milton, Mass., 20 Sept., 1812. He was graduated at Yale in 1833, and at Lane theological seminary, Cincinnati, Ohio, in 1837, became pastor of a Presbyterian church at Chester, Ill., in the latter year, then of one in Hannibal, Mo., in 1840, and in 1846 of a church in St. Louis, where in 1847-'8 he edited the "Herald of Religious Liberty." He took charge in 1849 of a Congregational church in Holliston, Mass., remaining till 1867, afterward preached in Chicopee Falls for ten years, and since 1877 has resided in Boston. He was editor of the "Boston Review," a Congregational magazine, in 1861-'8, also of the "Boston Recorder" in 1863-'4, and in 1871-'7 was an editorial writer on the Springfield "Daily Evening Union." The University of Iowa gave him the degree of D. D. in 1875. Dr. Tucker is the author of a life of Christ, entitled "The Sinless One, or the Life Manifested" (Boston, 1855), and "Christ's Infant Kingdom" (1870).

TUCKER, Josiah, English clergyman, b. in Laugharne, Carmarthenshire, Wales, in 1711; d. in Gloucester, England, 4 Nov., 1799. He was graduated at Oxford and ordained a priest of the English church. He was appointed curate of St. Stephen's church, Bristol, in 1737, soon afterward promoted to be a minor canon of the cathedral, and was made rector of St. Stephen's in 1749. In 1756 he was nominated prebendary of Bristol, and he became dean of Gloucester in 1758. Dr. Tucker was famous for his pamphlets on politics and political economy in the latter half of the 18th century, but especially for his views on the relations of the American colonies to the mother country. He held that a separation would be no loss to the latter, and that the English parliament should by solemn act separate the colonies from the parent government and disregard any application for restoration to the rights and privileges of British subjects until by humble petition they should ask for pardon and re-instatement. During the war he was frequently in conflict with Edmund Burke, who treated his views on the causes of the troubles between Great Britain and her colonies with little ceremony. In his pamphlets on political economy he anticipated some of the views of Adam Smith. His most noteworthy works are "The Elements of Commerce and Theory of Taxes" (Bristol, 1753); "Four Tracts, together with Two Sermons, on Political and Commercial Subjects" (Gloucester, 1774); "Treatise concerning Civil Government" (London, 1781); "Cui Bono?" (1782); and "Reflections on the Present Matters of Dispute between Great Britain and Ireland" (1775).

TUCKER, Luther, editor, b. in Brandon, Vt., 7 May, 1802; d. in Albany, N. Y., 26 Jan., 1873. He was apprenticed to the printer's trade when he was fourteen years of age, in Middlebury, Vt., and followed his employer to Palmyra, N. Y., in 1817. On the expiration of his service he travelled as a journeyman through the middle and New England states. In 1825 he entered into partnership with Henry C. Sleight in Jamaica, L. I., where they published standard works for New York houses. Later he removed to Rochester, and on 27 Oct., 1826, issued the initial number of the Rochester "Daily Advertiser," the first daily newspaper published west of Albany. The absence of any suitable agricultural reading early impressed itself on his mind, and on 1 Jan., 1831, he established "The Genesee Farmer," which met with considerable success. In 1839 he sold the "Advertiser," which is still continued under the title of the "Rochester Union and Advertiser." Meanwhile he had purchased a farm near Rochester and devoted himself to its cultivation and the management of his paper, but in 1839 he was induced to combine "The Cultivator" of Albany with his journal, and accordingly in 1840 the two in one were issued from Albany as "The Cultivator: a Consolidation of Buel's Cultivator and the Genesee Farmer." In 1853 he established "The Country Gentleman," weekly, with which "The Cultivator" was finally combined in 1866 under the united titles, and it is still published by Mr. Tucker's sons.—His son, Willis Gaylord, educator, b. in Albany, N. Y., 31 Oct., 1849, was graduated at the Albany academy in 1866, and at Albany medical college in 1870. A year later he became assistant in chemistry at the medical college, and he has since continued his relations with that institution, becoming full professor in 1876, and in 1887 professor of inorganic and analytical chemistry and toxicology. In 1881 he was one of the founders of the Albany college of pharmacy, and became professor of chemistry, in addition to which, since 1883, he has been its president. Besides the foregoing he was professor of chemistry at the Albany academy, the Albany female academy, and the Albany high-school in 1876-'87, and has been lecturer on chemistry at St. Agnes's school since 1874. He was appointed analyst to the state board of health in 1881, and still holds that office, and he has been registrar of the Albany medical college since 1882, secretary of its alumni association since its organization in 1874, member of the board of governors of Union university, and a member of the state board of medical examiners of the board of regents of the University of the state of New York. The honorary degree of Ph. G. was conferred on him by the Albany college of pharmacy in 1882, and that of Ph. D. by Union in 1882. He is a member of scientific societies, and has contributed largely to scientific journals and proceedings on chemical subjects. He was editor of the "Albany Medical Annals" in 1882-'7.

TUCKER, Mary Eliza, author, b. in Cahawba, Ala., 6 Nov., 1838. Her maiden name was Perine. She was educated at a boarding-school in New York, and, after her return to the south, married John M. Tucker, of Milledgeville, Ga. Her husband and her father lost all their property during the civil war, and she came to New York to procure a publisher for a volume of poems that she had written, and to obtain employment as a journalist. After struggling with poverty for a time, she was entirely successful, and became a regular contributor to the "Ledger" and other New York papers. Her first volume of "Poems" (New York, 1867) was strongly colored by the writer's southern sympathies during the war, but was marked by sincerity and pathos. "Loew's Bridge, a Broadway Idyl" (1868) also attracted much attention. She is the author of a "Life of Mark M. Pomeroy" (1868). In 1871 she married Col. James H. Lambert, of the Philadelphia "Press," and now resides in Philadelphia, where she has edited several journals.

TUCKER, Pomeroy, journalist, b. in Palmyra, N. Y., 10 Aug., 1802; d. there, 30 June, 1870. He was an apprentice to a printer in Palmyra, became a contributor to the Canandaigua "Messenger," and in 1824 established the "Sentinel" as a Democratic organ. He was elected to the legislature in 1837, and was for several years postmaster, and at one time a canal collector. His journal espoused the cause of free soil in 1848, and he was offered, but declined, a nomination to congress. He published a work on the "Origin, Rise, and Progress of Mormonism," containing biographies of the founders and a history of the church, with personal remembrances (New York, 1867).

TUCKER, Samuel, naval officer, b. in Marblehead, Mass., 1 Nov., 1747; d. in Bremen, Me., 10 March, 1833. He was the son of a ship-master, and when eleven years old ran away and shipped in the English sloop-of-war "Royal George." He had command of a merchantman in 1768, and made many voyages before the Revolution as a captain. When the war began he was in London, and narrowly escaped compulsory service in the British navy. He returned as a passenger in a ship that was owned by Robert Morris, and on the voyage took charge of the vessel during a violent storm. Mr. Morris then introduced him to Gen. Washington, who commissioned him a captain in the navy, 20 Jan., 1776, and assigned him to command the armed schooner "Franklin." While this vessel was fitting out he took command of a small schooner for a short cruise, and fell in with a British transport with troops and stores. After a desperate engagement for two and a half hours the transport surrendered. The stores were given to Washington's army, and arrived most opportunely. Tucker received the thanks of Washington and the army for this brilliant service. In March, 1776, he was transferred to command the schooner "Hancock," in which he captured two English brigs in Massachusetts bay on 17 April, the ship "Peggy" on 29 July, a brig and a brigantine on the following day, and the brig "Lively" on 29 Oct., 1776. He captured more than thirty vessels in the "Franklin" and "Hancock" in 1776. The list was destroyed, but the prizes included several armed vessels, and some of them were very valuable. On 15 March, 1777, he was appointed to command the frigate "Boston," in which he took out John Adams as minister to France in February, 1778. In June, 1779, after capturing five prizes on his return voyage from France, he conveyed a fleet of merchantmen from the West Indies to Philadelphia, loaded with clothing that had been bought in Holland for the American army. He was chased by the British frigate "Pole," but by a ruse obtained a commanding position and compelled the enemy to surrender, without firing a gun. He next cruised in the "Boston" with the frigate "Confederacy" also under his command, and captured several British privateers. In August, 1779, he sailed in company with the "Deane," under Com. Samuel Nicholson; both ships captured several prizes, and the "Boston" took the sloop-of-war "Thorn" alone. He sailed in the "Boston" in 1779 to join the squadron of Com. Abraham Whipple to assist in the defence of Charleston, S. C. The American squadron was captured by the British fleet on the surrender of Charleston, and Tucker was paroled, 20 May, 1780. He went to Boston, effected his exchange with Capt. Wardlaw, whom he had captured in the "Thorn," and obtained command of his former prize. He was highly successful on this cruise, and captured seven prizes. He endeavored to capture the enemy by stratagem whenever it was possible. In July, 1781, he was taken in the "Thorn" by the British frigate "Hind" off the mouth of St. Lawrence river. He and his crew were carried to Prince Edward island, where they were kindly treated. He was permitted to go in an open boat to Halifax with some of his officers, instead of which he went to Boston, notwithstanding the peril of the undertaking. Upon his arrival he wrote to the British commissary at Halifax saying he and his officers considered themselves on parole, as their escape was not strictly proper. The British officer accepted the apology for the escape, and also granted them their parole. After the war Tucker received a vote of thanks from congress for his services. The country was without any navy from 1785 till 1797, and Tucker commanded several packets between the Atlantic ports and Europe. In 1792 he removed from Marblehead to a farm near Bristol, where afterward was the town of Bremen, Me. In 1813 British privateers committed depredations on the coast of Maine, and the commodore was called on to command a schooner. Two brass cannon were borrowed from the fort at Wiscasset, and with improvised armament the schooner chased and captured a privateer after a desperate fight of two hours. The vessel proved to be the "Crown," with valuable stores, which Tucker distributed among the needy people of the district. After his retirement from the sea he served as selectman of the town of Bristol, was elected to the Massachusetts legislature in 1814-'18, and was a member of the convention to form a constitution for the new state of Maine in October, 1819, after which he was a member of the Maine legislature in 1820-'1. In 1820 he was a presidential elector. He had great difficulty in obtaining compensation for his services as a captain in the navy. His claim for pay was debarred by a statute of limitation, and in his old age he was in reduced circumstances, as he had been defrauded of the fortune that came to him from his immense prizes. In March, 1821, he was granted a pension of $20 a month from 1 Jan., 1818. In June, 1832, this was increased to $600 per annum. At the time of his death he was, excepting Gen. Lafayette, the highest in rank of surviving officers of the Revolution. See "Life of Commodore Samuel Tucker," by John H. Sheppard (Boston, 1868).

TUCKER, Sarah, Quaker preacher, b. in Portsmouth, R. I., in 1779; d. in 1840. Her maiden name was Fish. She was a minister of the Society of Friends for thirty-seven years. Her autobiography was published under the title of "Memoirs of the Life and Religious Experience of Sarah Tucker" (Providence, 1848).

TUCKER, Thomas Tudor, member of the Continental congress, b. in Port Royal, Bermuda, in 1745; d. in Washington, D. C., 2 May, 1828. He studied medicine, emigrated to South Carolina, and took the patriot side in the Revolution. He was a delegate to the Continental congress in 1787-'8, and sat in the first two congresses under the Federal constitution. From 1 Dec., 1801, till the time of his death he was treasurer of the United States. He published an oration that was delivered in Charleston before the South Carolina Society of the Cincinnati (Charleston, 1795).—His brother, St. George, jurist, b. in the island of Bermuda, 10 July, 1752; d. in Warminster, Nelson co., Va., 10 Nov., 1828, came to Virginia in 1771 to complete his education, was graduated at William and Mary in 1772, finished a course of law, and began practice in the colonial courts. In June, 1775, he returned to Bermuda, but he came again to Virginia in January, 1777, and bore arms in defence of the colonies, serving as lieutenant-colonel at the siege of Yorktown. In 1778 he married Frances Bland, mother of John Randolph. After the war he resumed the practice of law, was made a judge of the general court of Virginia in 1787, and in 1789 professor of law in the College of William and Mary, succeeding Chancellor George Wythe. He was appointed in 1804 president-judge of the Virginia court of appeals, and in 1813 judge of the U. S. district court of Virginia. He was a member of the Annapolis convention of 1786 that recommended the constitution by which the constitution was formed. He was a poet as well as a jurist. William and Mary college gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1790, and he left dramas—tragedy and comedy—and several minor poems, some of them gems. The one entitled "Resignation," beginning "Days of my youth," was highly praised by John Adams. "The Probationary Odes of Jonathan Pindar, Esq., a Cousin of Peter's, and a Candidate for the Post of Poet Laureate, to the C. U. S. In Two Parts," is the title of a volume of political satires by Judge Tucker (1796). He also published "Dissertation on Slavery, with a Proposition for its Gradual Abolition in Virginia" (1796); "Letters on the Alien and Sedition Laws" (1799); an essay on the question "How far the Common Law of England is the Common Law of the United States?" an annotated edition of Blackstone's commentaries (Philadelphia, 1803); and a "Commentary on the Constitution," as an appendix to the last-mentioned work.—Another brother was Dr. NATHANIEL, who, when very young, published a poem called "The Bermudian" (London, 1774).—A relative, George, philosopher, b. in Bermuda in 1775; d. in Sherwood, Albemarle co., Va., 10 April, 1861, emigrated to Virginia about 1787, and was educated under the direction of St. George. He was graduated at William and Mary in 1797, studied law, and practised in Lynchburg. He was a member of the Virginia house of delegates for some time, and was thrice elected to the National house of representatives, serving from 6 Dec., 1819, till 3 March, 1825. On retiring from congress, in which he occupied a prominent position as a debater and a constitutional lawyer, he became professor of moral philosophy and political economy in the University of Virginia, and filled that chair for twenty years. He contributed to many newspapers and magazines, wrote some of the papers in William Wirt's "British Spy," signing them "An Enquirer," was the author of "Letters on the Conspiracy of Slaves in Virginia" (Richmond, 1800); "Letters on the Roanoke Navigation" (1811); "Recollections of Eleanor Rosalie Tucker" (Lynchburg, 1819); "Essays on Subjects of Taste, Morals, and National Policy," by "A Citizen of Virginia" (Georgetown, 1822); "The Valley of the Shenandoah" (New York, 1824), a novel that was reprinted in England and translated into the German language; a satirical romance entitled "A Voyage to the Moon," under the pen-name of "Joseph Atterley" (1827); "Principles of Rent, Wages, and Profits" (Philadelphia, 1837); "Public Discourse on the Literature of the United States" (Charlottesville, 1837); "Life of Thomas Jefferson, with Parts of his Correspondence" (Philadelphia and London, 1837); "The Theory of Money and Banks Investigated" (Boston, 1839); "Essay on Cause and Effect" (Philadelphia, 1842); "Essay on the Association of Ideas" (1843); "Public Discourse on the Dangers most Threatening to the United States" (Washington, 1843); "Progress of the United States in Population and Wealth in Fifty Years" (New York, 1843); "Memoir of the Life and Character of Dr. John P. Emmet" (Philadelphia, 1845); "Correspondence with Alexander H. Everett on Political Economy" (1845); "History of the United States from their Colonization to the End of the Twenty-sixth Congress in 1841" (4 vols., 1856-'8); "Banks or No Banks" (New York, 1857); and "Essays, Moral and Philosophical" (1860).—St. George's eldest son, Henry St. George, b. in Williamsburg, Va., 29 Dec., 1780; d. in Winchester, Va., 28 Aug., 1848, was educated at the College of William and Mary, and became a lawyer, settling at Winchester, Va., in 1802. He was a volunteer officer in the war of 1812, served as a member of the U. S. house of representatives from 1815 till 1819, and in the Virginia senates from 1819 till 1823. He was appointed chancellor of the state in 1824, and served till 1831, when he was made president-judge of the Virginia court of appeals, which post he resigned in 1841, being then elected professor of law at the University of Virginia. This post he resigned in 1845 because of feeble health. He was tendered the attorney-generalship of the United States by Andrew Jackson, but declined. While he was chancellor he established a successful private law-school at Winchester. William and Mary gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1837. He published "Commentaries on the Law of Virginia" (2 vols., Winchester, 1836-'7); "Lectures on Constitutional Law" (Richmond, 1843); and "Lectures on Natural Law and Government" (Charlottesville, 1844).—St. George's second son, Nathaniel Beverley, b. at Williamsburg, James City co., Va., 6 Sept., 1784; d. in Winchester, Va., 26 Aug., 1851, was generally known by his second name. He was graduated at William and Mary in 1801, studied law, and practised in Virginia until 1815, when he moved to Missouri, where he was a judge in the circuit court till 1830. Returning to Virginia, he was elected in 1834 professor of law in William and Mary, which post he filled with signal ability till his death. As a writer he excelled any of his Virginia contemporaries. His most remarkable work is "The Partisan Leader: a Tale of the Future, by Edward William Sydney" (2 vols., New York, 1836; Washington, 1837). This was printed secretly, bearing the fictitious date 1856, and purported to be a historical novel of the events between 1836 and that year. In its accurate delineation of events between 1861 and 1865 it seems almost prophetic. It was reprinted with the title "A Key to the Disunion Conspiracy" (2 vols., New York, 1861). His other works include "George Balcombe," a novel (1836); "Discourse on the Importance of the Study of Political Science as a Branch of Academic Education in the United States" (Richmond, 1840); "Discourse on the Dangers that threaten the Free Institutions of the United States" (1841); "Lectures intended to Prepare the Student for the Study of the Constitution of the United States" (Philadelphia, 1845); and "Principles of Pleading" (Boston, 1846). He left an unfinished life of his half-brother, John Randolph of Roanoke. He wrote a great number of political and miscellaneous essays, and was a large contributor to the "Southern Literary Messenger," of Richmond, Va., and to the "Southern Quarterly Review." He corresponded with scholars and politicians, and the influence of his mind was felt by all such with whom he came in contact. —Henry St. George's son, Nathaniel Beverley, journalist, b. in Winchester, Va., 8 June, 1820; d. in Richmond, Va., 4 July, 1890, was educated at the University of Virginia, founded the Washington "Sentinel" in 1853, was elected printer to the U. S. Senate in December of that year, and in 1857 was appointed consul to Liverpool, remaining till 1861. He was sent by the Confederate government in 1862 to England and France, and in 1863-4 to Canada, to obtain commissary supplies. He went to Mexico after the civil war closed, was there till Maximilian's reign came to an end, then returned to the United States. He afterward resided in Washington, D. C., and Berkeley Springs, W. Va. —Another son, John Randolph, statesman, b. in Winchester, Va., 24 Dec., 1823, received his early education at a private school near his home, entered Richmond academy, and finished his studies at the University of Virginia, where he was graduated in law in 1844. He was admitted to the bar in 1845, and began the practice of his profession in Winchester. He was a presidential elector on the Democratic ticket in 1852 and 1856, was elected attorney-general of Virginia in May, 1857, to fill an unexpired term, and was re-elected in 1859 and in 1863. He was dispossessed of this office by the results of the war. He was elected professor of equity and public law in Washington and Lee university, Lexington, in 1870, and continued in this office until he was elected in 1874 to congress, of which he was a member till 1887. He was for a short time chairman of the ways and means committee, and was a member of that committee for eight years. He was chairman of the judiciary committee in the 48th and 49th congresses. Mr. Tucker is an orator of much power, and has taken an active part in the debates on the tariff, in opposition to the protective policy. His speeches on other questions include those on the electoral commission bill, the constitutional doctrine as to the presidential count, the Hawaiian treaty in 1876, the use of the army at the polls, in 1879, and Chinese emigration, in 1883. He delivered an address before the Social science association in 1877, and one in 1887 before the law-school of Yale, which in that year gave him the degree of LL. D. —Another son, St. George, was a lawyer by profession, and was clerk of the Virginia legislature. He joined the Confederate army, held a lieutenant-colonel's commission, and died from exposure in the seven days' battles around Richmond. He was the author of "Hansford: a Tale of Bacon's Rebellion" (Richmond, 1853); "The Southern Crop"; and the dedicatory poem of Washington's equestrian statue at Richmond. —Their kinsman, John Randolph, naval officer, b. in Alexandria, Va., 31 Jan., 1812; d. in Petersburg, Va., 12 June, 1883. He received his early education in his native city, and on 1 June, 1826, entered the U. S. navy as a midshipman. He became lieutenant, 20 Dec., 1837, served as executive officer on board the bomb-brig "Stromboli" during the war with Mexico, and participated in the capture of Tabasco and other naval operations. During the latter part of the war Tucker succeeded to the command of the vessel. On 14 Sept., 1855, he received his commission as a commander, and was ordered to take charge of the receiving-ship "Pennsylvania" at Norfolk. His next post was that of ordnance-officer of the Norfolk navy-yard. He resigned his commission on 18 April, 1861, after the passage by Virginia of a secession ordinance, and on 21 April was appointed a commander in the Virginia navy. On 22 April he was directed by Gov. Letcher to "conduct the naval defences of James river," but on 3 June he was ordered to the command of the steamer "Yorktown," which afterward became the "Patrick Henry." When Virginia joined the Confederate states, Tucker, with all other officers of the state navy, was transferred to the Confederate service with the same rank he had held in the U. S. navy. The "Patrick Henry" participated in the various conflicts in Hampton Roads, including the battle between the "Merri-mac" and the "Monitor" on 9 March, and on the 13th Tucker was placed in command of the wooden fleet. Soon after the repulse of the National squadron at Drewry's Bluff, in which his vessel took part, Tucker was promoted on 13 May, 1863, to the rank of captain, and ordered to Charleston, S. C., where he commanded the Confederate naval forces as flag-officer of the station. When Charleston was evacuated in February, 1865, Capt. Tucker returned to Drewry's Bluff, organized the naval brigade, and commanded it there until Richmond was evacuated, when he reported to Gen. Robert E. Lee, and was attached to Custis Lee's division of Gen. Ewell's corps, which formed the rear-guard of the Confederate army on the retreat from Richmond. In 1866 Capt. Tucker was appointed to the command of the Peruvian navy with the rank of rear-admiral. During the war between Peru, Chili, and Spain he commanded the combined fleets of the two republics. When that war ceased, his rank and emoluments were continued, and he was made president of the Peruvian hydrographic commission of the Amazon. His last service was the exploration and survey of the upper Amazon and its tributaries. In a short time he returned to Petersburg, Va., where he died.

TUCKER, Tilghman M., lawyer, b. in North Carolina; d. in Alabama, 30 April, 1859. He received a good education, studied law, and practised in Columbus, Miss. He was for many years a member of the legislature in one branch or the other, was governor of Mississippi in 1841-'3, and served a term in congress, which ended on 4 March, 1845.

TUCKER, William Jewett, clergyman, b. in Griswold, Conn., 13 July, 1839. He was graduated at Dartmouth in 1861, and in 1863, after teaching for two years, entered Andover theological seminary, where he was graduated in 1866. After a ministry of eight years in Manchester, N. H., where he became noted for the grace and eloquence of his sermons, he removed to New York city in 1875, and was pastor of the Madison square Presbyterian church until he entered on the professorship of sacred rhetoric at Andover seminary in 1879. He received the degree of D. D. from Dartmouth in 1875.

TUCKERMAN, Joseph, clergyman, b. in Boston, Mass., 18 Jan., 1778; d. in Havana, Cuba, 20 April, 1840. His father, Edward Tuckerman, a citizen of Boston, was one of the founders of the first fire insurance company in New England. The son was graduated at Harvard in 1798, where he was the classmate of William Ellery Channing, and room-mate of Joseph Story. He entered the Unitarian ministry in 1801, and first settled in Chelsea.

In 1826 he was appointed by the American Unitarian association minister at large in Boston. The remainder of his life was devoted to a scientific study of pauperism and the administration of charity. The philanthropy and practical wisdom that he brought to the work revolutionized the methods of dealing with the poor, and gained for him a great reputation. "To the system inaugurated by him," says Rev. Edward E. Hale, "Boston owes it that in every revulsion of business, or in any great calamity, her ordinary institutions of charitable relief have proved sufficient for whatever exigency." Justice Story declared that his work "entitles him to a prominent rank among the benefactors of mankind." In France his principles were adopted by the celebrated Baron Degerando. In England they resulted in the Tuckerman institute of Liverpool, and other associations that still survive. He visited England in 1833 and formed friendships with Lady Byron, Joanna Baillie, and others, with whom he maintained a constant correspondence. Harvard gave him the degree of D. D. in 1824. He published numerous discourses, tracts, and reports, chiefly in furtherance of the work in which he was engaged. His principal writings, under the title of "Elevation of the Poor," have been collected (Boston, 1874). See memoirs of Dr. Tuckerman, by William E. Channing, D. D. (Boston, 1841), and by Mary Carpenter (London, 1849).—His nephew, Henry Theodore, author, b. in Boston, Mass., 20 April, 1813; d. in New York city, 17 Dec., 1871, was prepared to enter college, but the condition of his health compelled a cessation of study, and in 1833 he went to Europe, where he remained nearly a year, passing most of the time in Italy. "The Italian Sketch-Book" (Philadelphia, 1835) was the fruit of his sojourn abroad. His academical studies were resumed on his return, but were again relinquished, and he made a second voyage to Europe in 1837, remaining abroad until the summer of 1839. This journey embraced a tour of Sicily and lengthened residences in Palermo and Florence. The literary outcome of this second trip was "Isabel, or Sicily: a Pilgrimage" (1839). With greatly improved health, he now devoted himself to letters, and was for years a regular and frequent contributor to periodicals. These writings were in due course collected and published at intervals. Scholarly taste, wide reading, and varied learning are displayed in these numerous compositions. The criticisms are well tempered and sympathetic; the sentiments are wholesome; the style, if perhaps lacking in vigor, is graceful, melodious, and refined. In the works that relate especially to art and artist life a command of knowledge and just appreciation are clearly exhibited. Mr. Tuckerman's prose writings are a valuable contribution to polite literature. The two volumes of poetry are not remarkable, though "Love and Fame," "Mary," and "The Apollo Belvidere" are still admired. He was much beloved socially, in virtue of grace of manners and irreproachable personal worth. He spent many summers at Newport, where a pleasant memorial of him, presented by his sister, may be seen in the "Redwood Library," consisting of a complete set of Mr. Tuckerman's writings in a beautiful ebony case. His works, besides those mentioned above, include "Rambles and Reveries" (1841); "Thoughts on the Poets," principally English (1846; German translation by Dr. Emile Müller, Marburg, 1856); "Artist Life, or Sketches of American Painters" (New York, 1847); "Characteristics of Literature" (Philadelphia, 1849; 2d series, 1851); "The Optimist," a volume of miscellaneous essays (New York, 1850); "Life of Commodore Silas Talbot" (1851); "Poems" (Boston, 1851); "A Month in England" (1853); "Memorial of Horatio Greenough" (New York, 1853); "Leaves from the Diary of a Dreamer" (1853); "Mental Portraits, or Studies of Character" (London, 1853; revised and enlarged as "Essays, Biographical and Critical, or Studies of Character," Boston, 1857); "Essay on Washington, with a Paper on the Portraits of Washington" (New York, 1859); "America and Her Commentators" (1864); "A Sheaf of Verse" (1864); "The Criterion, or the Test of Talk about Familiar Things" (1866); "Maga Papers about Paris" (1867); "Book of the Artists," a study of the rise and progress of art in America (1867); and "Life of John Pendleton Kennedy" (1871). See addresses by Henry W. Bellows and Evert A. Duyckinck (New York, 1872).—Another nephew, Edward, lichenologist, b. in Boston, Mass., 7 Dec., 1817; d. in Amherst, Mass., 15 March, 1886, was graduated at Union in 1837, and at the Harvard law-school in 1839, after which for two years he continued at Cambridge, pursuing studies in law, and taking a special course at the divinity-school. In 1841 he went to Europe for further study, and in Upsala met Elias Fries, who confirmed his fondness for botany. On his return in 1842, he made with Asa Gray a botanical excursion in the White mountains, and contributed to the "American Journal of Science" a paper descriptive of the plants that he had collected. He had previously published several papers on the New England lichens, giving the results of his individual experiences. In 1847 he took the A. B. degree at Harvard, having entered the senior class a year previous. He completed the course of study at the Harvard divinity-school in 1852. In 1854 he was appointed lecturer on history in Amherst, and until 1873 he continued to give instruction in that branch, during a part of the time filling the chair of oriental history. He was appointed professor of botany in 1858, which chair he then held until the end of his life, although during his later years he was relieved from class instruction. His botanical studies were various, but he made a specialty of lichenology, in which branch he had no superior in the United States. Prof. Tuckerman's papers on this subject number nearly fifty, and are devoted to descriptions of the lichens not only of New England, but of other parts of North America. Specimens collected by the U. S. exploring expedition, the Pacific railroad surveys, and later by the U. S. geological surveys, were referred to him for examination and classification. Early in life Thomas Nuttall dedicated to him the genus Tuckermania, one of the finest of California Compositæ, and several species have been named in his honor. Tuckerman's ravine, on Mount Washington, also bears his name. The degree of LL. D. was given him by Amherst in 1865, and he was a member of various scientific societies, among which were the American academy of arts

Mr. Tuckerman's prose writings are a valuable contribution to polite literature. The two volumes of poetry are not remarkable, though "Love and Fame," "Mary," and "The Apollo Belvidere" are still admired. He was much and sciences after 1865, and the National academy of sciences after 1868. Prof. Tuckerman contributed to the New York "Churchman," between 1834 and 1841, numerous articles, under the titles of "Notitia Literaria" and "Adversaria," on subjects in history, biography, and theology. He also contributed short articles on antiquarian topics to the "Mercantile Journal" in 1832, and in 1832-'3 he aided Samuel G. Drake in the preparation of his "Book of the Indians" and "Indian Wars." Besides his paper on botany, he edited "New England's Rarities Discovered," by John Josselyn (1860), and published "Genera Lichenum: An Arrangement of North American Lichens" (Amherst, 1872); "A Catalogue of Plants growing without Cultivation within Thirty Miles of Amherst College" (1882); and "A Synopsis of the North American Lichens" (part i., Boston, 1882). The second part of the last-named work, left by Prof. Tuckerman, has been issued, with an appendix, by Henry Willey (New Bedford, 1888). See "Memoir of Edward Tuckerman" (Washington, 1887), by William G. Farlow.—Edward's brother, Frederick Goddard, author, b. in Boston, Mass., 10 Aug., 1821; d. there, 14 May, 1877, entered Harvard in the class of 1841, and, leaving before he had passed through the entire course, went to the law-school, where he was graduated in 1842. He was admitted to the Suffolk bar in 1845. Mr. Tuckerman published a volume of "Poems" (Boston, 1860; London, 1863), and was a contributor to the "Atlantic Monthly."—Henry Theodore's brother, Charles Keating, author, b. in Boston, Mass., 11 March, 1821, was U. S. minister to Greece in 1868-'72, and since his retirement from that post has resided in Europe. He has edited A. R. Rangabe's "Greece: Her Progress and Present Position" (New York, 1867), and is the author of "The Greeks of Today" (1873); and "Poems" (London, 1885).—His son, Arthur Lyman, architect, b. in New York, 14 Sept., 1861, was prepared for his profession in Europe, and was appointed superintendent of the Metropolitan museum art-schools in 1888. Mr. Tuckerman has published a "History of Architecture" (New York, 1887).—Another cousin, Bayard, author, b. in New York, 2 July, 1855, studied in Europe, was graduated at Harvard in 1878, and has become a writer on historical and literary subjects. He is the author of "History of English Prose Fiction" (New York, 1882), and has in course of publication a "Life of General Lafayette."—Henry Theodore's cousin, Stephen Salisbury, artist, b. in Boston, Mass., 8 Dec., 1830, at first engaged in business, but subsequently studied drawing in Birmingham, England, and on his return to Boston became principal of the New England school of design. He went abroad again in 1860, and studied in Paris for a year. After this he taught drawing in Boston until 1864, when he devoted himself entirely to painting. Since 1872 he has worked chiefly abroad, and he has exhibited in London, Paris, and in Holland, as well as in his native country. He is noted especially for his marine views, among which are "Beach at Hastings"; "U. S. Frigate 'Constitution' escaping from the British Fleet in 1812," which is in the Boston museum of fine arts; and "Dutch Fishing-Boats Beaching in a Gale."—Stephen Salisbury's cousin, Samuel Parkman, musician, b. in Boston, Mass., 11 Feb., 1819, had his first instruction in music from Charles Zeuner, and was then for several years organist at St. Paul's church, Boston. During this time he published "The Episcopal Harp" (1844) and "The National Lyre" (1848), the latter with Silas A. Buncroft and Henry K. Oliver. He went to England in 1849, and the degree of Mus. Doc. was conferred on him by the archbishop of Canterbury in 1853. In the preceding year he had received a diploma from the Academy of St. Cecilia in Rome. After returning to the United States he lectured on sacred music, and gave performances of church music of the period from the 4th to the 19th centuries. He went again to England in 1856, and a third time in 1868, returning in 1879. As a composer he has given his attention chiefly to sacred music, and he has compiled "Cathedral Chants" (London, 1852) and "Trinity Collection of Church Music" (1864).

TUDOR, William, lawyer, b. in Boston, Mass., 28 March, 1750; d. there, 8 July, 1819. He was graduated at Harvard in 1769, studied law with John Adams, and was admitted to the Suffolk bar, 27 July, 1772, rising to a high rank in his profession. He was attached to Gen. Washington's staff in 1775-'8 as judge-advocate with the rank of colonel, was a member of both houses of the Massachusetts legislature, and in 1809-'10 served as secretary of state. Col. Tudor was vice-president of the Massachusetts Society of the Cincinnati in 1816, and delivered an address before that body. Among his other published orations is one that he delivered on the anniversary of the "Boston Massacre" (Boston, 1779), and one before the Massachusetts charitable fire society (1798). A memoir of Col. Tudor is printed in the "Collections" of the Massachusetts historical society, of which he was a founder.—His son, William, author, b. in Boston, Mass., 28 Jan., 1779; d. in Rio Janeiro, 9 March, 1830, was graduated at Harvard in 1796, became a clerk in the employ of John Codman, and visited Europe on business. On his return he was active in founding the Anthology club, and wrote much for its magazine, the "Monthly Anthology," during its publication in 1803-'11. In 1807 he was a founder of the Boston athenæum, which grew out of the club. In December, 1814, he projected the "North American Review," the first number of which appeared in May, 1815, under his editorship. Three fourths of the matter in the first four volumes were written by him. Mr. Tudor was for some time a member of the Massachusetts legislature, and he originated the present Bunker Hill monument. Hearing that the ground on which it stands was to be sold, he interested men of means in the purchase, and the work was begun by his suggestion. He was engaged in various European commercial transactions, and in November, 1805, as the agent of his brother Frederic, went to the West Indies, where he founded the ice trade with tropical countries. In 1823 he was appointed U. S. consul at Lima, Peru, and in 1827 he became chargé d'affaires in Brazil, where he negotiated a treaty. Besides his contributions to current literature and separate orations and addresses, he wrote "Letters on the Eastern States" (New York, 1820); "Miscellanies," from his contributions to the "Anthology" and the "North American Review" (1821); "Life of James Otis, of Massachusetts" (1823); and "Gebel Teir," an anonymous political allegory, written at Rio Janeiro (1829). He left valuable unpublished manuscripts.

TUFTS, Charles, donor, b. in Medford, Mass., 16 July, 1781; d. in Somerville (formerly a part of Charlestown), Mass., 24 Dec., 1876. He received a common-school education, inherited a large property in land, became a manufacturer and active business man, promoted the prosperity of his town, and added to his fortune by sagacious investments. He was a liberal friend of education, and gave the site and seventy acres of valuable land to found Tufts college, Medford, Mass. It stands on a site that was purchased in 1690 by Peter Tufts, the emigrant ancestor.

TUFTS, Cotton, physician, b. in Medford, Mass., 30 May, 1734; d. in Weymouth, Mass., 8 Dec., 1815. He was the grandson of Peter Tufts, who emigrated to this country in 1654 and died in Malden, Mass., in 1700, aged eighty-two. Cotton was graduated at Harvard in 1749, studied medicine, and settled at Weymouth, where he was highly esteemed as a physician. He was one of the original members of the Massachusetts medical society, its president in 1787-'95, and one of the founders of the Academy of arts and sciences. In 1765 he wrote spirited and patriotic instructions to the representatives of Weymouth against the stamp-act. He was a representative of the state and a councillor, for many years an active member of the state senate, and supported in the convention the adoption of the U. S. constitution.—His grandson, Quincy, b. in Weymouth, Mass., 4 July, 1791; d. there, 18 April, 1872, was a citizen of Boston, and distinguished for his liberality. He left by his will $10,000 to Harvard for the education of indigent students, $2,000 each to Amherst college and Atkinson academy, N. H., for a like purpose, $10,000 to the town of Weymouth for a free library, $10,000 to the Massachusetts general hospital for free beds; and about $40,000 to be distributed among the charitable institutions of the city.

TUFTS, John, clergyman, b. in Medford, Mass., 5 May, 1689; d. in Amesbury, Mass., August, 1750. He was graduated at Harvard in 1708, and was minister at Newbury, Mass., from 1714 till 1738. He published "Introduction to the Singing of Psalm-Tunes, with a Collection of Tunes in Three Parts" (Boston, 1715), and a sermon, "Humble Call to Archippus" (1829). His work on the singing of psalm-tunes was the first publication of the kind in New England, if not in this country, and was regarded as a great novelty, since not more than four or five tunes were known in many of the congregations, and those were sung by rote.

TUIGG, John, R. C. bishop, b. in County Cork, Ireland, in 1820; d. in Altoona, Pa., 7 Dec., 1889. He entered the missionary college, and, emigrating to the United States, finished his theological course in St. Michael's seminary, Pittsburg. He was ordained priest on 14 May, 1850, and placed as assistant pastor at Pittsburg cathedral, being also appointed secretary to the bishop. In 1853 he organized the congregation of St. Bridget and erected a church. He was transferred the same year to the mission of Altoona, where he founded a school, placing it under the Sisters of Charity, built a pastoral residence, and enlarged the church. He was also in charge of several other missions at the same time, and in 1869 was appointed vicar forane of the eastern part of the diocese. He then erected a new church, which was dedicated in 1875. He was consecrated bishop of Pittsburg, 19 March, 1876, and soon afterward made administrator of the diocese of Alleghany. Bishop Tuigg's constitution gave way under the labors that were entailed by the government of these two dioceses, and in 1882 he had three strokes of paralysis. Although his life was despaired of, he recovered, and resumed his episcopal duties. In 1888 the united dioceses contained 212 priests, 140 members of male religious orders and 726 of female religious orders, 14 ecclesiastical students, 133 churches and 44 chapels, 8 monasteries, 55 convents, 3 colleges, 6 academies for girls, an industrial school and reformatory, 3 orphanages, 2 hospitals, and 70 parochial schools, which were attended by 21,000 pupils.

TULANE, Paul, philanthropist, b. in Cherry Valley, near Princeton, N. J., in May, 1801; d. in Princeton, 27 March, 1887. He was the son of a French emigrant, a native of Tours, who was engaged in the lumber trade between Philadelphia and the French West Indies. The office of probate judge of Tours was held by members of his family for 150 years. Paul Tulane had no taste for books, but a marked talent for trade from early youth. In 1818 he made a tour of the southwest with a wealthy cousin and namesake, and in 1822 emigrated to New Orleans. It was a yellow-fever summer, and he went while the epidemic was at its height, because there were better openings then for young men. His first ventures were marked with success, and he soon engaged in a general supply business which proved lucrative. In the latter part of his business career this was narrowed down to a trade in clothing. Until 1856 he continued in active business in New Orleans with unvarying success. In 1840 he visited France to see his father, who pointed out to him the decadence of Tours and Bordeaux due to the emancipation of the West India slaves, and warned him of a like probable fate to New Orleans. In consequence, from this time Mr. Tulane began to transfer a large part of his estate to the north, but he continued his residence in New Orleans until 1873, when he permanently removed to Princeton, N. J. During his entire career in New Orleans he was looked up to as a man of great industry, sound judgment, and perfect integrity.

His mode of life was unostentatious, but he was a generous giver both to public and private charities, especially fore-educational objects. His affection for the city of New Orleans was strong and unwavering, and this took definite shape in an act of donation on 2 May, 1882, by which he conveyed his real estate in New Orleans to a board of seventeen administrators for the higher education of the white youth of Louisiana. This and subsequent donations aggregated about $1,100,000, and he avowed his purpose of dedicating a large part of the residue of his estate, amounting to about $1,000,000 more, to the same purpose; but, as he died intestate, it fell to his legal heirs. The Tulane education fund has been used to found the Tulane university of Louisiana at New Orleans, which has had a rapid and prosperous development, and is now the first institution in the south in endowment and number of students. (See illustration.)

TULLY, John, astrologer, b. in England, 9 Sept., 1638; d. in Middletown, Conn., 5 Oct., 1701. For twenty years, from 1681 till the time of his death, he was engaged in compiling almanacs, and was popularly known as the "New-England astrologer." The first publication of his almanac preceded William Bradford's by six years, and Benjamin Franklin's by half a century.

TULLY, William, physician, b. in Saybrook, Conn., 18 Nov., 1785; d. in Springfield, Mass., 28 Feb., 1859. He was graduated at Yale in 1806, and, after studying medicine in Philadelphia, settled in practice in Milford, Conn. Subsequently he removed to Upper Middletown (now Cromwell), where he became intimate with Dr. Thomas Miner, whose views on the nature and treatment of spotted fever he adopted. In 1824 he was called to the presidency of the Vermont academy of medicine in Castleton, Vt., where he also lectured on the theory and practice of medicine. He removed to Albany in 1826, and was associated with Dr. Alden March in the practice of medicine. In 1829 he settled in New Haven, where he was appointed professor of materia medica in the medical department of Yale, which chair he held until 1842, when he resigned. He removed to Springfield in 1851, and there spent the remainder of his life in poverty. Dr. Tully was distinguished as a botanist, and was regarded as one of the most learned and thoroughly scientific physicians in New England. He contributed to the medical journals of his time, and assisted in the revision of Webster's "Dictionary of the English Language" (editions of 1840 and 1847). With Dr. Thomas Miner he published "Essays upon Fever and other Medical Subjects" (Middletown, 1823), and he was the author of "Materia Medica, or Pharmacology and Therapeutics" (Springfield, 1857-'8).

TUOMEY, Michael, geologist, b. in Cork, Ireland, 29 Sept., 1808; d. in Tuscaloosa, Ala., 30 March, 1857. He came to the United States in his youth, and after an unsuccessful experience in farming was graduated at Rensselaer polytechnic institute in 1835. Subsequently he taught in Somerset county, Md., and also followed civil engineering. In 1844 he was appointed state geologist of South Carolina, and in 1847 he was called to the chair of mineralogy, geology, and agricultural chemistry in the University of Alabama. This professorship he held until his death, and in 1848 he was appointed state geologist of Alabama. The degree of A. M. was conferred on him, and he was a member of the Boston society of natural history and of the American association for the advancement of science. His published reports include "Geological and Agricultural Survey of the State of South Carolina" (Columbia, 1844); "Report on the Geology of South Carolina" (1848); "First Biennial Report on the Geology of Alabama" (Tuscaloosa, 1850); "Geological Map of Alabama" (1853); and "Second Biennial Report of the Geology of Alabama," edited by John W. Mallett (Montgomery, 1858). With Francis S. Holmes he issued "Fossils of South Carolina" (10 parts, Charleston, 1855-'7).

TUPAC-AMARU (too'-pak-ah'-mah-roo), member of the Peruvian inca family, b. in Cuzco about 1540; d. there in 1573. He was the second son of Manco Inca Yupanqui, who, after the execution of Atahualpa, had been recognized by Pizarro as successor to the throne. After his father's death the eldest son, Sayri-Tupac, submitted to the Spanish rule, and was baptized and rewarded by a tract of land and an Indian commandery at Urubamba; but Tupac-Amaru refused to renounce his family claims, and retired to the mountains of Vilcabamba. When Sayri-Tupac died, the family claims devolved upon Tupac-Amaru, and as the Indians recognized him as the legitimate successor to the throne of the incas, the viceroy, Francisco de Toledo, resolved to capture the prince. In 1572, under pretext of sending auxiliaries to Chili, he ordered 250 men to march against the district of Vilcabamba, where they began hostilities against Tupac-Amaru. The latter resisted in self-defence, and, after he had been defeated several times, and his means of subsistence had been cut off, fled with his family and some followers to the mountain-fastnesses, where he thought himself secure. But receiving notice of his retreat, Capt. Martin de Loyola, with twenty men, crossed at night the mountain-stream that defended the inca's retreat, and captured the camp by surprise, carrying the unhappy prince with his family as prisoners to Cuzco. There the judge, Gabriel Loarte, by the viceroy's order, began a criminal process against Tupac, under the pretext that he had incited an armed revolt, and he was condemned to death and beheaded at Cuzco, while his children were transported as prisoners to Spain.—The name TUPAC-AMARU II. was adopted by Jose Gabriel Condorcanqui, who, claiming to be a lineal descendant of the incas, raised a rebellion against the Spaniards in 1780, and was executed in 1781.

TUPAC INCA YUPANQUI (too-pak-ing-kah-yoo-pang'-ke), eleventh inca of Peru, b. in Cuzco about 1420; d. there in 1483. He was a son of the inca Yupanqui and Mama Chimpū Oello, and succeeded his father on the throne in 1453, beginning his reign by visiting the different provinces of his empire, in which undertaking he spent four years.

After gathering an army of more than 40,000 men at Cajamarca, he conquered the territories of Moyabamba, Chachapoyas, Ayabaca, and Huancabamba, and, on his return to Cuzco, completed the construction of the famous fortress of Saesahuana, which had been begun under the reign of his father.

Some years afterward he marched again to the conquest of the northern tribes and subjugated Huanuco and the Cañari territory. In his old age he sent another army northward, but remained in Cuzco, giving the command to his eldest son, Huayna Capac, who conquered Quito and Pasto, and by whom he was succeeded.

TUPPER, Benjamin, soldier, b. in Stoughton, Mass., in August, 1738; d. in Marietta, Ohio, in June, 1792. He served as a soldier in the French war of 1756-'63, and afterward taught. Soon after the battle of Lexington he was a major at Boston, and distinguished himself in a boat expedition at Castle island, Boston harbor. He became a lieutenant-colonel, 4 Nov., 1775, colonel of the 11th Massachusetts early in 1776, and in August of the same year commanded the gun-boats and galleys on the North river. He served under Gen. Horatio Gates at Saratoga, was at the battle of Monmouth in 1778, and was brevetted a general before the close of the war. With Gen. Rufus Putnam he originated the Ohio land company, was appointed in 1785 surveyor of Ohio lands, and served against Shays's rebellion in 1786. He settled at Marietta, Ohio, in 1787, and became a judge in 1788.—His son, EDWARD W., was a brigadier-general of Ohio volunteers, and served under Gen. Harrison in 1812. He died at Gallipolis, Ohio, in 1823.

TUPPER, Charles, clergyman, b. in Cornwallis, Nova Scotia, 6 Aug., 1794; d. in Aylesford, N. S., 19 Jan., 1881. He was ordained to the work of the Baptist ministry, 17 July, 1817, and was editor of the "Baptist Magazine" in 1832-'6. He was a liberal contributor to the press during the sixty-three years of his ministry, and gained a reputation for scholarly attainments. In 1859 he had read critically the whole Bible in eight languages and the New Testament in ten. Among his published writings are "Scriptural Baptism" (Halifax, N. S., 1850) and "Expository Notes on the Syriac Version of the Scriptures."—His son, Sir Charles, Canadian statesman, b. in Amherst, Nova Scotia, 2 July, 1821, was educated at various private and public schools, and at Horton academy, Wolfville, N. S. He studied medicine in Nova Scotia, and subsequently in Edinburgh university, where he gained the highest honors, and in 1843 became a fellow of the Royal college of surgeons, immediately returned home, began to practise in his native town, and soon stood at the head of his profession, and was president of the Canadian medical association from its formation in 1857 till 1870. He was a Conservative in politics, but took no active part in public matters until 1855, when he was elected to the provincial legislature for the county of Cumberland, his opponent being Joseph Howe, a Liberal. At once Tupper took a marked position in the legislature, and when in 1856 the Johnston cabinet was formed he became provincial secretary of Nova Scotia, serving till 1860, and identified himself with such measures as the abolition of the monopoly in mines and minerals, representation by population, and consolidation of the jury law. In 1858 he went to England on a mission connected with the Intercolonial railway, and while in that country he approached several statesmen on the subject of confederation of the British North American provinces. In 1864 Dr. Tupper became prime minister of Nova Scotia, which post he held until 1867. During those three years he passed the free-school law, which is still in operation in Nova Scotia. In 1864 Dr. Tupper was the active spirit in the maritime union movement, and he went with his fellow-delegates to the conference at Charlottetown, Prince Edward island, where he took a noteworthy part in the discussions that followed. Later in the year he went to the conference at Quebec, where a broader scheme was debated, and where it was decided to unite Upper and Lower Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick in one dominion, Prince Edward island declining to enter the compact. Dr. Tupper was also a member of the conference that met in London in 1866-'7, where the terms of union were settled in detail. In London Dr. Tupper carried on a vigorous contest with Joseph Howe, who, abandoning the "dream of his boyhood"—confederation—had become chief of the Nova Scotia anti-Confederates. Howe was answered by the pamphlets and speeches that he himself had published in former years, and his famous pamphlet, "Confederation, Considered in Relation to the Interests of the Empire," found its principal questioner in Tupper's "Letter to the Earl of Carnarvon" (London, 1866). Dr. Tupper was created a companion of the Bath (civil) in 1867. Owing to press of duties, he declined re-election. Sir John A. Macdonald, in forming his first Canadian ministry, offered Dr. Tupper a portfolio; but he declined it, and sat in the commons as a private member until June, 1870, when he entered the cabinet as president of the council. In 1868 he declined the chairmanship of the Intercolonial railway, and in the same year, in behalf of the Dominion government, he went to London to oppose Mr. Howe, who had gone there to urge the imperial authorities to grant Nova Scotia permission to leave the confederacy. In 1872 Tupper became minister of inland revenue, which office he relinquished in the following year to assume the department of customs, holding it till November, when the Conservatives passed out of power. In January, 1874, Tupper was elected by his old constituents for the ninth time. In 1878 he organized the canvass for the coming elections, the "National policy"—protection to native industries—proving his strongest battle-cry. The contest resulted in a return of Sir John A. Macdonald to power, and in October Dr. Tupper took office as minister of public works. This portfolio he held until the passing of the act to divide that department in 1879, after which he was minister of railways and canals until 24 May, 1884. On 24 May, 1879, he was created a knight of the order of St. Michael and St. George by the Marquis of Lorne, acting in behalf of the queen. In 1880 Sir Charles visited England with Sir John A. Macdonald and John H. Pope for the purpose of negotiating for the construction of the Canadian Pacific railway, the result being that the compact was ratified by parliament, and most of the subsequent acts that led to the completion of the road were introduced by him. In 1883, while yet minister of railways, Sir Charles was appointed high commissioner for Canada in London. The question arising as to the legality of his holding both posts at the same time, an act was passed in parliament relieving him from penalties under the independence of parliament act. At the close of the session Sir Charles resigned his seat in the cabinet and went to London to resume his duties as high commissioner. He received a diploma of honor for special services in connection with the international fisheries exhibition in London, and holds a patent of rank and precedence from the queen as an ex-councillor of Nova Scotia. Party exigency soon demanded his return, and in response to the call of his chief he re-entered active politics, becoming a member of the house of commons for Cumberland county, and minister of finance, his appointment bearing date 27 Jan., 1887. He was appointed executive commissioner for Canada at the international exhibition at Antwerp in 1885, and at the colonial and Indian exhibition at London in 1886. In January, 1886, he received the grand cross of the order of St. Michael and St. George, and in 1887 he was appointed by the imperial government a commissioner to negotiate a treaty with the government of the United States in relation to the Canadian fisheries, his colleagues being Sir Lionel Sackville-West, British minister at Washington, and the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain. The commissioners concluded their labors in February, 1888. He carried a bill through the Canadian parliament for the ratification of the treaty, where it was passed in both houses without division. Sir Charles Tupper performed the duties of finance minister of Canada until 25 May, 1888, when he resigned his office and seat in the house of commons and returned to London as high commissioner for Canada. This post he still (1889) holds. His county has regularly returned him to parliament fourteen times. Sir Charles has identified himself with all the chief measures of the government, and has been instrumental in carrying through parliament the act prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in the northwest territories, the consolidation railway act of 1879, the act granting a charter to the Canadian Pacific railway company in 1881, the act of 1884 granting a loan to that company, the railway subsidies acts of 1883-'4, the act of 1884 respecting an agreement between the province of British Columbia and the Dominion of Canada, and the customs act of 1887, inaugurating a policy of protection and promotion of the manufacture of iron and steel. In 1862 he was appointed by act of parliament a governor of Dalhousie college, Halifax, and received the degree of D. C. L. from Acadia college, N. S., in 1882, and from Cambridge in 1886. On 29 Aug., 1888 Sir Charles was created a baronet of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, for services in connection with the fisheries treaty at Washington.—His son, Charles Hibbert, b. in Amherst, Nova Scotia, 3 Aug., 1855, was educated at McGill college university, Montreal, and at Harvard. In 1878 he was called to the bar of Nova Scotia, and entered politics for the first time in the Liberal-Conservative interest in June, 1882, when he was elected to the house of commons for the county of Pictou. In June, 1888, he was sworn as a member of the privy council of Canada, and invited by Sir John A. Macdonald to enter his government as minister of marine and fisheries. On presenting himself for re-election he was returned by acclamation.

TUPPER, Henry Allen, clergyman, b. in Charleston, S. C., 29 Feb., 1828. His father, Tristram, a merchant of Charleston, was at one time president of the South Carolina railroad. The son was educated in part at Charleston college, and was graduated at Madison university, N. Y., in 1848, and at its theological seminary in 1850. Having entered the ministry, he became, after three years' service in Graniteville, S. C., pastor of the Baptist church at Washington, Ga., in which relation he continued for nearly twenty years. During the civil war he was chaplain of the 9th Georgia regiment of the Confederate army. In 1872 he was made corresponding secretary of the Foreign missionary board of the Southern Baptist convention, with his residence in Richmond, Va. He still (1889) holds this office, and is a trustee of Richmond college. In 1870 Madison university conferred on him the degree of D. D. Besides various published sermons and addresses, Dr. Tupper is the author of "The First Century of the First Baptist Church of Richmond, Va." (Philadelphia, 1880), "Foreign Missions of the Southern Baptist Convention" (1880); and "Truth in Romance" (Baltimore, 1887).

TURCHIN, John Basil, or Ivan Vasilevitch Turchininoff, soldier, b. in the province of Don, Russia, 30 Jan., 1822. He entered the artillery-school at St. Petersburg in 1836, was graduated in 1841, and entered the horse-artillery service as an ensign. He participated in the Hungarian campaign, in 1849 entered the military academy for officers of the general staff, was graduated in 1852, and was assigned to the staff of the Imperial guards. During the Crimean war he was promoted till he reached the grade of colonel, was senior staff-officer of the active corps, and prepared the plan that was adopted for the defence of the coast of Finland. He came to the United States in 1856, and was employed in the engineer department of the Illinois Central railroad company until 19 June, 1861, when he was appointed colonel of the 19th Illinois volunteers. He served with his regiment in Missouri, Kentucky, and Alabama, where he took an active part in the capture of Huntsville and Decatur. He was promoted to be a brigadier-general of volunteers, 17 July, 1862, served in the cavalry of the Army of the Cumberland, and resigned, 10 Oct., 1864. After the close of the war he was a solicitor of patents in Chicago till 1870, for the next three years was employed as a civil engineer, and in 1873 he established the Polish colony of Radone, in Washington county, Ill., where he now (1889) resides on a farm. He is an occasional contributor of scientific and military articles to periodicals. In January, 1865, he wrote "Military Rambles," a series of criticisms, issued monthly at Chicago, and he has also published "The Campaign and Battle of Chickamauga" (Chicago, 1888).

TURCOTTE, Joseph Edouard, Canadian member of parliament, b. in Nicolet in 1808; d. in Three Rivers, 20 Dec., 1864. He was admitted to the bar of Lower Canada in 1834, and was an unsuccessful candidate for the legislative assembly of Canada for the county of Nicolet, but afterward represented various constituencies in that body for many years. After having been solicitor-general, he was in 1862 elected speaker of the legislative assembly of Canada. Mr. Turcotte was noted for his eloquence as a parliamentary speaker. He was mainly instrumental in securing the construction of the Arthabasca branch railroad, planned a railway to connect the Grand piles on St. Maurice river with Three Rivers, and was an active agent in establishing the Radnor iron-works in the district of Three Rivers.—His son, Henry René Arthur, b. in Montreal, Canada, 19 Jan., 1846, was educated at the Jesuit's college in Montreal and at Stonyhurst college, England. He was admitted to the bar of Quebec in June, 1867, and was appointed queen's counsel in 1879. He has been mayor of Three Rivers, was speaker of the legislative assembly of the province of Quebec from 4 June, 1878, till December, 1881, and was appointed a member of the executive council, 29 Jan., 1887. He carried through several measures amending the civil code and simplifying legal procedure.

TURELL, Ebenezer, clergyman, b. in Boston, Mass., 5 Feb., 1702; d. in Medford, Mass., 8 Dec., 1778. He was graduated at Harvard in 1721, and was minister of Medford, Mass., from 25 Nov., 1724, till his death. He was eminent as a preacher and patriot. Mr. Turell published "Sermon at the Ordination of Rev. S. Cook" (Boston, 1740); "Dialogue About the Times" (1742); and "Life and Character of the Rev. Benjamin Colman" (1749); and he also collected and published poems by his wife, with a memoir of her (Boston, 1735). A tract of his on "Witchcraft" is in the "Massachusetts Historical Collections."—His wife, Jane, daughter of Rev. Benjamin Colman, b. in Boston, Mass., 25 Feb., 1708; d. in Medford, Mass., 26 March, 1735, displayed precocious mental powers at an early age, wrote poetry at eleven, and on 11 Aug., 1726, married Mr. Turell. She afterward wrote eulogies on Sir Richard Blackmore's works, and on "The Incomparable Mr. Waller," "An Invitation into the Country in Imitation of Horace," and some prose articles. Her poems were collected and published by her husband, with a memoir of her life (Boston, 1735). A notice of her by Prof. John Wilson will be found in his "Noctes Ambrosianæ" (5 vols., New York, 1854).

TURGEON, Pierre Flavian, R. C. archbishop of Quebec, b. in Quebec, Canada, 12 Nov., 1787; d. there, 25 Aug., 1867. From 1808 till 1820 he was secretary to Bishop Joseph Octave Plessis, and on 29 April, 1810, was ordained priest. For many years he taught in the Seminary of Quebec until he became, by appointment and bulls of Pope Gregory XVI., bishop and coadjutor of the archbishop of Quebec. He was consecrated, under the title of Sidyme in Quebec, on 11 May, 1834. In 1849-'50 he was administrator of the diocese, and in the latter year became archbishop, and was vested with the pallium on 11 June, 1851. He resigned his office in 1855, owing to impaired health.

TURGOT, Anne Robert Joseph (toor-go), Baron de l'Aulne, French statesman, b. in Paris, 10 May, 1727; d. there, 20 March, 1781. He studied for the church and was prior of Sorbonne in 1749, but resigned in 1751, was made deputy attorney-general and councillor in the parliament of Paris in 1752, a master of the tribunal of the requests in 1753, and intendant of Limousin in 1761. He made many improvements in the administration of that province, and was named, 20 July, 1774, secretary of the navy. During his short administration he devised a plan that afterward gave a vigorous impulse to the prosperity of the French colonies in America. On 24 Aug., 1774, he succeeded Abbé Terray as comptroller of the finances. He set immediately to work to reform abuses and put France upon a sound financial basis. He found the greatest opposition at court and in the king's council to carrying on his proposed reforms that might have averted the revolution of 1789, and there were riots in Paris and other cities in May, 1775. Louis XVI., who said, "Only M. Turgot and I love the people," held a levee of justice at the parliament of Paris, 12 May, 1776, and obliged that body to register Turgot's edicts on finance. The Count d'Artois, Louis XVI.'s aunts, and Count de Maurepas secured Turgot's dismissal, 12 May, 1776, and he retired to Paris, where he devoted himself to philosophical labors. Owing to his friendship for Benjamin Franklin and his love for the cause of freedom, he was in part instrumental in 1778 in bringing about the treaty of alliance with the United States, and composed, at the request of Richard Price, with whom he corresponded to the last, "Réflexions sur la situation des Américains des États-Unis" (Paris, 1779). At the request of Franklin he wrote "Traité des vrais principes de l'imposition" (1780). Turgot's principal works are "Lettre sur le papier monnaie" (1745); "Sur la tolérance" (1752); "Réflexions sur la formation et la distribution des richesses" (1771); and "Sur la liberté du commerce des grains" (1772). His life has been written by the Marquis de Condorcet (London, 1786), and his complete works were edited by Pierre Samuel Dupont de Nemours (9 vols., Paris, 1808-'11).

TURGOT, Etienne François (toor'-go), Marquis de Coismont, French statesman, b. in Paris, 2 June, 1721; d. there, 21 Oct., 1789. After serving for some time with the Knights of Malta, he was created on his return to France in 1764 brigadier of the armies of the king. He made a proposal to the French minister, Choiseul, to regenerate the colony of Cayenne by establishing in Guiana a new settlement under the name of "France équinoxiale," strong enough to resist, without any aid from the mother country, an attack from any quarter, and even to give succor to the other American colonies in case of need. Turgot expected that such a colony, if successful, would counterbalance the recent loss of Canada. The plan was adopted, and Turgot received the title of governor-general of French Guiana; but the measures for its execution were badly carried out, the colonists perished in crowds, and loud complaints met him on his arrival as to the oppression of the intendant of the new colony, Chauvallon. He arrested the latter and sent him a prisoner to France. Turgot remained about four months, during which he made fruitless efforts to remedy the evils that preyed on the settlement. His health failed him, and he was forced to return to France, where he confirmed the reports that had already reached the government that it was impossible to realize the projects so lightly adopted in such a country as Guiana. He was for some time imprisoned on the complaint of Chauvallon, and, on his release, lived in retirement. He wrote several works, memoirs, and pamphlets, among them "Mémoire sur la flore de la Guiane" (Paris, 1766) and "Observations sur l'espèce de résine élastique de l'île de France, semblable à celle de Cayenne" (1769).

TURINI, Giovanni (too-re'-ne), sculptor, b. near Verona, Italy, 23 May, 1841. He studied sculpture at Milan and Rome, and subsequently became professor in Milan. During the war with Austria in 1866 he served as a volunteer in the 4th regiment of Garibaldi's army. Later he came to this country and settled in New York. In 1867 he exhibited a group of statuary entitled "Angelica and Medora" at the World's fair in Paris, and in 1882 he made a bust of Leo XIII. for the Vatican in Rome. The statue of Garibaldi erected in Washington square by the Italians of New York city was designed by him. It was unveiled in June, 1888, and accepted by Mayor Abram S. Hewitt.

TURNBULL, Laurence, physician, b. in Shotts, Lanarkshire, Scotland, 10 Sept., 1821. He was graduated at the Philadelphia college of pharmacy in 1842, taking as his thesis "Salicine," which he had found in the populus tremuloides, and then engaged in the business of manufacturing chemicals. For his success in the production of citrate of iron he received an award of merit from the Franklin institute, and he also discovered that bichlorate of sodium would bleach colored oils and ointments. Entering the office of Dr. John K. Mitchell, he studied medicine, and was graduated at the Jefferson medical college in 1845. He was appointed resident physician of the Philadelphia hospital in 1845, and was out-door physician to the guardians of the poor in 1846-'8, also vaccine physician to the city of Philadelphia in 1847-'50. Meanwhile, in 1848-'50, he was lecturer on chemistry applied to the arts in Franklin institute, and from 1857 till 1887 he was physician to the department of diseases of the eye and ear in the Howard hospital. At the beginning of the civil war he was a volunteer surgeon in the hospital-department service on Potomac river, for the relief of the Pennsylvania troops, in Emory hospital, and at Fort Monroe. Dr. Turnbull has made a specialty of diseases of the ear, and is aural surgeon of the Jefferson medical college hospital, and superintendent of the ear clinic in 1877-'88. Besides holding membership in various medical societies, he presided over the section in otology of the American medical association in 1880, and of the British medical association in 1881; and he was chosen delegate to the section in otology of the British medical association in 1888, and to the congress of otology that convened in Brussels, Belgium, in September, 1888. Dr. Turnbull has contributed largely to medical literature, and, in addition to memoirs "On the Use of Belladonna," and "On Whooping-Cough," he has published "The Electro-Magnetic Telegraph, with an Historical Account of its Rise, Progress, and Present Condition" (Philadelphia, 1859); "Defective and Impaired Vision, with the Clinical Use of the Ophthalmoscope in their Diagnosis and Treatment" (1859); "Hints and Observations on Military Hygiene" (1862); "Imperfect Hearing and Hygiene of the Ear" (1871); "The Nature and Treatment of Nervous Deafness," with an additional translation of Duchenne's work on the same subject (1874); "A Clinical Manual of the Diseases of the Ear" (1881); and "A Manual of Anæsthetic Agents and their Employment in the Treatment of Disease" (1885).—His son, Charles Smith, physician, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 10 Nov., 1847, was graduated at the Philadelphia central high-school in 1868, and at the auxiliary department of the University of Pennsylvania in 1869, with the degree of Ph. D., also at the medical department of the same university in 1871. During the following year he was surgeon to the U. S. geological survey in Wyoming and Montana territories, and in 1873-'4 he was resident surgeon of the New York ophthalmic and aural institute. The years 1874-'5 were spent in study in the ophthalmic and aural departments of the Imperial general hospital in Vienna, and on his return he settled in Philadelphia, devoting his attention entirely to the practice of ophthalmology and otology. Dr. Turnbull is chief of the aural department of Jefferson medical college, and ophthalmic and aural surgeon to the Howard, St. Christopher, German, and Jewish hospitals, and the Home for incurables. He is a member of the county, state, and National medical societies, and is a fellow of the Philadelphia college of physicians, and is associate editor in charge of the department of otology in the "Annual of the Universal Medical Sciences" (Philadelphia, 1888). During his residence abroad he contributed letters to the "Medical and Surgical Reporter" of Philadelphia, and he translated Arlt's "Injuries of the Eye and their Medico-Legal Aspects" (Philadelphia, 1878); Gruber's "Tenotomy of the Tensor Tympani Muscle" (1879); and Bruner's "On the Methods of Connections of the Ossicles" (1880).

TURNBULL, Robert, clergyman, b. in Whiteburn, Linlithgowshire, Scotland, 10 Sept., 1809; d. at Hartford, Conn., 20 Nov., 1877. He was graduated at Glasgow university, and studied theology under Dr. Thomas Chalmers at Edinburgh. While thus engaged he became a Baptist, and preached for a short time in Scotland and England. In 1833 he came to this country, settling as pastor of the Baptist church in Danbury, Conn. After brief pastorates here, in Detroit, Hartford, and Boston, he returned in 1845 to Hartford, as minister of the 1st Baptist church, which relation continued for twenty-four years. Leaving the pastorate in 1869, he preached in various places, and served as secretary of the Connecticut Baptist state convention. In 1851 he received from Madison university the degree of D. D. He was for several years joint editor of the "Christian Review," and, besides numerous contributions to the periodical press, was the author of "The Theatre" (Boston, 1840); "Olympia Morata" (1842); Alexandre R. Vinet's "Vital Christianity," translated, with an introduction and notes (1846); "The Genius of Scotland" (New York, 1847); "The Genius of Italy" (1849); "Theophany, or the Manifestation of God in Christ" (Hartford, 1851); "Vinet's Miscellanies" (New York, 1852); "Pulpit Orators of France and Switzerland" (1853); "The Student Preacher" (1854);

"The World We Live in" (1855); "Christ in History, or the Central Power" (Boston, 1856); and "Life Pictures, or Sketches from a Pastor's Note-Book" (New York, 1857). He also edited Sir William Hamilton's "Discussions on Philosophy."

TURNBULL, Robert James, political writer, b. in New Smyrna, Fla., in January, 1775; d. in Charleston, S. C., 15 June, 1833. He was the son of a British physician, who obtained grants from the government in 1772 to establish a Greek colony in Florida. About 15,000 Greeks, Moravians, and other inhabitants of the Mediterranean islands were induced to emigrate, and they founded New Smyrna, so named in honor of Mrs. Turnbull, who was of Greek descent and a native of Smyrna. The project was unsuccessful, and Dr. Turnbull forfeited his grants by adhering to the cause of the colonies during the Revolutionary war, when he settled in Charleston, S. C. The son was educated in England, and then studied law in Charleston and Philadelphia. After his admission to the bar he practised in Charleston until 1810, when he retired to a large plantation in the country. While in Europe he wrote a "Visit to the Philadelphia Penitentiary" (London, 1797), which was translated into French (Paris, 1800), and attracted attention both at home and abroad. He became a leader in the nullification movement, and wrote a series of articles on that subject in 1827 for the "Charleston Mercury," which were afterward issued as "The Crisis," and became the text-book of the nullification party. Mr. Turnbull was "reputed the ablest writer in favor of the principle of nullification." He argued that "each state has the unquestionable right to judge of the infractions of the constitution, and to interpose its sovereign power to arrest their progress and to protect its citizens," which principle he incorporated in his treatise on "The Tribunal of Dernier Ressort" (1830). In 1831 he was a member of the Free-trade convention that assembled at Columbia, S. C., and wrote the report of that body, and he was active in the similar convention in Charleston in February, 1832. He delivered an oration before an assemblage of the nullification party that showed its influence in the subsequent election, and in November of the same year he was a delegate to the convention of the people of South Carolina that passed the nullifying ordinance, and prepared the address of that convention to the people. After the proclamation of President Jackson was received in South Carolina he was the first to enlist when volunteers were called for, in addition to the organized militia, to resist the National government. A monument was erected to his memory in Charleston by his political admirers and associates.

TURNBULL, William, engineer, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 9 Oct., 1800; d. in Wilmington, N. C., 9 Dec., 1857. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1819, and entered the army as 2d lieutenant in the artillery. After serving in garrison at Fort McHenry for a year he was on topographical duty until 1832, being made in 1831 assistant topographical engineer, with the brevet of captain. From 1832 till 1843 he was superintending topographical engineer of the construction of the Potomac aqueduct. This work, one of the earliest of the important undertakings of American engineers, gave Col. Turnbull a high rank among his professional associates. The piers of the aqueduct were founded by coffer-dams on rock, sometimes covered by twenty feet of mud, and nearly forty feet below the water surface. He was made major, 7 July, 1838, and had charge of the repairs of the Potomac (long) bridge in 1841-'3. Subsequently he had charge of Lake Ontario harbor improvement, the extension of Buffalo harbor, and inspection of harbor improvements on Lake Champlain, Lake Ontario, and Lake Erie. In the war with Mexico he was topographical engineer of the army under Gen. Winfield Scott, and was engaged in the siege of Vera Cruz, the castles of Cerro Gordo, Pedregal, and Churubusco, and the operations that ended with the capture of the city of Mexico. His services gained for him the brevet of lieutenant - colonel and colonel. During 1848-'9 he had charge of the construction of the New Orleans custom-house, and he was assistant in the topographical bureau at Washington, D. C., in 1850-'2 and 1853-'4, where he examined into the practicability of bridging Susquehanna river at Havre de Grace, and the expediency of an additional canal around the Falls of Ohio. He was light-house engineer for Oswego harbor, N. Y., in 1853-'5, in charge of harbor improvements of Lake Champlain, Lake Ontario, and the eastern part of Lake Erie in 1853-'6, and of the improvement of Cape Fear river, N. C., in 1856-'7. The illustration shown above represents the Potomac aqueduct as designed by him. Among his various government reports that were published was one "On the Survey and Construction of the Potomac Aqueduct," with twenty-one plates (Washington, 1838).—His son, Charles Nesbit, engineer, b. in Washington, D. C., 14 Aug., 1832; d. in Boston, Mass., 2 Dec., 1874, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1854, and made 2d lieutenant of topographical engineers. He was on the survey of the boundary-line between the United States and Mexico in 1854-'6, on that of the northern lakes in 1856-'9, and at the U. S. military academy as assistant professor of mathematics in 1859-'60. During the civil war he served at first on the staff of Gen. Benjamin F. Butler and in the Department of the Gulf, after which, in 1863-'4, he was with the Army of the Potomac. He received his promotion as captain of topographical engineers, 14 July, 1862, and was transferred to the corps of engineers on 3 March, 1863. In June, 1864, he was chief engineer of the cavalry corps, during Gen. Philip H. Sheridan's raid, and later chief engineer of the 8th army corps. He received the brevets of major, lieutenant-colonel, and colonel for his services, and after the war served on the repairs of Fort Hamilton. Col. Turnbull resigned on 31 Dec., 1865, and engaged in the commission business in Boston, Mass., where he continued until his death.

TURNBULL, William Paterson, ornithologist, b. in Fala, Scotland, 20 June, 1830; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 5 July, 1871. He was educated at the high-school in Edinburgh. For many years he occupied himself in collecting a complete library of works that relate to American ornithology, and also in securing manuscript letters and original drawings of Alexander Wilson. His home was in Philadelphia, where he was a member of the Academy of natural sciences. He published "Birds of East Lothian" (Glasgow), and "Birds of East Pennsylvania and New Jersey" (1869).

TURNER, Charles Coche, naval officer, b. in Virginia about 1805; d. in Baltimore, Md., 4 March, 1861. TURNER, Nat. insurgent, b. in Virginia about 1800; d. in Jerusalem, Va., 11 Nov., 1831. He was a negro slave who believed himself chosen of the Lord to lead his people to freedom. For a long time he claimed to have heard voices in the air and to have seen signs in the sky. Portents were written on the fallen leaves of the woods and in spots of blood upon the corn in the field to inform him of a divine mission. In his Bible, which he knew by heart, he found prophecies of the great work he was called upon to do. He was regarded as having unusual mental power and resources, but he failed to make plans that promised success. Taking six men into his confidence in the autumn of 1831, he set out at an appointed time to go from house to house and kill every white person, irrespective of age or sex, to inspire universal terror, and arouse the whole slave population. They began at Turner's own home, where they killed his master, and then, going to other plantations, were joined by other slaves. An advance-guard on horseback surrounded each house in turn, holding it until their followers on foot, armed with axes, scythes, and muskets, came up to complete the work of destruction, while the horsemen rode on to the next house. In forty-eight hours fifty-five white persons were killed without loss to the negroes, whose numbers had increased to sixty. The insurgents then moved toward Jerusalem, where they expected to find plenty of fire-arms and to be joined by large numbers; but they separated and were attacked by two bodies of white men and dispersed. Turner escaped to the woods, and, after spending nearly two months in hiding, was captured, taken to Jerusalem, and after a trial hanged. This outbreak, known as the Southampton insurrection, resulted in the trial of fifty-three negroes, of whom seventeen were hanged, and many others, suspected of complicity, were tortured, burned, shot, and mutilated. Terror spread through the states as far west as Kentucky, and south and southwest to Georgia and Louisiana; but no evidences were ever discovered of a concerted movement among the slaves.

TURNER, Peter, naval officer, b. in Rhode Island, 17 Feb., 1803; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 17 Feb., 1871. He entered the navy as a midshipman, 4 March, 1823, became a passed midshipman, 23 March, 1829, and was commissioned lieutenant, 21 June, 1832. During the Mexican war he was present at the fall of Vera Cruz, and participated in the boat expedition at Tuspan and the second expedition at Tabasco, where he served with credit. He commanded the store-ship "Southampton" in the Pacific squadron in 1851-'2. He was placed on the reserved list in 1855, and was on waiting orders until 1861, when he was commissioned commander on 1 July, and was governor of the naval asylum at Philadelphia during the civil war. He was promoted to commodore, 25 July, 1862.

TURNER, Philip, surgeon, b. in Norwich, Conn., 25 Feb., 1740; d. in New York city, 20 April, 1815. He was left an orphan at the age of twelve, and adopted by Dr. Elisha Tracy, under whom he studied medicine and whose daughter he married. In 1759 he was appointed an assistant surgeon to a provincial regiment that served under Gen. Jeffrey Amherst at Fort Ticonderoga. After the peace of 1763 he settled in Norwich, where at the beginning of the Revolutionary war he was unrivalled as a surgeon. In 1775 he was the first surgeon of the Connecticut troops before Boston, and in 1776 he accompanied the Continental army to New York, attending it at the battles of Long Island and White Plains. Dr. Turner was appointed surgeon-general of the Eastern department in 1777, and filled that post with great ability till near the close of the Revolutionary war. He then resumed his private practice in Norwich, but removed in 1800 to New York city, and soon afterward was appointed a surgeon to the staff of the U. S. army and stationed on Manhattan island. Dr. Turner was interred with military honors in the church-yard of St. Paul's in New York city.

TURNER, Samuel Hulbeart, clergyman, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 23 Jan., 1790; d. in New York city, 21 Dec., 1861. He entered the University of Pennsylvania, was graduated in 1807, studied for the ministry in the Episcopal church for three years under Bishop White's direction, and was ordained deacon in St. Paul's church, Philadelphia, 27 Jan., 1811, by Bishop White, and priest in 1814 by the same bishop. He accepted a call to the Episcopal church in Chestertown, Md., and served in that post in 1812-'17. He was appointed superintendent of the theological school in Philadelphia in 1818, and had Alonzo Potter (afterward bishop of Pennsylvania) as his first pupil. At the close of the same year he was appointed professor of historic theology in the General theological seminary of the Episcopal Church, toward establishing and endowing which efforts were then and subsequently made to good purpose. In 1820 the institution was removed to New Haven, Conn., but at the close of 1821 it was brought back again to New York city. The seminary was reorganized and Dr. Turner was appointed professor of biblical learning and interpretation of Holy Scriptures. He occupied this post until the time of his death. In 1830 he was appointed professor of the Hebrew language and literature in Columbia college, but there was little or no call for active service at any time. The professor delivered in 1831 a course of three lectures on the Hebrew language, which were afterward printed. Dr. Turner was always a diligent student, especially in his own department, and published a large number of works in the way of scripture exposition and in defence of his views of theology and church principles. They include "Notes on the Epistle to the Romans" (New York, 1824; enlarged ed., 1853); "Companion to the Book of Genesis" (1841); "Biographical Notices of the Most Distinguished Jewish Rabbis" (1847); "Essay on our Lord's Discourse at Capernaum, in St. John's Gospel, with Strictures on Cardinal Wiseman's Lectures on the Real Presence" (1851); "Thoughts on the Origin, Character, and Interpretation of Scripture Prophecy" (1852); "St. Paul's Epistle to the Hebrews, Greek and English, with Commentary" (1852); "Epistle to the Ephesians, with Commentary" (1856); "Epistle to the Galatians, with Commentary" (1856); and "Spiritual Things compared to Spiritual" (1859). In conjunction with Rev. Dr. William R. Whittingham, he translated "Jahn's Introduction to the Old Testament" (1827) and "Introduction to Sacred Philology and Interpretation, by Dr. Gottlieb J. Planck" (1834). He published also various sermons on special occasions, tractates, articles in reviews, etc. Shortly after his death was published "Autobiography of Samuel H. Turner, D. D." (New York, 1863).

TURNER, Thomas, naval officer, b. in Washington, D. C., 23 Dec., 1808; d. in Glen Mills, Pa., 24 March, 1883. He served in the frigate "Macedonian" in the exploring expedition of 1837-'8, and in the frigate "Columbia," the flag-squadron, from June till October, 1847, was then transferred to the sloop "Albany," and commanded the schooner "Reefer" in the attack on Tuspan in April, 1847. He was promoted to commander, 14 Sept., 1855, and had charge of the sloop "Saratoga," on the Home squadron, in 1858-'60. On 6 March, 1860, he captured at Vera Cruz the steamers "Miramón" and "Marques de Habana," which had been purchased in Spain by Gen. Miramón, and had attempted to blockade the port of Vera Cruz in the interests of the revolutionary party. He commanded the armored ship "New Ironsides" in the South Atlantic squadron, and was highly commended for the skill and ability with which he handled this vessel in the attacks on the forts at Charleston, 7 April, 1863, and in other operations there until August, 1863. He was promoted to commodore, 13 Dec., 1862, and to rear-admiral, 24 June, 1868, and commanded the South Pacific squadron in 1868-'70 during the great earthquake in Peru, where he rendered timely assistance to the sufferers. He was retired, 21 April, 1870, after forty-five years of active service.

TURNER, William Wadden, philologist, b. in London, England, 23 Oct., 1810; d. in Washington, D. C., 29 Nov., 1859. He came to New York in 1818, and, after a public-school education, was apprenticed to the carpenter's trade, but subsequently became a printer. At the age of twenty-six he was master of French, Latin, German, and Hebrew. Afterward he studied Arabic with Prof. Isaac Nordheimer, and they proposed to write together an Arabic grammar, but, receiving no encouragement, they prepared instead "A Critical Grammar of the Hebrew Language" (2 vols., New York, 1838); and "Chrestomathy: or A Grammatical Analysis of Selections from the Hebrew Scriptures, with an Exercise in Hebrew Composition" (1838), also a "Hebrew and Chaldee Concordance to the Old Testament" (1842). In order to superintend the printing of these books, Mr. Turner removed to New Haven, as the only sufficient supply of oriental type was to be found there and at Andover. He was engaged in setting the type during the day, and spent his evenings in preparing the manuscript. On the completion of the works, Mr. Turner added to his linguistic attainments a knowledge of Sanskrit and most of the other chief Asiatic languages, and later he turned his attention to the languages of the North American Indians. He edited a "Vocabulary of the Jargon or Trade Language of Oregon" (1853), and "Grammar and Dictionary of the Yoruba Language" (1858), which was issued by the Smithsonian institution. In 1842 he was elected professor of oriental literature in Union theological seminary, New York city, and he continued in that office until 1852, when he was called to Washington by the commissioner of patents to take charge of the library of that department. He was a member of the American oriental society, and secretary of the National institute for the promotion of science. Mr. Turner was considered in his day the most skilful proof-reader in the United States. In addition to the literary labors that have been already mentioned, he translated from the German Friedrich L. G. von Raumer's "America and the American People" (New York, 1845), and was associated with Dr. P. J. Kaufmann in the translation of the 12th German ed. of Ferdinand Mackeldey's "Compendium of Modern Civil Law" (London, 1845). He also translated William Freund's "Latin-German Lexicon" for Ethan A. Andrews's "Latin-English Lexicon" (New York, 1851).

TURNEY, Hopkins Lacey, senator, b. in Smith county, Tenn., 3 Oct., 1797; d. in Winchester, Tenn., 1 Aug., 1857. He was apprenticed as a boy to the tailor's trade, and in 1818 served in the war against the Seminole Indians. When he became of age he was unable to write, but began the study of law, and, after admission to the bar, practised in Winchester. In 1828 he was chosen to the legislature, and he was annually re-elected until 1838. He was then chosen as a Democrat to congress, and served from 4 Sept., 1837, till 3 March, 1843, after which he was U. S. senator from Tennessee from 1 Dec., 1845, till 3 March, 1851.

TURPIE, David, senator, b. in Hamilton county, Ohio, 8 July, 1829. He was graduated at Kenyon in 1848, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1849, and began practice at Logansport, Ind. He was a member of the legislature in 1852, was appointed judge of the court of common pleas in 1854, and of the circuit court in 1856, which post he resigned. He was again a member of the state house of representatives in 1858, and was elected to the U. S. senate from Indiana as a Democrat in place of Jesse D. Bright, who had been expelled, serving from 22 Jan. till 3 March, 1863. He was chosen for the full term in the spring of 1887.

TURPIN, Louis Georges François, French naval officer, b. in Nantes, 20 July, 1790; d. in Toulon, 7 Oct., 1848. He entered the navy as a cabin-boy when ten years old, was promoted midshipman in 1808, lieutenant in 1812, and in 1820-'2 performed three remarkable voyages to the Windward islands and Brazil, making valuable astronomical observations and preparing charts of the Gulf of Mexico and the South American coast, which are preserved in the archives of the navy department at Paris. In 1822-'3 he participated as 1st lieutenant in the expedition around the world under Bougainville, a grandson of the noted navigator, and he afterward commanded a sloop-of-war in the battle of Navarin. He became captain in 1831 and commodore in 1837, and was second commander in 1838 under Baudin of the expedition to Mexico, taking part in the capture of San Juan de Ulua, 28 Nov., 1838. He was promoted rear-admiral, 5 Feb., 1843, and was afterward naval prefect of Toulon.

TURPIN, Pierre Jean François, French botanist, b. in Vire, Calvados, France, 11 March, 1775; d. in Paris, 1 May, 1840. He enlisted when he was fourteen years old in the battalion of Calvados, and sailed with it for Santo Domingo in 1794. There he made the acquaintance of the botanist Poiteau, who gave him lessons in botany. After studying, with great care, the flora of the island, he returned to France, but received permission some time afterward to pay a second visit to Santo Domingo. He next explored the flora of the island of Tortuga, funds for the purpose having been supplied by the consul of the United States. He spent more than a year there, and made a rich collection of plants and designs. Poiteau went to the United States in 1800, and Turpin was pharmacist to the French army in Santo Domingo during Leclerc's expedition, and then sailed for the United States, where he became a teacher in New Orleans and Philadelphia, and, meeting Baron von Humboldt, returned with him to France. He afterward executed the iconographic part of several of Humboldt's works. Turpin wrote many works, among them "Leçons de flore" (Paris, 1819); "Essai d'une iconographie élémentaire et philosophique des végétaux, avec un texte explicatif" (1820); and "Iconographie végétale, ou organisation des végétaux" (1841).

He served as a general of division in Vendée, Italy, and Switzerland, and in 1804 was made a baron. He was minister to the United States in 1804-'11, and vainly attempted to induce the government of this country to adopt a French policy. After his return he published "Aperçu sur la situation politique des États-Unis" (1815), a bitter critique of the government of the United States, which he says in the preface "the author has studied eight years without being able to comprehend it." Some time before his death he retired to his estate at Conches, in the department of the Eure. He also published "Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire de la guerre de la Vendée" (1815).

During the last thirty years of her life she resided at Princeton. She contributed anonymously to magazines, and among other works published "James Somers, the Pilgrim's Son" (Boston, 1827); "Mary's Visit to Boston" (1829); "Ancient Architecture" (New Haven, 1830); "Calisthenics" (Hartford, 1831); "Young Lady's Home" (New Haven, 1841); "I will be a Lady" (Boston, 1845); "I will be a Gentleman" (1846); "A Strike for Freedom" (1848); a series of "Tales for the Young" (1844-'50); a new series for the young (1852-'4); "True Manliness, or the Landscape Gardener" (1865); and "The Young Lady at Home and in Society" (New York, 1869). TUTTLE, Albert Henry, naturalist, b. in Cuyahoga Falls, Ohio, 19 Nov., 1844. He was graduated in the scientific course at the State college of Pennsylvania in 1868, and during the two years following was professor of natural sciences in the State normal school in Platteville, Wis. In 1870 he became instructor of microscopy in Harvard, and in 1874 he was called to the chair of zoölogy and comparative anatomy in Ohio state university, where he remained for fourteen years. As a member of the faculty of that institution from its organization, in addition to establishing one of the earliest laboratories for biological work in the western states, he took a large part in the development of the university and in fixing its policy, as well as devoting considerable labor to the determination and establishment of intimate relations between it and the public schools of the state. In 1888 he was elected professor of biology and agriculture at the University of Virginia. Prof. Tuttle was elected a fellow of the Royal microscopical society of London in 1882, and in the same year was a vice-president of the American association for the advancement of science, having charge over the section of microscopy. He has written for scientific and educational periodicals, and is the author of reports of state commissions of which he has been a member.

TUTTLE, Charles Wesley, astronomer, b. in Newfield, Me., 1 Nov., 1829; d. in Boston, Mass., 17 July, 1881. He was educated in the schools of his native town and in Dover, where he learned the trade of a carpenter with his uncle, devoting his leisure to study. While still a lad he constructed a telescope, which was a remarkable piece of mechanism considering that he had never seen such an instrument. He removed to Cambridge in 1849, in 1850 entered the observatory at Harvard as a student, and was in 1851 appointed assistant observer. Owing to impaired eyesight, he was forced to resign his post, and then studied law at Harvard. He was admitted to the bar in 1856, and practised in Newburyport, and afterward in Boston until his death. In 1855 he was sent to England in charge, with his friend Sidney Coolidge, of a chronometric expedition of the U. S. coast survey for determining the difference of longitude between Liverpool and Cambridge. Harvard gave him the degree of A. M. in 1854, and Dartmouth that of Ph. D. in 1880. His leisure was devoted to historical and antiquarian research, and he won a high reputation as an original investigator. He was active in procuring the act of incorporation of the Prince society, of which he was treasurer and corresponding secretary, and was a member of various historical societies, before which he frequently read papers. He delivered the bi-centennial address before the New Hampshire historical society in 1880, in commemoration of the establishment of the first civil government over that province in 1680. He frequently delivered lectures upon astronomy, and contributed largely to astronomical journals. He was the author of a monograph on "Capt. John Mason, the Founder of New Hampshire," edited, with historical illustrations, by John Ward Dean, and published by the Prince society (Boston, 1887).—His brother, Horace Parnell, astronomer, b. in Newfield, York co., Me., 24 March, 1839, was educated by his brother in Cambridge. In 1857 he invented a method of inserting a steel rifled core into brass or iron cannon, which method is extensively used by European governments, but a patent for which was refused by the U. S. patent-office. In 1861 he devised a method of signalling at long distances by using flashes made by a Drummond light, to correspond with the dots and dashes of the Morse telegraph system. He discovered thirteen comets between 1857 and 1866, and in 1861-'2 the asteroids Maïa and Clytie. At present he is assistant computer in the U. S. naval observatory. Mr. Tuttle has computed "Pay Tables of the United States Navy" (Washington, 1872).

For years Bishop Tuttle has been active in the discussion of the Mormon question in Utah. On the death of Bishop Robertson, of Missouri, which occurred 1 May, 1886, Bishop Tuttle was again elected to the episcopate, and was transferred, becoming the third bishop of Missouri.

He was elected a member of the Society of American artists in 1879, and at the society's exhibition in 1888 gained the Webb prize for his "Windmills," which now belongs to Smith college, Northampton, Mass. TWEED, William Marcy, politician, b. in New York city, 3 April, 1823; d. there, 12 April, 1878. He was the son of a chair-maker, and, after receiving a common-school education, learned the same trade himself. He assisted in organizing "Americus" fire-engine company No. 6, known commonly as "Big Six," and became its foreman; and it was his popularity in this capacity that first made him a power in local politics. He was an alderman of New York in 1852-'3, served in congress in 1853-'5, was supervisor of the city and chairman of the board in 1856, school commissioner in 1856-'7, deputy street commissioner in 1861-'70, and state senator in 1867-'71. In 1870 he was appointed commissioner of the department of public works in New York city, and while in this office he organized, with others, the "ring" of which he was chief, he and his associates appropriating vast sums of public money. These corrupt practices were exposed, and on 28 Oct., 1871, Mr. Tweed was arrested on a civil suit that was brought by Charles O'Connor in behalf of the city. He furnished bail in $1,000,000, and in November of the same year he was elected to the state senate, but did not take his seat. On 16 Dec. he was arrested on a criminal charge of fraud, but was released on $5,000 bail. The first of the suits against him was tried, 30 Jan., 1873, the jury disagreeing; but on 19 Nov. he was found guilty of fraud, and sentenced by Judge Noah Davis to twelve years' imprisonment on as many different counts (a year for each count) in the penitentiary on Blackwell's island, and to pay a fine of $12,550. In April, 1875, an action was instituted against him in behalf of the people of New York for the recovery of $6,000,000, and judgment was rendered for this amount with interest. On 15 June his further imprisonment was declared illegal by the court of appeals, on the assumption that the lower court had exceeded its powers in its cumulative sentence, and his discharge was ordered. He was then required to furnish bail in $3,000,000 pending the civil suits, and in default of this was confined in Ludlow street jail. He escaped on 4 Dec., 1875, succeeded in reaching Cuba, and thence went to Spain, where he was arrested by the Spanish government, and, being delivered to officers of the United States, was brought back to New York and recommitted to Ludlow street jail, where he remained a prisoner till his death.

TWEEDALE, William, civil engineer, b. in Beith, Ayrshire, Scotland, 18 May, 1823. He came with his parents to New York in 1833, and was graduated at Rensselaer polytechnic institute in 1853. In 1855 he was a bridge engineer and contractor in Chicago, and in 1859, having obtained the contract for the construction of bridges and buildings on the Dubuque and Sioux City railway, he removed to the former place. At the opening of the civil war he raised a company for an engineer regiment, and was mustered in as captain. He was engaged in the engineering operations against New Madrid, which resulted in its capture, and cut a passage for a fleet of transports across the lower end of Island No. 8. This was used for the transportation of troops across the river from New Madrid to operate against Island No. 10, and resulted in the evacuation of the latter. He was in command of advanced parties of engineers with Gen. John Pope's division in the siege of Corinth, and in the pursuit that followed its evacuation under Gen. James B. McPherson. He was afterward engaged in the reconstruction of railroads, dredging of rivers, and the removal of debris at various points on Mississippi river. He was promoted brevet-colonel of volunteers, 13 March, 1865, and was mustered out on 31 May the same year. He moved to Topeka, Kansas, in 1867, superintended the erection of the east wing of the state capitol in 1867-'8, and the west wing in 1879-'80, and was engineer of the bridge across the Kansas river at Topeka.

The academy owns his portrait of John Trumbull, painted in 1835, and in the New York historical society hangs the portrait of Fitz-Greene Halleck, painted from the original by Inman, also in the possession of that association. Thomas S. Cummings wrote of him: "Of the young artists of the day there were none more promising than Twibill." His portraits in oil in small were of excellence seldom equalled."

Winfield Scott's army, he commanded a brigade at Vera Cruz. During the operations against the city of Mexico he led the 2d division of regulars, and in 1848 he was military governor of Vera Cruz. He was in command of the Department of Texas in February, 1861, and surrendered his army and military stores to the Confederate Gen. Ben. McCulloch, for which he was dishonorably dismissed from the army. He was appointed a major-general in the Confederate army, 22 May, 1861, and assigned to the command of the district of Louisiana, but resigned toward the end of the year.—His brother, Levi, soldier, b. in Richmond county, Ga., 21 May, 1793; d. in Chapultepec, Mexico, 13 Sept., 1847, was educated at Franklin college in his native state, which he left to serve in the war of 1812, and in 1813 joined the marine corps as 2d lieutenant. He organized a domestic missionary army in 1865, which enrolled many thousands of children, in 1867 established "The Young Christian Soldier," in 1868 organized "The ladies' domestic missionary relief association," and in 1870 he introduced "mite-chests," which in a few years brought into the treasury of the domestic committee $74,000. He succeeded in infusing a spirit of enthusiasm for missions into a large part of the church. In 1864 Hobart college gave him the degree of D. D.

TWINING, Alexander Catlin, engineer, b. in New Haven, Conn., 5 July, 1801; d. there, 22 Nov., 1884. He was employed as a civil engineer on various railways and canals, and invented the first practical method of producing ice in considerable quantities by artificial means. He claimed to have first established the theory of the cosmical origin of meteors, and was devoted to abstruse problems in higher mathematics. He was the author of papers on the doctrine of parallels and other points in mathematics. For several years preceding his death he lectured on constitutional law in the Yale law-school.—His son, Kingsley, clergyman, b. in West Point, N. TYLER, Bennet, clergyman, b. in Middlebury, Conn., 10 July, 1783; d. in South Windsor, Conn., 14 May, 1858. He was the son of a farmer, was graduated at Yale in 1804, and, after studying theology, was pastor of the Congregational church in South Britain, Conn., from 1808 till 1822. From that date until 1828 he was president of Dartmouth college, and was pastor of the 2d Congregational church in Portland, Me., from 1828 till 1833. The controversy on the "new divinity" awakened by the writings of Rev. Nathaniel W. Taylor, of whom he was the principal opponent, resulted in the formation of a pastoral union in September, 1833, by the Connecticut clergymen, who held to Dr. Taylor's opinions and the resolution of the other faction to found a theological seminary in East Windsor, in which he was president and professor of Christian theology from 1833 until his death. Middlebury gave him the degree of D. D. in 1823. His principal works are "History of the New Haven Theology, in Letters to Clergymen" (Hartford, 1837); "A Review of Day on the Will" (1837); "Memoir of Rev. Asabel Nettleton, D. D." (1844); "Nettleton's Remains" (1845); "A Treatise on the Sufferings of Christ" (New York, 1845); "A Treatise on New England Revivals" (1846); and two series of "Letters to Dr. Horace Bushnell on Christian Nurture" (1847-'8). He then entered the Confederate service, became a brigadier-general, and was killed in battle at West Point, Ga.

His father served in the Revolutionary army, and his mother was a granddaughter of Jonathan Edwards. After graduation at the U. S. military academy in 1819, as 2d lieutenant of light artillery, he served in garrison in New England in 1819-'24, and on the reorganization of the army, 1 June, 1821, he was made 2d lieutenant in the 5th infantry. In 1824-'6 he served in the Fort Monroe artillery-school for practice, of which he was for a time adjutant. He became 1st lieutenant in the 1st artillery on 6 May, 1824, and in 1826 commanded the Pikesville arsenal, near Baltimore, Md. While there he translated from the French a work on "Manceuvres of Artillery," which led to his being sent to Europe in January, 1828, to obtain data for a more comprehensive work for the regular army. In April, 1829, he was admitted into the artillery-school of practice at Metz, and began a translation of the latest French system of artillery. The task was completed at the end of a year, and 300 lithographed copies in three volumes were sent to the war department in Washington, D. C. He also collected copies of every drawing and memoir connected with the French system of field, siege, sea-coast, and mountain artillery at a personal expense of about $2,000, which he offered to the government at Washington, provided a board should adopt the system for the U. S. artillery. This was not done, but he received from the government $1,600 for his collection of drawings. After his return in 1829 he was kept on ordnance duty to prepare a translation of the "School of the Driver," which in the French service is separate from the artillery. In 1830 he was sent to the Springfield armory to report upon the manufacture of small arms, and he was a member of the board that met to reorganize the national armories. In 1832 he was made superintendent of the inspectors of contract arms. He resigned on 31 May, 1834, became president of an iron and coal company in Lycoming county, Pa., and was sent to Great Britain to examine the methods of coal-mining and operating furnaces and rolling-mills. On his return in 1835 he erected the first coke hot-blast furnace that was built in this country, and succeeded in making pig-iron, but the operations of the company were suspended. In 1840 he became president of the Norwich and Worcester railroad, and completed the road. In 1843 he was appointed president and engineer of the Morris canal and banking company. In 1845-'9 he was president of the Macon and Western railroad, and he was afterward superintending engineer of the Dauphin and Susquehanna railroad and coal company and of the Auburn and Allentown railroad, and president and engineer of the Schuylkill and Susquehanna railroad company. At the beginning of the civil war he became colonel of the 1st Connecticut volunteers, 23 April, 1861, and commanded a division at the battles of Blackburn's Ford and Bull Run, 18-21 July, 1861. He was mustered out at the expiration of service on 11 Aug., 1861, but was reappointed in the U. S. volunteer service, with the rank of brigadier-general, on 13 March, 1862. He served with the Army of the Mississippi, engaged in the siege of Corinth from 29 April till 8 June, 1862, organized volunteer regiments in Connecticut from 13 Aug. till 15 Sept., 1862, served on the military commission that investigated Gen. Don Carlos Buell's campaign in Kentucky and Tennessee, 24 Nov., 1862, till 10 May, 1863, and guarded the upper Potomac, and was in command of Harper's Ferry and Maryland Heights in June. Afterward he was in command of troops in Baltimore, Md., and of the district of Delaware, and resigned his commission on 6 April, 1864. Gen. Tyler then travelled extensively in the south, in Cuba, and in Europe, and on his return in 1872 founded large cotton and iron manufactories in Alabama, and built the town of Anniston, Ala. In 1873-'9 he was president of the Mobile and Montgomery railroad. Subsequently he invested in Texas land, and established the "Capote farm" of 20,000 acres, which was his winter residence.

TYLER, Erastus B., soldier, b. in West Bloomfield, N. Y., 24 April, 1822; d. in Calverton, Md., 9 Jan., 1891. He was educated at Granville college. In 1845 he engaged in business, which he continued until the beginning of the civil war. He was commissioned colonel of the 7th Ohio volunteers in April, 1861, and led his men into western Virginia, where he was assigned by Gen. Frederick W. Lander to a brigade, which he commanded with credit at Cross Lanes, W. Va., 26 Aug., 1861, Winchester, Va., 23 March, 1862, and Port Republic, Va., 9 June, 1862. He commanded a brigade at the battle of Fredericksburg, Va., where he was wounded, 13 Dec., 1862. On 14 May, 1862, he was made brigadier-general, and on 24 Aug., 1865, was mustered out of service. He settled in Baltimore.

TYLER, John, tenth president of the United States, b. at Greenway, Charles City co., Va., 29 March, 1790; d. in Richmond, Va., 18 Jan., 1862. He was the second son of Judge John Tyler and Mary Armistead. In early boyhood he attended the small school kept by a Mr. McMurdo, who was so diligent in his use of the birch that in later years Mr. Tyler said "it was a wonder he did not whip all the sense out of his scholars." At the age of eleven young Tyler was one of the ring-leaders in a rebellion in which the despotic McMurdo was overpowered by numbers, tied hand and foot, and left locked up in the school-house until late at night, when a passing traveller effected an entrance and released him. On complaining to Judge Tyler, the indignant school-master was met with the apt reply, "Sic semper tyrannis!" The future president was graduated at William and Mary in 1807. At college he showed a strong interest in ancient history. He was also fond of poetry and music, and, like Thomas Jefferson, was a skilful performer on the violin. In 1809 he was admitted to the bar, and had already begun to obtain a good practice when he was elected to the legislature, and took his seat in that body in December, 1811. He was here a firm supporter of Mr. Madison's administration, and the war with Great Britain, which soon followed, afforded him an opportunity to become conspicuous as a forcible and persuasive orator. One of his earliest public acts is especially interesting in view of the famous struggle with the Whigs, which in later years he conducted as president. The charter of the first Bank of the United States, established in 1791, was to expire in twenty years; and in 1811 the question of renewing the charter came before congress. The bank was very unpopular in Virginia, and the assembly of that state, by a vote of 125 to 35, instructed its senators at Washington, Richard Brent and William B. Giles, to vote against a recharter. The instructions denounced the bank as an institution in the founding of which congress had exceeded its powers and grossly violated state rights. Yet there were many in congress who, without approving the principle upon which the bank was founded, thought the eve of war an inopportune season for making a radical change in the financial system of the nation. Of the two Virginia senators, Brent voted in favor of the recharter, and Giles spoke on the same side, and although, in obedience to instructions, he voted contrary to his own opinion, he did so under protest. On 14 Jan., 1812, Mr. Tyler, in the Virginia legislature, introduced resolutions of censure, in which the senators were taken to task, while the Virginia doctrines, as to the unconstitutional character of the bank and the binding force of instructions, were formally asserted.

Mr. Tyler married, 29 March, 1813, Letitia, daughter of Robert Christian, and a few weeks afterward was called into the field at the head of a company of militia to take part in the defence of Richmond and its neighborhood, now threatened by the British. This military service lasted for a month, during which Mr. Tyler's company was not called into action. He was re-elected to the legislature annually, until in November, 1816, he was chosen to fill a vacancy in the U. S. house of representatives. In the regular election to the next congress, out of 200 votes given in his native county, he received all but one. As a member of congress he soon made himself conspicuous as a strict constructionist. When Mr. Calhoun introduced his bill in favor of internal improvements, Mr. Tyler voted against it. He opposed the bill for changing the per diem allowance of members of congress to an annual salary of $1,500. He opposed, as premature, Mr. Clay's proposal to add to the general appropriation bill a provision for $18,000 for a minister to the provinces of the La Plata, thus committing the United States to a recognition of the independence of those revolted provinces. He also voted against the proposal for a national bankrupt act. He condemned, as arbitrary and insubordinate, the course of Gen. Jackson in Florida, and contributed an able speech to the long debate over the question as to censuring that gallant commander. He was a member of a committee for inquiring into the affairs of the national bank, and his most elaborate speech was in favor of Mr. Trimble's motion to issue a scire facias against that institution. On all these points Mr. Tyler's course seems to have pleased his constituents; in the spring election of 1819 he did not consider it necessary to issue the usual circular address, or in any way to engage in a personal canvass. He simply distributed copies of his speech against the bank, and was re-elected to congress unanimously.

The most important question that came before the 16th congress related to the admission of Missouri to the Union. In the debates over this question Mr. Tyler took ground against the imposition of any restrictions upon the extension of slavery. At the same time he declared himself on principle opposed to the perpetuation of slavery, and he sought to reconcile these positions by the argument that in diffusing the slave population over a wide area the evils of the institution would be diminished and the prospects of ultimate emancipation increased. "Slavery," said he, "has been represented on all hands as a dark cloud. and the candor of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Whitman] drove him to the admission that it would be well to disperse this cloud. In this sentiment I entirely concur with him. How can you otherwise disarm it? Will you suffer it to increase in its darkness over one particular portion of this land till its horrors shall burst upon it? Will you permit the lightnings of its wrath to break upon the south, when by the interposition of a wise system of legislation you may reduce it to a summer's cloud?" New York and Pennsylvania, he argued, had been able to emancipate their slaves only by reducing their number by exportation. Dispersion, moreover, would be likely to ameliorate the condition of the black man, for by making his labor scarce in each particular locality it would increase the demand for it, and would thus make it the interest of the master to deal fairly and generously with his slaves. To the objection that the increase of the slave population would fully keep up with its territorial expansion, he replied by denying that such would be the case. His next argument was that if an old state, such as Virginia, could have slaves, while a new state, such as Missouri, was to be prevented by Federal authority from having them, then the old and new states would at once be placed upon a different footing, which was contrary to the spirit of the constitution. If congress could thus impose one restriction upon a state, where was the exercise of such a power to end? Once grant such a power, and what was to prevent a slave-holding majority in congress from forcing slavery upon some territory where it was not wanted? Mr. Tyler pursued the argument so far as to deny "that congress, under its constitutional authority to establish rules and regulations for the territories, had any control whatever over slavery in the territorial domain." (See life, by Lyon G. Tyler, vol. i., p. 319.) Mr. Tyler was unquestionably foremost among the members of congress in occupying this position. When the Missouri compromise bill was adopted by a vote of 134 to 42, all but five of the nays were from the south, and from Virginia alone there were seventeen, of which Mr. Tyler's vote was one. The Richmond "Enquirer" of 7 March, 1820, in denouncing the compromise, observed, in language of prophetic interest, that the southern and western representatives now "owe it to themselves to keep their eyes firmly fixed on Texas; if we are cooped up on the north, we must have elbow-room to the west."

Mr. Tyler's further action in this congress related chiefly to the question of a protective tariff, of which he was an unflinching opponent. In 1821, finding his health seriously impaired, he declined a re-election, and returned to private life. His retirement, however, was of short duration, for in 1823 he was again elected to the Virginia legislature. Here, as a friend to the candidacy of William H. Crawford for the presidency, he disapproved the attacks upon the congressional caucus begun by the legislature of Tennessee in the interests of Andrew Jackson. The next year he was nominated to fill the vacancy in the United States senate created by the death of John Taylor; but Littleton W. Tazewell was elected over him. He opposed the attempt to remove William and Mary college to Richmond, and was afterward made successively rector and chancellor of the college, which prospered signally under his management. In December, 1825, he was chosen by the legislature to the governorship of Virginia, and in the following year he was re-elected by a unanimous vote. A new division of parties was now beginning to show itself in national politics. The administration of John Quincy Adams had pronounced itself in favor of what was then, without much regard to history, described as the "American system" of government banking, high tariffs, and internal improvements. Those persons who were inclined to a loose construction of the constitution were soon drawn to the side of the administration, while the strict constructionists were gradually united in opposition. Many members of Crawford's party, under the lead of John Randolph, became thus united with the Jacksonians, while others, of whom Mr. Tyler was one of the most distinguished, maintained a certain independence in opposition. It is to be set down to Mr. Tyler's credit that he never attached any importance to the malicious story, believed by so many Jacksonians, of a corrupt bargain between Adams and Clay. (See ADAMS, JOHN Q., CLAY, HENRY, and JACKSON, ANDREW.) Soon after the meeting of the Virginia legislature, in December, 1826, the friends of Clay and Adams combined with the members of the opposite party who were dissatisfied with Randolph, and thus Mr. Tyler was elected to the U. S. senate by a majority of 115 votes to 110. Some indiscreet friends of Jackson now attempted to show that there must have been some secret and reprehensible understanding between Tyler and Clay; but this scheme failed completely. In the senate Mr. Tyler took a conspicuous stand against the so-called "tariff of abominations" enacted in 1828, which Benton, Van Buren, and other prominent Jacksonians, not yet quite clear as to their proper attitude, were induced to support. There was thus some ground for the opinion entertained at this time by Tyler, that the Jacksonians were not really strict constructionists. In February, 1830, after taking part in the Virginia convention for revising the state constitution, Mr. Tyler returned to his seat in the senate, and found himself first drawn toward Jackson by the veto message of the latter, 27 May, upon the Maysville turnpike bill. He attacked the irregularity of Jackson's appointment of commissioners to negotiate a commercial treaty with Turkey without duly informing the senate. On the other hand, he voted in favor of confirming the appointment of Van Buren as minister to Great Britain. In the presidential election of 1832 he supported Jackson as a less objectionable candidate than the others, Clay, Wirt, and Floyd. Mr. Tyler disapproved of nullification, and condemned the course of South Carolina as both unconstitutional and impolitic. At the same time he objected to President Jackson's famous proclamation of 10 Dec., 1833, as a "tremendous engine of federalism," tending to the "consolidation" of the states into a single political body. Under the influence of these feelings he undertook to play the part of mediator between Clay and Calhoun, and in that capacity earnestly supported the compromise tariff introduced by the former in the senate, 12 Feb., 1833. On the so-called "force bill," clothing the president with extraordinary powers for the purpose of enforcing the tariff law, Mr. Tyler showed that he had the courage of his convictions. When the bill was put to vote, 20 Feb., 1833, some of its opponents happened to be absent: others got up and went out in order to avoid putting themselves on record. The vote, as then taken, stood: yeas, thirty-two; nay, one (John Tyler).

As President Jackson's first term had witnessed a division in the Democratic party between the nullifiers led by Calhoun and the unconditional upholders of the Union, led by the president himself, with Benton, Blair, and Van Buren, so his second term witnessed a somewhat similar division arising out of the war upon the United States bank. The tendency of this fresh division was to bring Mr. Tyler and his friends nearer to co-operation with Mr. Calhoun, while at the same time it furnished points of contact that might, if occasion should offer, be laid hold of for the purpose of forming a temporary alliance with Mr. Clay and the National Republicans. The origin of the name "Whig," in its strange and anomalous application to the combination in 1834, is to be found in the fact that it pleased the fancy of President Jackson's opponents to represent him as a kind of arbitrary tyrant. On this view it seemed proper that they should be designated "Whigs," and at first there were some attempts to discredit the supporters of the administration by calling them "Tories." On the question of the bank, when it came to the removal of the deposits, Mr. Tyler broke with the administration. Against the bank he had fought, on every fitting occasion, since the beginning of his public career. In 1834 he declared emphatically: "I believe the bank to be the original sin against the constitution, which, in the progress of our history, has called into existence a numerous progeny of usurpations. Shall I permit this serpent, however bright its scales or erect its mien, to exist by and through my vote?" Nevertheless, strongly as he disapproved of the bank, Mr. Tyler disapproved still more strongly of the methods by which President Jackson assailed it. There seemed at that time to be growing up in the United States a spirit of extreme unbridled democracy quite foreign to the spirit in which our constitutional government, with its carefully arranged checks and limitations, was founded. It was a spirit that prompted mere majorities to insist upon having their way, even at the cost of overriding all constitutional checks and limits. This spirit possessed many members of Jackson's party, and it found expression in what Benton grotesquely called the "demoskrateo" principle. A good illustration of it was to be seen in Benton's argument, after the election of 1824, that Jackson, having received a plurality of electoral votes, ought to be declared president, and that the house of representatives, in choosing Adams, was "defying the will of the people."

In similar wise President Jackson, after his triumphant re-election in 1832, was inclined to interpret his huge majorities as meaning that the people were ready to uphold him in any course that he might see fit to pursue. This feeling no doubt strengthened him in his determined attitude toward the nullifiers, and it certainly contributed to his arbitrary and overbearing method of dealing with the bank, culminating in 1833 in his removal of the deposits. There was ground for maintaining that in this act the president exceeded his powers, and it seemed to illustrate the tendency of unbridled democracy toward despotism, under the leadership of a headstrong and popular chief. Mr. Tyler saw in it such a tendency, and he believed that the only safeguard for constitutional government, whether against the arbitrariness of Jackson or the latitudinarianism of the National Republicans, lay in a most rigid adherence to strict constructionist doctrines. Accordingly, in his speech of 24 Feb., 1834, he proposed to go directly to the root of the matter and submit the question of a national bank to the people in the shape of a constitutional amendment, either expressly forbidding or expressly allowing congress to create such an institution. According to his own account, he found Clay and Webster ready to co-operate with him in this course, while Calhoun held aloof. Nothing came of the project; but it is easy to see in Mr. Tyler's attitude at this time the basis for a short-lived alliance with the National Republicans, whenever circumstances should suggest it. On Mr. Clay's famous resolution to censure the president he voted in the affirmative. In the course of 1835 the seriousness of the schism in the Democratic party was fully revealed. Not only had the small body of nullifiers broken away, under the lead of Calhoun, but a much larger party was formed in the southern states under the appellation of "state-rights Whigs." They differed with the National Republicans on the fundamental questions of tariff, bank, and internal improvements, and agreed with them only in opposition to Jackson as an alleged violator of the constitution. Even in this opposition they differed from the party of Webster and Clay, for they grounded it largely upon a theory of state rights which the latter statesmen had been far from accepting. The "state-rights Whigs" now nominated Hugh L. White, of Tennessee, for president, and John Tyler for vice-president. The National Republicans wishing to gather votes from the other parties, nominated for president Gen. William H.

Harrison as a more colorless candidate than Webster or Clay. The Democratic followers of Jackson nominated Van Buren, who received a large majority of both popular and electoral votes, in spite of the defections above mentioned. There was a great deal of bolting in this election. Massachusetts threw its vote for Webster for president, and South Carolina for Willie P. Mangum. Virginia, which voted for Van Buren, rejected his colleague, Richard M. Johnson, and cast its twenty-three electoral votes for William Smith, of Alabama, for vice-president. Mr. White obtained the electoral votes of Tennessee and Georgia, twenty-six in all, but Mr. Tyler made a better showing; he carried, besides these two states, Maryland and South Carolina, making forty-seven votes in all. The unevenness of the results was such that the election of a vice-president devolved upon the senate, which chose Mr. Johnson. In the course of the year preceding the election an incident occurred which emphasized more than ever Mr. Tyler's hostility to the Jackson party. Benton's famous resolutions for expunging the vote of censure upon the president were before the senate, and the Democratic legislature of Virginia instructed the two senators from that state to vote in the affirmative. As to the binding force of such instructions Mr. Tyler had long ago, in the case of Giles and Brent, above mentioned, placed himself unmistakably upon record. His colleague, Benjamin Watkins Leigh, was known to entertain similar views. On receiving the instructions, both senators refused to obey them. Both voted against the Benton resolutions, but Mr. Leigh kept his seat, while Mr. Tyler resigned and returned home, 29 Feb., 1836. About this time the followers of Calhoun were bringing forward what was known as the "gag resolution" against all petitions and motions relating in any way to the abolition of slavery. (See ATHERTON, CHARLES G.) Mr. Tyler's resignation occurred before this measure was adopted, but his opinions on the subject were clearly pronounced. He condemned the measure as impolitic, because it yoked together the question as to the right of petition and the question as to slavery, and thus gave a distinct moral advantage to the Abolitionists. On the seventh anniversary of the Virginia colonization society, 10 Jan., 1838, he was chosen its president. In the spring election of that year he was returned to the Virginia legislature. In January, 1839, his friends put him forward for re-election to the U. S. senate, and in the memorable contest that ensued, in which William C. Rives was his principal competitor, the result was a deadlock, and the question was indefinitely postponed before any choice had been made.

Meanwhile the financial crisis of 1837—the most severe, in many respects, that has ever been known in this country—had wrecked the administration of President Van Buren. The causes of that crisis, indeed, lay deeper than any acts of any administration. The primary cause was the sudden development of wild speculation in western lands, consequent upon the rapid building of railroads, which would probably have brought about a general prostration of credit, even if President Jackson had never made war upon the United States bank. But there is no doubt that some measures of Jackson's administration—such as the removal of the deposits and their lodgment in the so-called "pet banks," the distribution of the surplus followed by the sudden stoppage of distribution, and the sharpness of the remedy supplied by the specie circular—had much to do with the virulence of the crisis. For the moment it seemed to many people that all the evil resulted from the suppression of the bank, and that the proper cure was the reinstatement of the bank, and because President Van Buren was too wise and clear-sighted to lend his aid to such a policy, his chances for re-election were ruined. The cry for the moment was that the hard-hearted administration was doing nothing to relieve the distress of the people, and there was a general combination against Van Buren. For the single purpose of defeating him, all differences of policy were for the moment subordinated. In the Whig convention at Harrisburg, 4 Dec., 1839, no platform of principles was adopted. Gen. Harrison was again nominated for the presidency, as a candidate fit to conciliate the anti-Masons and National Republicans whom Clay had offended, and Mr. Tyler was nominated for the vice-presidency in order to catch the votes of such Democrats as were dissatisfied with the administration. In the uproarious canvass that followed there was probably less appeal to sober reason and a more liberal use of clap-trap than in any other presidential contest in our history. Borne upon a great wave of popular excitement, "Tippecanoe, and Tyler too," were carried to the White House. By the death of President Harrison, 4 April, 1841, just a month after the inauguration, Mr. Tyler became president of the United States. The situation thus developed was not long in producing startling results. Although no platform had been adopted in the nominating convention, it soon appeared that Mr. Clay and his friends intended to use their victory in support of the old National Republican policy of a national bank, a high tariff, and internal improvements. Doubtless most people who voted for Harrison did so in the belief that his election meant the victory of Clay's doctrines and the re-establishment of the United States bank. Mr. Clay's own course, immediately after the inauguration, showed so plainly that he regarded the election as his own victory that Gen. Harrison felt called upon to administer a rebuke to him. "You seem to forget, sir," said he, "that it is I who am president."

Tyler, on the other hand, regarded the Whig triumph as signifying the overthrow of what he considered a corrupt and tyrannical faction led by Jackson, Van Buren, and Benton; he professed to regard the old National Republican doctrines as virtually postponed by the alliance between them and his own followers. In truth, it was as ill-yoked an alliance as ever was made. The elements of a fierce quarrel were scarcely concealed, and the removal of President Harrison was all that was needed to kindle the flames of strife. "Tyler dares not resist," said Clay; "I'll drive him before me." On the other hand, the new president declared: "I pray you to believe that my back is to the wall, and that, while I shall deplore the assaults, I shall, if practicable, beat back the assailants"; and he was as good as his word. Congress met in extra session, 31 May, 1841, the senate standing 28 Whigs to 22 Democrats, the house 133 Whigs to 108 Democrats. In his opening message President Tyler briefly recounted the recent history of the United States bank, the sub-treasury system, and other financial schemes, and ended with the precautionary words: "I shall be ready to concur with you in the adoption of such system as you may propose, reserving to myself the ultimate power of rejecting any measure which may, in my view of it, conflict with the constitution or otherwise jeopard the prosperity of the country, a power which I could not part with, even if I would, but which I will not believe any act of yours will call into requisition." Congress disregarded the warning. The ground was cleared for action by a bill for abolishing Van Buren's sub-treasury system, which passed both houses and was signed by the president. But an amendment offered by Mr. Clay, for the repeal of the law of 1836 regulating the deposits in the state banks, was defeated by the votes of a small party led by William C. Rives. The great question then came up. On constitutional grounds, Mr. Tyler's objection to the United States bank had always been that congress had no power to create such a corporation within the limits of a state without the consent of the state ascertained beforehand. He did not deny, however, the power of congress to establish a district bank for the District of Columbia, and, provided the several states should consent, there seemed to be no reason why this district bank should not set up its branch offices all over the country. Mr. Clay's so-called "fiscal bank" bill of 1841 did not make proper provision for securing the assent of the states, and on that ground Mr. Rives proposed an amendment substituting a clause of a bill suggested by Thomas Ewing, secretary of the treasury, to the effect that such assent should be formally secured. Mr. Rives's amendment was supported not only by several "state-rights Whigs," but also by senators Richard H. Bayard and Rufus Choate, and other friends of Mr. Webster. If adopted, its effect would have been conciliatory, and it might perhaps have averted for a moment the rupture between the ill-yoked allies. The Democrats, well aware of this, voted against the amendment, and it was lost. The bill incorporating the fiscal bank of the United States was then passed by both houses, and on 16 Aug. was vetoed. An attempt to pass the bill over the veto failed of the requisite two-third majority.

The Whig leaders had already shown a disposition to entrap the president. Before the passage of Mr. Clay's bill, John Minor Botts was sent to the White House with a private suggestion for a compromise. Mr. Tyler refused to listen to the suggestion except with the understanding that, should it meet with his disapproval, he should not hear from it again. The suggestion turned out to be a proposal that congress should authorize the establishment of branches of the district bank in any state of which the legislature at its very next session should not expressly refuse its consent to any such proceeding; and that, moreover, in case the interests of the public should seem to require it, even such express refusal might be disregarded and overridden. By this means the obnoxious institution might first be established in the Whig states, and then forced upon the Democratic states in spite of themselves. The president indignantly rejected the suggestion as "a contemptible subterfuge, behind which he would not skulk." The device, nevertheless, became incorporated in Mr. Clay's bill, and it was pretended that it was put there in order to smooth the way for the president to adopt the measure, but that in his unreasonable obstinacy he refused to avail himself of the opportunity. After his veto of 16 Aug. these tortuous methods were renewed. Messengers went to and fro between the president and members of his cabinet on the one hand, and leading Whig members of congress on the other, conditional assurances were translated into the indicative mood, whispered messages were magnified and distorted, and presently appeared upon the scene an outline of a bill that it was assumed the president would sign. This new measure was known as the "fiscal corporation" bill. Like the fiscal bank bill, it created a bank in the District of Columbia, with branches throughout the states, and it made no proper provision for the consent of the states. The president had admitted that a "fiscal agency" of the United States government, established in Washington for the purpose of collecting, keeping, and disbursing the public revenue, was desirable if not indispensable; a regular bank of discount, engaged in commercial transactions throughout the states, and having the United States government as its principal share-holder and Federal officers exerting a controlling influence upon its directorship, was an entirely different affair—something, in his opinion, neither desirable nor permissible. In the "fiscal corporation" bill an attempt was made to hoodwink the president and the public by a pretence of forbidding discounts and loans and limiting the operations of the fiscal agency exclusively to exchanges. While this project was maturing, the Whig newspapers fulminated with threats against the president in case he should persist in his course; private letters warned him of plots to assassinate him, and Mr. Clay in the senate referred to his resignation in 1836, and asked why, if constitutional scruples again hindered him from obeying the will of the people, did he not now resign his lofty position and leave it for those who could be more compliant? To this it was aptly replied by Mr. Rives that "the president was an independent branch of the government as well as congress, and was not called upon to resign because he differed in opinion with them." Some of the Whigs seem really to have hoped that such a storm could be raised as would browbeat the president into resigning, whereby the government would be temporarily left in the hands of William L. Southard, then president pro tempore of the senate. But Mr. Tyler was neither to be hoodwinked nor bullied. The "fiscal corporation" bill was passed by the senate on Saturday, 4 Sept., 1841; on Thursday, the 9th, the president's veto message was received; on Saturday, the 11th, Thomas Ewing, secretary of the treasury, John Bell, secretary of war, George E. Badger, secretary of the navy, John J. Crittenden, attorney-general, and Francis Granger, postmaster-general, resigned their places. The adjournment of congress had been fixed for Monday, the 13th, and it was hoped that, suddenly confronted by a unanimous resignation of the cabinet and confused by want of time in which to appoint a new cabinet, the president would give up the game. But the resignation was not unanimous, for Daniel Webster, secretary of state, remained at his post, and on Monday morning the president nominated Walter Forward, of Pennsylvania, for secretary of the treasury; John McLean, of Ohio, for secretary of war; Abel P. Upshur, of Virginia, for secretary of the navy; Hugh S. Legaré, of South Carolina, for attorney-general; and Charles A. Wickliffe, of Kentucky, for postmaster-general. These appointments were duly confirmed.

Whether the defection of Mr. Webster at this moment would have been so fatal to the president as some of the Whigs were inclined to believe, may well be doubted, but there can be no doubt that his adherence to the president was of great value.

By remaining in the cabinet Mr. Webster showed himself too clear-sighted to contribute to a victory of which the whole profit would be reaped by his rival, Mr. Clay, and the president was glad to retain his hold upon so strong an element in the north as that which Mr. Webster represented. Some of the leading Whig members of congress now issued addresses to the people, in which they loudly condemned the conduct of the president and declared that "all political connection between them and John Tyler was at an end from that day forth." It was open war between the two departments of government. Although many Whig members, like Preston, Talmadge, Johnson, and Marshall, really sympathized with Mr. Tyler, only a few, commonly known as "the corporal's guard," openly recognized him as their leader. But the Democratic members came to his support as an ally against the Whigs. The state elections of 1841 showed some symptoms of a reaction in favor of the president's views, for in general the Whigs lost ground in them. As the spectre of the crisis of 1837 faded away in the distance, the people began to recover from the sudden and overmastering impulse that had swept the country in 1840, and the popular enthusiasm for the bank soon died away. Mr. Tyler had really won a victory of the first magnitude, as was conclusively shown in 1844, when the presidential platform of the Whigs was careful to make no allusion whatever to the bank. On this crucial question the doctrines of paternal government had received a crushing and permanent defeat. In the next session of congress the strife with the president was renewed: but it was now tariff, not bank, that furnished the subject of discussion. Diminished importations, due to the general prostration of business, had now diminished the revenue until it was insufficient to meet the expenses of government. The Whigs accordingly carried through congress a bill continuing the protective duties of 1833, and providing that the surplus revenue, which was thus sure soon to accumulate, should be distributed among the states. But the compromise act of 1833, in which Mr. Tyler had played an important part, had provided that the protective policy should come to an end in 1842. Both on this ground, and because of the provision for distributing the surplus, the president vetoed the new bill. Congress then devised and passed another bill, providing for a tariff for revenue, with incidental protection, but still contemplating a distribution of the surplus, if there should be any. The president vetoed this bill. Congress received the veto message with great indignation, and on the motion of ex-President John Q. Adams it was referred to a committee, which condemned it as an unwarrantable assumption of power, and after a caustic summary of Mr. Tyler's acts since his accession to office, concluded with a reference to impeachment. This report called forth from the president a formal protest; but the victory was already his. The Whigs were afraid to go before the country in the autumn elections with the tariff question unsettled, and the bill was accordingly passed by both houses, without the distributing clause, and was at once signed by the president. The distributing clause was then passed in a separate bill, but a "pocket veto" disposed of it. Congress adjourned on 31 Aug., 1842, and in the elections the Whig majority of twenty-five in the house of representatives gave place to a Democratic majority of sixty-one.

On the remaining question of National Republican policy, that of internal improvements, the most noteworthy action of President Tyler was early in 1844, when two river-and-harbor bills were passed by congress, the one relating to the eastern, the other to the western states. Mr. Tyler vetoed the former, but signed the latter, on the ground that the Mississippi river, as a great common highway for the commerce of the whole country, was the legitimate concern of the national government in a sense that was not true of any other American river. An unsuccessful attempt was made to pass the other bill over the veto. The rest of Mr. Tyler's administration was taken up with the Ashburton treaty with Great Britain (see WEBSTER, DANIEL), the Oregon question, and the annexation of Texas. Texas had won its independence from Mexico in 1836, and its governor, as well as the majority of its inhabitants, were citizens of the United States. From a broad national standpoint it was in every way desirable that Texas, as well as Oregon, should belong to our Federal Union. In the eastern states there was certainly a failure to appreciate the value of Oregon, which was nevertheless claimed as indisputably our property. On the other hand, it was felt, by a certain element in South Carolina, that if the northern states were to have ample room for expansion beyond the Rocky mountains, the southern states must have Texas added to their number as a counterpoise, or else the existence of slavery would be imperilled, and these fears were strengthened by the growth of anti-slavery sentiment at the north. The Whigs, who by reason of their tariff policy found their chief strength at the north, were disposed to avail themselves of this anti-slavery sentiment, and accordingly declared themselves opposed to the annexation of Texas. In the mean time the political pressure brought to bear upon Mr. Webster in Massachusetts induced resignation of his portfolio, and he was succeeded in the state department by Hugh S. Legaré, 9 May, 1843. In a few weeks Legaré was succeeded by Mr. Upshur, after whose death, on 28 Feb., 1844, the place was filled by John C. Calhoun. After a negotiation extending over two years, a treaty was concluded, 12 April, 1844, with the government of Texas, providing for annexation. The treaty was rejected by the senate, by a vote of 35 to 16, all the Whigs and seven Democrats voting in the negative. Thus by the summer of 1844 the alliance between the Whig party and Mr. Tyler's wing of the Democrats had passed away. At the same time the division among the Democrats, which had become marked during Jackson's administration, still continued; and while the opposition to Mr. Tyler was strong enough to prevent his nomination in the Democratic national convention, which met at Baltimore on 27 May, 1844, on the other hand he was able to prevent the nomination of Mr. Van Buren, who had declared himself opposed to the immediate annexation of Texas. The result was the nomination of James K. Polk, as a kind of compromise candidate, in so far as he belonged to the "loco-foco" wing of the party, but was at the same time in favor of annexation. On the same day, 27 May, another convention at Baltimore nominated Mr. Tyler for a second term. He accepted the nomination in order to coerce the Democrats into submitting to him and his friends a formal invitation to re-enter the ranks; and accordingly a meeting of Democrats at the Carleton house, New York, on 6 Aug., adopted a series of resolutions commending the principal acts of his administration, and entreating that in the general interests of the opposition he should withdraw. In response to this appeal, Mr. Tyler accordingly withdrew his name. The northern opposition to the annexation of Texas seemed to have weakened the strength of the Whigs in the south, and their candidate, Henry Clay, declared himself willing to see Texas admitted at some future time. But this device cut both ways; for while it was popular in the south, and is supposed to have acquired for Clay many pro-slavery votes, carrying for him Tennessee, North Carolina, Delaware, and Maryland by bare majorities, it certainly led many anti-slavery Whigs to throw away their votes upon the "Liberty" candidate, James G. Birney, and thus surrender New York to the Democrats. The victory of the Democrats in November was reflected in the course pursued in the ensuing congress. One of the party watchwords, in reference to the Oregon question, had been "fifty-four forty, or fight," and the house of representatives now proceeded to pass a bill organizing a territorial government for Oregon up to that parallel of latitude. The senate, however, laid the bill upon the table, because it prohibited slavery in the territory. A joint resolution for the annexation of Texas was passed by both houses. Proposals for prohibiting slavery there were defeated, and the affair was arranged by extending the Missouri compromise-line westward through the Texan territory to be acquired by the annexation. North of that line slavery was to be prohibited; south of it the question was to be determined by the people living on the spot. The resolutions were signed by President Tyler, and instructions in accordance therewith were despatched by him to Texas on the last day of his term of office, 3 March, 1845. The friends of annexation defended the constitutionality of this proceeding, and the opponents denounced it.

After leaving the White House, Mr. Tyler took up his residence on an estate that he had purchased three miles from Greenway, on the bank of James river. To this estate he gave the name of "Sherwood Forest," and there he lived the rest of his life. (See illustration on page 196.) In a letter published in the Richmond "Enquirer" on 17 Jan., 1861, he recommended a convention of border states—including New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Iowa, as well as Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, Kentucky, Tennessee, and Missouri—for the purpose of devising some method of adjusting the difficulties brought on by the secession of South Carolina. The scheme adopted by this convention was to be submitted to the other states, and, if adopted, was to be incorporated into the Federal constitution. In acting upon Mr. Tyler's suggestion, the Virginia legislature enlarged it into a proposal of a peace convention to be composed of delegates from all the states. At the same time Mr. Tyler was appointed a commissioner to President Buchanan, while Judge John Robertson was appointed commissioner to the state of South Carolina, the object being to persuade both parties to abstain from any acts of hostility until the proposed peace convention should have had an opportunity to meet and discuss the situation. In discharge of this mission Mr. Tyler arrived on 23 Jan. in Washington. President Buchanan declined to give any assurances, but in his message to congress, on 28 Jan., he deprecated a hasty resort to hostile measures. The peace convention, consisting of delegates from thirteen northern and seven border states, met at Washington on 4 Feb. and chose Mr. Tyler as its president. Several resolutions were adopted and reported to congress, 27 Feb.; but on 2 March they were rejected in the senate by a vote of 28 to 7, and two days later the house adjourned without having taken a vote upon them. On 28 Feb., anticipating the fate of the resolutions in congress, Mr. Tyler made a speech on the steps of the Exchange hotel in Richmond, and declared his belief that no arrangement could be made, and that nothing was left for Virginia but to act promptly in the exercise of her powers as a sovereign state. The next day he took his seat in the State convention, where he advocated the immediate passing of an ordinance of secession. His attitude seems to have been substantially the same that it had been twenty-eight years before, when he disapproved the heresy of nullification, but condemned with still greater emphasis the measures taken by President Jackson to suppress that heresy. This feeling that secession was unadvisable, but coercion wholly indefensible, was shared by Mr. Tyler with many people in the border states. On the removal of the government of the southern Confederacy from Montgomery to Richmond, in May, 1861, he was unanimously elected a member of the provisional congress of the Confederate states. In the following autumn he was elected to the permanent congress, but he died before taking his seat. His biography has been ably written by one of his younger sons, Lyon Gardiner Tyler, "Letters and Times of the Tylers" (2 vols., Richmond, 1884-'5). See also "Seven Decades of the Union," by Henry A. Wise (Philadelphia, 1872).—His wife, Letitia Christian, b. at Cedar Grove, New Kent co., Va., 12 Nov., 1790; d. in Washington, D. C., 9 Sept., 1842, was the daughter of Robert Christian, a planter in New Kent county, Va. She married Mr. Tyler on 29 March, 1813, and removed with him to his home in Charles City county. When he became president she accompanied him to Washington; but her health was delicate, and she died shortly afterward. Mrs. Tyler was unable to assume any social cares, and the duties of mistress of the White House devolved upon her daughter-in-law, Mrs. Robert Tyler. She possessed great beauty of person and of character, and, before the failure of her health, was especially fitted for a social life.—Their son, Robert, b. in New Kent county, Va., in 1818; d. in Montgomery, Ala., 3 Dec., 1877, was educated at William and Mary, and adopted the profession of law. He married Priscilla, a daughter of Thomas Apthorpe Cooper, the tragedian, in 1839, and when his father became president his wife assumed the duties of mistress of the White House till after Mrs. John Tyler's death, when they devolved upon her daughter, Mrs. Letitia Semple. Mr. Tyler removed to Philadelphia in 1843, practised law there, and held several civil offices. In 1844 he was elected president of the Irish repeal association. A little later he became prothonotary of the supreme court of Pennsylvania, and in 1858 he was chairman of the Democratic executive committee of the state. He removed to Richmond at the beginning of the civil war, and was appointed register of the treasury. After the war he edited the "Mail and Advertiser" in Montgomery, Ala. He published "Ahasuerus," a poem (New York, 1842); "Death, or Medora's Dream," a poem (1843); "Is Virginia a Repudiating State? and the States' Guarantee," two letters (Richmond, Va., 1858).—President Tyler's second wife, Julia Gardiner, b. on Gardiner's island, near Easthampton, N. Y., 4 May, 1820; d. in Richmond, Va., 10 July, 1889, was a descendant of the Gardiners of Gardiner's island. She was educated at the Chegary institute, New York city, spent several months in Europe, and in the winter of 1844 accompanied her father to Washington, D. C. A few weeks afterward he was killed by the explosion of a gun on the war-steamer "Princeton," which occurred during a pleasure excursion in which he and his daughter were of the presidential party. His body was taken to the White House, and Miss Gardiner, being thrown in the society of the president under these peculiar circumstances, became the object of his marked attention, which resulted in their marriage in New York city, 26 June, 1844. For the succeeding eight months she presided over the White House with dignity and grace, her residence there terminating with a birth-night ball on 22 Feb., 1845. Mrs. Tyler retired with her husband to "Sherwood Forest" in Virginia at the conclusion of his term, and after the civil war resided for several years at her mother's residence on Castleton Hill, Staten island, and subsequently in Richmond, Va. She was a convert to Roman Catholicism, and devoted to the charities of that church.—Her son, Lyon Gardiner, b. in Charles City county, Va., in August, 1853, was graduated at the University of Virginia in 1875, and then studied law. During his college course he was elected orator of the Jefferson society, and obtained a scholarship as best editor of the "Virginia University Magazine." In January, 1877, he was elected professor of belles-lettres in William and Mary college, which place he held until November, 1878, when he became head of a high-school in Memphis, Tenn. He settled in Richmond, Va., in 1882, and entered on the practice of law, also taking an active interest in politics. He was a candidate for the house of delegates in 1885, and again in 1887, when he was elected. In that body he advocated the bills to establish a labor bureau, to regulate child labor, and to aid William and Mary college. In 1888 he was elected president of William and Mary, which office he now fills. He has published "The Letters and Times of the Tylers" (2 vols., Richmond, 1884-'5).

TYLER, Moses Coit, educator, b. in Griswold, Conn., 2 Aug., 1835. He was graduated at Yale in 1857, studied theology there and at Andover, and was pastor of the 1st Congregational church, Poughkeepsie, N. Y., in 1860-'2. He was professor of the English language and literature in the University of Michigan in 1867-'81, and since that time has occupied the chair of American history in Cornell university. He was ordained deacon in the Protestant Episcopal church in St. Andrew's, Ann Arbor, Mich., 16 Oct., 1881, by Bishop Harris, and priest in St. John's, Ithaca, N. Y., in 1883, by Bishop Coxe. In 1873-'4 he was literary editor of "The Christian Union" in New York, and he has contributed to reviews and magazines. He received the degree of LL. D. from Wooster university in 1875, and that of L. H. D. from Columbia in 1888. Prof. Tyler has published "Brawnville Papers" (Boston, 1868); "History of American Literature" (first 2 vols., New York, 1878); "Manual of English Literature" (1879); and "Life of Patrick Henry" (Boston, 1888).

TYLER, Ransom Hebbard, author, b. in Leyden, Franklin co., Mass., 18 Nov., 1813; d. in Fulton, Oswego co., N. Y., 27 Nov., 1881. At an early age he removed with his parents to Oswego county, was educated at Mexico academy, N. Y., studied law, was admitted to the bar, and practised his profession in Fulton, where he was also president of a bank. He held various local offices, including those of district attorney and county judge for Oswego county, and was also a general in the New York state militia. He travelled in Europe, Asia, and Africa. Hamilton gave him the degree of M. A. in 1853. Judge Tyler edited the "Oswego Gazette," contributed to magazines, law-journals, and newspapers, and published "The Bible and Social Reform, or the Scriptures as a Means of Civilization" (Philadelphia, 1863); "American Ecclesiastical Law" (Albany, 1866); "Commentaries on the Law of Infancy and Covertures" (1868); "Ejectment and Adverse Enjoyment" (1870); "Tyler on Usury, Pawns, and Loans" (1873); "Tyler on Boundaries, Fences, and Window-Lights" (1874); "On Fixtures" (1877); and biographical sketches of early settlers of Oswego county.

TYLER, Robert Ogden, soldier, b. in Greene county, N. Y., 22 Dec., 1831; d. in Boston, Mass., 1 Dec., 1874. When he was seven years old his parents took him to Hartford, Conn., and he was appointed from that state to the U. S. military academy, where he was graduated in 1853. He was assigned to the 3d artillery, and served on frontier duty till the civil war, being engaged against hostile Indians in the Spokane expedition of 1858. In April, 1861, he was on the expedition to relieve Fort Sumter, and witnessed its bombardment, and on 17 May, after opening communication through Baltimore in command of a light battery, after the attack on the 6th Massachusetts regiment, he was made assistant quartermaster with rank of captain, and served in the defences of Washington. On 29 Aug., at the special request of the Connecticut authorities, he was allowed by the war department to undertake the reorganization of the 4th Connecticut regiment, which had become demoralized, and was commissioned its colonel. Under Col. Tyler the regiment became one of the best in the army, and in January, 1862, it was made the 2d Connecticut heavy artillery. With it he took part in the peninsular campaign, and on 29 Nov., 1862, he was made brigadier-general of volunteers. At Fredericksburg he had charge of the artillery of the centre grand division and was brevetted major for gallantry, and on 2 May, 1863, he was given command of the artillery reserve of the Army of the Potomac. In this capacity he did efficient service at Chancellorsville, at Gettysburg, where two horses were shot under him, and in the Rapidan campaign. He was subsequently a division commander in the 22d corps, covering Washington, and in May, 1864, was assigned a division of heavy artillery that acted as infantry. On 19 May, while on the extreme right in the actions about Spottsylvania, he drove back an attack of Ewell's corps, and was publicly thanked, with his men, by Gen. Meade for "gallant conduct and brilliant success." At Cold Harbor he led a brigade of picked regiments and received a severe wound in the ankle which lamed him for life and permanently shattered his constitution. He saw no more active service. At the close of the war he had received the brevets of lieutenant-colonel for Gettysburg, colonel for Spottsylvania, major-general of volunteers and brigadier-general, U. S. army, for Cold Harbor, and major-general, U. S. army, for service throughout the war. The Connecticut legislature thanked him in a resolution, and the citizens of Hartford presented him with a sword. After the war Gen. Tyler served as chief in the quartermaster's department successively at Charleston, Louisville, San Francisco, New York city, and Boston, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel.

TYLER, Royall, jurist, b. in Boston, Mass., 18 July, 1757; d. in Brattleborough, Vt., 16 Aug., 1826. He studied law in the office of John Adams and was for a short time aide to Gen. Benjamin Lincoln, in which station he served in the Shays rebellion in 1786. In 1790 he settled as a lawyer in Guilford, Vt. In 1794 he was made a judge of the supreme court, and in 1800 he became chief justice. Judge Tyler published "Reports of Cases in the Supreme Court of Vermont" (2 vols., 1809). He was also a successful dramatist and the author of "The Contrast," the first American play ever acted on a regular stage by an established company of comedians. In this comedy the Yankee dialect and story-telling, now very familiar, were first employed. It was produced in New York in 1786. He also wrote "May-Day, or New York in an Uproar" (1787); "The Georgia Spec. or Land in the Moon" (1797); and "The Algerine Captive," a fictitious memoir (2 vols., 1799). Judge Tyler contributed to the "Farmer's Weekly Museum," published at Walpole, N. H., a melange of light verse and social and political squibs purporting to come "from the shop of Messrs. Colon and Spondee." He contributed to the "Portfolio" "An Author's Evenings," a series of papers that were subsequently collected in a volume and entitled "The Spirit of the Farmer's Museum and Lay Preacher's Gazette." He also wrote for the "New England Galaxy" and other journals, besides composing a variety of songs, odes, and prologues.—His son, Edward Royall, clergyman, b. in Guilford, Vt., in 1800; d. in New Haven, Conn., 28 Sept., 1848, was graduated at Yale in 1825 and at the divinity-school in 1828. He was pastor of the South church in Middletown, Conn., from 1827 till 1832, and of the Congregational church in Colebrook, Conn., in 1833-'6. In 1836-'7 he was agent of the American anti-slavery society. From 1838 till 1842 he was editor of the "Connecticut Observer," and he was the founder, editor, and proprietor of the "New Englander."

TYLER, Samuel, author, b. in Prince George county, Md., 22 Oct., 1809; d. in Georgetown, D. C., 15 Dec., 1878. His father, Grafton, was a tobacco-planter. The son was educated at Dr. James Carnahan's school in Georgetown, devoting himself especially to Greek. He studied at Middlebury in 1827, and, after reading law, was admitted to the bar in 1831, and began to practise in Frederick, Md. In 1852 he was elected one of three commissioners to simplify the pleadings and practice in all the courts of the state, and rendered important service in this capacity. His report, a profound discussion on the relative merits of the common and civil law, won wide approbation. In 1867 he was elected professor of law in Columbian college (now university), Washington, D. C., which office he held until his death. He received the degree of LL. D. from the College of South Carolina in 1858, and from Columbia in 1859. Early devoting himself to metaphysics, he contributed articles on this subject to various magazines, one of which, a "Discourse on the Baconian Philosophy," published in the "Princeton Review," was afterward issued in book-form (Baltimore, 1844). This "Discourse" gained him the friendship and correspondence of Sir William Hamilton, the Scottish philosopher, who wrote to the author in 1848, advising him to abandon the practice of law and to devote himself exclusively to philosophy. On the death of her husband, Lady Hamilton presented Mr. Tyler with a portrait of Sir William as a token of her esteem. He also published "Robert Burns as a Poet and as a Man" (New York, 1848); "The Progress of Philosophy in the Past and in the Future" (Philadelphia, 1858; 2d ed., 1868); and a "Memoir of Roger Brooke Taney" (Baltimore, 1872).

TYLER, William, R. C. bishop, b. in Derby, Vt., 5 June, 1806; d. in Providence R. I., 18 June, 1849. At the age of sixteen he became a Roman Catholic, with his parents and all the members of his family. He was educated at a seminary that was conducted by his uncle, the Rev. Virgil Barber, at Claremont, N. H., studied theology under the guidance of Bishop Fenwick, and was ordained a priest in 1828. He was stationed at the cathedral at Boston for several years, and was then sent to Aroostook, but returned to Boston, and was appointed vicar-general. In 1843 the new diocese of Hartford was created, and Father Tyler was nominated its first bishop. He was consecrated on 17 March, 1844, and went to Providence, R. I., which he made his episcopal residence. Although he was subject to constant illness, his administration was active and successful, and, principally through the aid he received from missionary societies in Europe, he increased largely the number of churches and priests. Bishop Tyler took part in the sixth and seventh councils of Baltimore.

TYLER, William Seymour, clergyman, b. in Hartford, Susquehanna co., Pa., 2 Sept., 1810. Job, his ancestor, was an early settler of Andover, Mass. After graduation at Amherst in 1830, William was tutor there until 1834, and studied in Andover theological seminary. He was licensed to preach in 1836, and from that date until 1847 was professor of Latin and Greek at Amherst, but since 1847 he has been professor of Greek only. On 6 Oct., 1859, he was ordained without charge by a Congregational council at Amherst, and, although he was never a pastor, he has frequently preached in turn with the other professors of the college, and often as a supply for churches. He has twice visited Europe and the East. Harvard gave him the degree of D. D. in 1857, and Amherst that of LL. D. in 1871. He is the author of "Germania and Agricola of Tacitus with Notes for Colleges" (New York, 1847; enlarged eds., 1852 and 1878); "Histories of Tacitus" (1848); "Prayer for Colleges" (1854; revised and enlarged repeatedly); "Plato's Apology and Crito" (1859); "Memoir of Dr. Henry Lobdell, Missionary to Assyria" (Boston, 1859); "Theology of the Greek Poets" (1867); "Plutarch on the Delay of the Deity," with Prof. Horatio B. Hackett (New York, 1867); "Address at Semi-Centennial of Amherst College, with other Addresses on that Occasion" (1871); "History of Amherst College" (1873); "Demosthenes de Corona" (Boston, 1874); "Demosthenes's Philippics and Olynthiacs" (1875); and nine books of the "Iliad" (New York, 1886).

TYNDALE, Hector, soldier, b. in Philadelphia, 24 March, 1821; d. there, 19 March, 1880. His father was a merchant engaged in the importation of china and glassware, and young Tyndale succeeded to the business in 1845, in partnership with his brother-in-law, Edward P. Mitchell. He made several tours of Europe, inspecting closely all the chief factories, and becoming practically familiar with the whole art of pottery. His natural taste, thus cultivated, made him a most expert connoisseur, and led to his selection in 1876 as one of the judges of that section of the Centennial exhibition, in which capacity he wrote the elaborate report on pottery. His private collection was one of the most complete in the country. He first became interested in politics in 1856 as a Free-soiler, and was a member of the first Republican committee in Philadelphia. He was not an Abolitionist, and had neither knowledge of nor sympathy with John Brown's raid, but when Mrs. Brown came to Philadelphia on her way to pay her last visit to her husband and bring back his body after his execution, she was without escort and was believed to be in personal danger. An appeal was made to Tyndale, who at once accepted the risks and dangers of escorting her. In the course of this self-imposed duty he was subjected to insults and threats, and on the morning of the execution was shot at by an unseen assassin. It had been threatened in the more violent newspapers of the south that John Brown's body should not be restored to his friends, but ignominiously treated, and a "nigger's" body substituted for his friends. When the coffin was delivered to Tyndale by the authorities, he refused to receive it until it was opened and the body was identified. He was in Europe when he heard the news of the firing on Fort Sumter, and at once returned home and offered his services to the government. He was commissioned major of the 28th Pennsylvania regiment in June, 1861, and in August was put in command of Sandy Hook, opposite Harper's Ferry. The regiment fought in twenty-four battles and nineteen smaller engagements, in all of which Tyndale took part, except when he was disabled by wounds. He was promoted to lieutenant-colonel in April, 1862, and served in Gen. Nathaniel P. Banks's corps in the Shenandoah valley, under Gen. John Pope at Chantilly and the second battle of Bull Run, and later in Gen. Joseph K. F. Mansfield's corps. At Antietam, as the senior officer, he commanded a brigade in Gen. George S. Greene's division of the 12th corps, holding the ground in front of the Dunker church against three separate assaults of the enemy, in which the brigade captured seven battle-flags and four guns. Early in the day he received a wound in the hip, but he kept the field until the afternoon, when he was struck in the head by a musket-ball and carried off the field. For "conspicuous gallantry, self-possession, and good judgment at Antietam" he was promoted to brigadier-general of volunteers, 29 Nov., 1862. After slow and partial recovery from his wounds he applied for active duty, and in May, 1863, was assigned to a brigade under Gen. Erasmus D. Keyes near Yorktown, and served with the Army of the Potomac until September, when he was sent with Gen. Joseph Hooker to the relief of Chattanooga. In the battle of Wauhatchie he carried by a bayonet charge a hill (subsequently known as Tyndale's hill), thus turning the flank of the enemy and relieving Gen. John W. Geary's division from an assault by superior numbers. He also participated in the series of battles around Chattanooga, and in the march to the relief of Knoxville. He was sent home on sick-leave in May, 1864, and, finding his disability likely to be lasting, he resigned in August. In March, 1865, he was brevetted major-general of volunteers for gallant and meritorious services during the war. In 1868 he was the Republican nominee for mayor of Philadelphia, and was defeated by 68 votes in a poll of more than 120,000. In 1872 his kinsman, Prof. John Tyndall, of London, delivered a series of lectures in this country, and resolving to devote the proceeds to the establishment of a fund "for the promotion of science in the United States by the support in European universities or elsewhere of American pupils who may evince decided talents in physics," he appointed Gen. Tyndale with Prof. Joseph Henry and Dr. Edward L. Youmans trustees. Prof. Tyndall in 1885 changed the trust and established three scholarships, in Harvard, Columbia, and the University of Pennsylvania. The last-named institution called its share the Hector Tyndale scholarship in physics.

TYNER, James Noble, postmaster-general, b. in Brookville, Ind., 17 Jan., 1826. He was graduated at Brookville academy in 1844, and from 1846 till 1854 was associated with his father in business. He then studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1857, and practised in Peru, Ind. He was secretary of the Indiana senate in 1857-'61, a presidential elector in 1860, and from 1861 till 1866 served as a special agent of the post-office department. He was chosen to congress as a Republican, to fill the vacancy caused by the election of Daniel D. Pratt to the U. S. senate, and served from 1869 till 1875, being a member of the committees on appropriations and post-offices. President Grant then appointed him second assistant postmaster-general, and from the resignation of Marshall Jewell till the end of Grant's administration, 3 March, 1877, he was postmaster-general. In April, 1877, he became first assistant postmaster-general, which office he resigned in October, 1881. Mr. Tyner was the delegate from the United States to the International postal congress in Paris in 1878.

TYNG, Dudley Atkins, lawyer, b. in Newburyport, Mass., 3 Sept., 1760; d. there, 1 Aug., 1829. He was a son of Dudley Atkins, and changed his name on inheriting the estates of James Tyng, of Tyngsborough, Mass. After serving as U. S. collector of Newburyport, he succeeded Ephraim

Hector Tyndale

onel in April, 1862, and served in Gen. Nathaniel P. Banks's corps in the Shenandoah valley, under Gen. John Pope at Chantilly and the second battle

Williams as reporter of the Massachusetts supreme court, holding this office until his death. He edited "Reports of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, September, 1804, to March, 1822" (17 vols., Newburyport, 1805-'23).—His son, Stephen Higginson, clergyman, b. in Newburyport, Mass., 1 March, 1800; d. in Irvington, N. Y., 4 Sept., 1885, was graduated at Harvard in 1817, and for two years was occupied in mercantile pursuits. He then studied theology in Bristol, R. I., under the direction and oversight of Bishop Griswold in 1819-'21, and was ordained to the ministry of the Protestant Episcopal church by the same bishop, 4 March, 1821. His first parish was in Georgetown, D. C., in 1821-'3, and then he was rector of Queen Anne parish, Prince George co., Md., in 1823-'9. He was called to the rectorship of St. Paul's church, Philadelphia, in 1829, then to the Church of the Epiphany in 1833, where he served for twelve years. In 1844 he was invited to St. George's church, New York city, where, entering upon his duties in 1845, he labored for more than thirty years as rector, and was retired as rector emeritus in 1878. He received the degree of D. D. from Jefferson college, Pa., in 1832, and from Harvard in 1851. He was distinguished for eloquence in the pulpit, and also for able and effective temperance and patriotic addresses. For many years he was a leader among that part of the clergy known as low churchmen. He was active in organizing the Evangelical knowledge society, the American church missionary society, and the Evangelical education society, and was editor for several years of "The Episcopal Recorder" and "The Protestant Churchman." Dr. Tyng held a ready pen, and published numerous volumes of interest and value. Chief among these were "Lectures on the Law and the Gospel" (Philadelphia, 1832); "Memoir of Rev. Gregory T. Bedell" (1835); "Sermons preached in the Church of the Epiphany" (1839; republished as "The Israel of God," 1854); "Recollections of England" (New York, 1847); "Christ is All," sermons (1852); "The Rich Kinsman: the History of Ruth, the Moabitess" (London, 1856); "Forty Years' Experience in Sunday-Schools" (New York, 1860); "The Captive Orphan: Esther, the Queen of Persia" (1860); "The Prayer-Book Illustrated by Scripture" (8 vols., 1863-'7); "The Child of Prayer, a Father's Memorial of D. A. Tyng" (1866); and "The Office and Duty of a Christian Pastor" (1874). Bishop Bedell, of Ohio, published an interesting "Memorial of the Rev. Dr. Tyng" (New York, 1886), and his son, C. Rockland Tyng, is writing his life.—Stephen Higginson's son, Dudley Atkins, clergyman, b. in Prince George county, Md., 12 Jan., 1825; d. in Brookfield, near Philadelphia, Pa., 19 April, 1858, was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1843, studied theology at Alexandria seminary, Va., and took orders in the Protestant Episcopal church in 1846. He was assistant to his father at St. George's church, New York, held charges in Columbus, Ohio, Charlestown, Va., and Cincinnati, Ohio, and was rector of the Church of the Epiphany, Philadelphia, from 1854 until shortly before his death, when he was obliged to leave his pastorate in consequence of his opposition to slavery. A new parish, under the title of the Church of the Covenant, was then organized for him. He was also known as a lecturer on religious and secular subjects. He was the author of "Vital Truth and Deadly Error" (Philadelphia, 1852); "Children of the Kingdom, or Lectures on Family Worship" (1854; republished as "God in our Dwelling," London, 4th ed., 1859); and "Our Country's Troubles" (Philadelphia, 1856-'7; New York, 1864). See "The Child of Prayer, a Father's Memorial of the Rev. Dudley A. Tyng," by Stephen H. Tyng (New York and London, 1888). His death was the result of an accident.—Another son of Stephen Higginson, Stephen Higginson, clergyman, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 28 June, 1839, was graduated at Williams in 1858, studied theology at the Alexandria seminary, Va., and was ordained deacon, 8 May, 1861. He assisted his father at St. George's church, New York, in 1861-'3, was made priest, 11 Sept., 1863, and became rector of the Church of the Mediator, New York. In 1864 he served in the U. S. army as chaplain of the 12th New York volunteers. In 1865 he organized the parish of the Holy Trinity, New York, building, on Forty-second street, a church that was replaced by a larger edifice in 1873-'4, and of which he had charge till his resignation in April, 1881. After that he was manager of the interests of a large insurance company in Paris, and he still (1889) resides there. In 1867 Dr. Tyng was tried by an ecclesiastical tribunal for preaching in a Methodist church in New Jersey, which was a violation of the canon law of the church. He was found guilty, and was censured by the bishop of New York. An official account of this trial was published by the diocese of New York (1868). He took an active part in the revival movement of 1875, directed by Moody and Sankey, and in the summer of 1876 he began Sunday services in a tent near his church. He was also active in building mission-chapels. In 1864-'70 he edited "The Working Church" and "The Christian at Work." Williams gave him the degree of D. D. in 1872, and he was a trustee of that college from 1872 till 1884. He has published "The Square of Life" (New York, 1876); "He will Come" (1877); and several volumes of sermons entitled "The Peoples' Pulpit."

TYNG, Edward, naval officer, b. in Massachusetts in 1683; d. in Boston, Mass., 8 Sept., 1755. His father, Edward, a councillor, was appointed governor of Annapolis, N. S., but was captured by the French on his passage and taken to France, where he died. The son was commissioned captain of the south and north batteries and fortifications in Boston on 16 April, 1740, and, succeeding Capt. Southac as commander of the vessel "Prince of Orange," he took the first privateer on this coast, 24 June, 1744. He commanded the frigate "Massachusetts" in the expedition against Cape Breton in 1745, and was made commodore of the provincial fleet. He also captured the "Vigilante," a French man-of-war of sixty-four guns.

TYRKER, the German foster-father of Leif, son of Eric the Red, lived in the 11th century. He accompanied Leif on his voyage of discovery in the year 1000. After the Scandinavian navigator had built Leifsbudir, near the present site of Newport, R. I., as is supposed by many, he divided his men into two parties, which alternated in exploring the neighborhood. He cautioned his followers to keep together and return to sleep at their quarters. But one evening Tyrker did not return with his party. In great sorrow Leif, at the head of twelve men, went in search of him. He had not gone far when he discovered the old German, evidently greatly excited and gesticulating wildly. "Why, my fosterer," cried Leif, "have you come so late? What made you leave your companions?" Tyrker answered in German, but, remembering that the Scandinavians could not understand him, he spoke, after some time, in Norsk. "I have not gone very far; still I have some news for you. I have discovered vines loaded with grapes." "Are you telling the truth, my fosterer?" exclaimed Leif. "I am sure of telling the truth," he returned, "for in my native land there are vines in plenty." This caused Leif to give the country the name of Vinland. See Adam of Bremen's "Historia Ecclesiastica."

TYSON, Elisha, philanthropist, b. in Montgomery county, Pa., in 1749; d. in Baltimore, Md., 16 Feb., 1824. He was a member of the Society of Friends, and an early member of the Maryland society for the abolition of slavery, appeared frequently before the judicial tribunals in behalf of negroes, and procured the passage of several laws to ameliorate their condition. In 1818 he retired from business to devote his attention to the abolition movement, and established the Protection society of Maryland, to insure the colored population of the state the enjoyment of their legal privileges. See his "Life," by a citizen of Baltimore (Baltimore, 1825).—His grandson, Philip Thomas, chemist, b. in Baltimore, Md., 23 June, 1799; d. there, 16 Dec., 1877, was educated in his native city. At the beginning of the gold fever he went to California, and there made numerous geological researches. On his return he published "Geology and Industrial Resources of California" (Baltimore, 1851). In 1856 he was appointed state agricultural chemist, which place he held until 1860, and in that capacity made two biennial reports that were published by the house of delegates of Maryland (2 vols., Annapolis, 1860-2). He was first president of the Maryland academy of sciences, and contributed papers to its proceedings.

TYSON, James, physician, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 26 Oct., 1841. His father, Henry (1815-72), was graduated at Pennsylvania medical college in 1843, and practised in Reading until his death. He was active in prison-reform, and established the first Sunday-school in the Hicksite Society of Friends. The son was graduated at Haverford college, Pa., in 1860, and at the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania in 1863. He was appointed lecturer on microscopy there in 1868, and on urinary chemistry in 1870. In 1870-'8 he was professor of physiology and microscopy in the Pennsylvania college of dental surgery. On the organization of the new university hospital in 1874 he was made lecturer on pathological anatomy and histology. In 1876 he was elected professor of general pathology and morbid anatomy in the medical department of the university. He is now (1889) dean of the medical faculty, president of the board of the Philadelphia hospital, and a member of various medical societies. In 1871-'2 he assisted in editing the "Philadelphia Medical Times," and he also edited four volumes of the publications of the Pathological society of Philadelphia (1871-'7). In addition to numerous papers on histology and pathology, and clinical lectures, he has published "The Cell Doctrine: its History and Present State" (Philadelphia, 1870); "An Introduction to Practical Histology" (1873); "Practical Examination of the Urine" (1875); and "A Treatise on Bright's Disease and Diabetes" (1881).

TYSON, Job Roberts, lawyer, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 8 Feb., 1803; d. at Woodlawn Hall, Montgomery co., Pa., 27 June, 1858. Entering business at an early age, he devoted his leisure to self-education, became a proficient linguist, and taught in Hamburg, Pa., and afterward in the first public school of the state, which was established in 1822. At this period he was director of the public schools of Pennsylvania, a member of the prison society, manager of the apprentice's library, and among the first to organize the temperance movement in Pennsylvania. He was admitted to the bar in 1827, and became solicitor for the Pennsylvania railroad, the completion of which had been secured mainly through his efforts. He was a member of the city council and of the legislature, and was elected to congress as a Whig, serving from 3 Dec., 1855, till 3 March, 1857. Dickinson gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1851. Mr. Tyson was instrumental in the publication of the archives of Pennsylvania. He was vice-president of the Historical society of Pennsylvania, and vice-provost of the Philadelphia law academy. He was the author of an "Essay on the Penal Laws of Pennsylvania" (Philadelphia, 1827); "The Lottery System of the United States" (1833); "Social and Intellectual State of the Colony of Pennsylvania Prior to 1743" (1843); "Discourse on the 200th Anniversary of the Birth of William Penn" (1844); "Letters on the Resources and Commerce of Philadelphia" (1852); and a "Report on the Arctic Explorations of Dr. Elisha K. Kane," with a resolution to provide for the publication of Dr. Kane's book by congress, which was adopted by the house. His reports on the Delaware breakwater, and suggestions for improvement of the navigation of that river, exhibit a clear comprehension of the commercial interests of his state and city. He had collected material for a history of Pennsylvania.

TYTLER, James, scholar, b. in Brechin, Forfarshire, Scotland, in 1747; d. near Salem, Mass., in 1805. He was educated for the church, and afterward for the medical profession. He was commonly called "Balloon Tytler," from being the first in Scotland to ascend in a fire-balloon on the plan of Montgolfier. He belonged to the Friends of the People, and, to avoid political persecution, fled to Ireland about 1793, and to this country about 1796. He was drowned near Salem, Mass. Robert Burns describes him as "a mortal who, though he drudges about Edinburgh as a common printer, with leaky shoes, a sky-lighted hat, and knee-buckles as unlike as George-by-the-grace-of-God and Solomon-the-son-of-David, yet that same unknown mortal is author and compiler of three fourths of Elliot's pompous 'Encyclopædia Britannica,' which he composed at half a guinea a week!" Besides contributing to magazines, he was the author of anonymous works and of popular songs, including "I ha'e laid a Herring in Saut," or "I canna Come ilka Day to Woo," and "The Pleasures of the Abbey." His publications include "Essays on the Most Important Subjects of Natural and Revealed Religion," which he set in type without manuscript in Holyrood (Edinburgh, 1772); "System of Geography" (1788); "History of Edinburgh"; "Geographical, Historical, and Commercial Grammar" (2 vols.); "Review of Dritchken's Theory of Inflammation"; "Answer to Paine's 'Age of Reason'"; "On the Excise"; "System of Surgery"; and "Treatise on the Plague and Yellow Fever" (Salem, 1799).

U

UBILLA, Andrés (oo-beel'-yah), Mexican R. C. bishop, b. in Guipuzcoa, Spain, about 1540; d. in Chiapa, Mexico, in 1601. He went in his youth with his parents to Mexico, where he entered the Dominican order in 1559, and was graduated in law and theology in 1568. He became professor of theology in the University of Mexico, superior of the convents of Mexico and Oaxaca, rector of the College of San Luis de la Puebla, and provincial of his order in 1582. In 1589 he went to Spain to complain against the viceroy, the Marquis of Villamanrique, who was oppressing the Indians, and by his dispute with the audiencia of Guadalajara threatened to precipitate a civil war. Ubilla was well received by King Philip II., obtaining the removal of Villamanrique and the appointment of Luis de Velasco. Shortly after his return to Mexico, Ubilla was appointed bishop of Chiapa and consecrated in 1592. He founded during his government a convent for the nuns of the Incarnation, extended his cathedral, and added to his diocese the province of Soconusco, which had belonged to Guatemala. In 1600 he was named bishop of Michoacan, but he died before receiving the papal bull of confirmation. Besides many Latin works on ecclesiastical law which are in the Dominican convent of Oaxaca, he wrote "El Sitio y Destrucción de Jerusalem por Tito y Vespasiano," a manuscript in the Aztec language, which formerly was in the Franciscan convent of Texcoco, but is now preserved in the National library of Mexico.

UFFENBACH, Bernard von (oof-fen-bok). German historian, b. in Liebenenthal in 1691; d. in Vienna in 1759. He received his education at Vienna, became a Jesuit when he was twenty-three years of age, and in 1722 was sent to the South American missions. After residing for some time at Montevideo, where he learned the Indian tongues, he became a missionary among the Guaranis, with whom he lived about twenty years. He also studied the customs, manners, and habits of the Indians, took detailed notes of his observations and of the natural resources of the country, and formed valuable collections in natural history. He returned to Germany about 1745, and was presented to Prince Lichtenstein, who appointed him librarian. Father Uffenbach lived in Vienna, became a favorite in society, and was received at the imperial court, where he narrated stories of Indian life and the experiences of the early Spanish adventurers. His works include "Historia de Guaranibus" (2 vols., Vienna, 1755), and "Guarani Lexicon," which is considered as the only reliable monument that is left of the Guarani language (1756). In his "Litteræ annuæ Societatis Jesu," sent from South America from 1739 till 1744, and afterward collected and edited by Johann Theophilus Büshing (1785), are to be found interesting details about the country of the Guaranis and the Jesuit missions in South America. Uffenbach's collections in natural history are preserved in the museum at Vienna, and were utilized for an "Historia naturalis Americæ meridionalis" (4 vols., Vienna, 1790).

UGARTE, Juan (oo-gar'-tay), Mexican clergyman, b. in San Miguel, Teguzigalpa, Honduras, 22 July, 1662; d. in San Pablo, Sonora, 29 Dec., 1730. He entered the Society of Jesus in August, 1679, and was afterward professor of Latin in Zacatecas and of philosophy in Mexico, where he learned the Indian languages. In 1700 he devoted himself to the Californian missions, and spent about thirty years in evangelizing the natives. Finding that the guard of soldiers that accompanied him deterred them from approaching him, he dismissed it after reaching the country of the Yaquis, where he founded the missions of San Javier, San Pablo, Santa Rosalia, and San Miguel. He then joined Father Salvatierra in Loreto, and was successful in his missionary labors, teaching the natives agriculture, the art of spinning and weaving, how to build cottages, and even how to prepare vessels for sea. In 1705 he visited the coast of Sinaloa to find a good port for the Manila fleet, but without success, and in 1708 was directed by the Spanish government to explore the Gulf of California. With the aid of his converts, he built a vessel which he called the "Triumph of the Cross," and manned it with twenty-six Chinese and native Californians. He landed among the Tepoquis and Seris, by whom he was well received, and reached the mouth of Colorado river, which violent storms prevented him from ascending. After encountering many dangers, the little vessel returned to Loreto. Ugarte was successful in the object of his mission. He proved that California was a peninsula, gave for the first time a proper idea of the coast, and noted such places as would be afterward suitable for missionary stations. He subsequently founded several missions, of which the principal were San Luis de Gonzaga, consisting of two villages, and Our Lady of Guadalupe, of six villages. He wrote "Noticia del Viage de la Balandra nombrada el Triunfo de la Santa Cruz, hecho en 1709 al Golfo de Californias, y Costa del Sur de la América Septentrional" and "Diarios, Relaciones, y Cartas de las Cosas de Californias." Miguel Venegas used these manuscripts in his "Historia de Californias."

UHLAND, Maximilian (oo'-lond), called FATHER BERNARDINO DE SAN JOSÉ, German missionary, b. near Crefeld about 1475; d. in Mexico in 1538. He became a Franciscan friar, and, being assigned to the American missions, went to Hispaniola in 1520 with the newly appointed Bishop Geraldini. After learning the Indian language, he was attached to a mission in the interior, but as he opposed the policy of the conquerors, which brought about the depopulation of the island, he was ordered to leave the country, and went to New Spain in 1526. There he was appointed guardian of the newly founded convent of Santiago de Tlaltelolco, but subsequently he was sent to labor in Guatemala. In 1535 he was a member of the commission headed by Father Betanzos which laid before Pope Paul III. the wretched condition of the Indians. Uhland, who was a Latinist of reputation, was instructed to speak before the congregation of the propaganda, and induced the pope to issue his celebrated bull entitled "Veritas Ipsa." This for a time improved the condition of the Indians, but the promoters of the bull were never forgiven by the Spanish authorities, and Uhland, to avoid persecution, on his return to Mexico did not leave his convent till his death. He left a valuable manuscript, which is preserved in the National library at Paris, entitled "Historia de la fundación de la provincia de Santiago de Tlaltelolco."

UHLE, Albrecht Bernhard (oo'-le), artist, b. in Chemnitz, Saxony, 15 Oct., 1847. He was brought to the United States in 1851, and had his first instruction in art from his father, and at the Pennsylvania academy of fine arts. During 1867-'75

he was engaged principally in photography. He went in 1875 to Munich, where he studied at the academy under Ferdinand Barth and Alexander Wagner until 1877, in which year he went to Italy. In the same year he returned to Philadelphia and opened a studio. He visited Paris in 1879, returning the following year. He is the instructor of the portrait class at the Pennsylvania academy, and has become known as an excellent artist. Among his portraits are those of Isaac Lea and Peter McCall (1879); Joseph Leidy, painted for the Academy of natural sciences (1882); Wayne McVeagh, for the department of justice, Washington (1884); and John D. Lankenau, for the German hospital, Philadelphia (1886).

UHLER, Philip Reese (you'-ler), naturalist, b. in Baltimore, Md., 3 June, 1835. He studied natural science at Harvard under Louis Agassiz in 1863, and was assistant in charge of entomology at that institution and librarian of the Museum of comparative zoölogy. Subsequently he returned to Baltimore, and in 1876 he became an associate in natural sciences at Johns Hopkins university. He is also librarian of the Peabody institute in that city. Mr. Uhler is a member of scientific societies, has been corresponding secretary and was elected president of the Maryland academy of sciences in 1873, which place he has since held, except during 1884-'8. His papers on geology, entomology, and other natural sciences have been published in the journals of most of the learned societies of the United States and Canada, in the annual reports to the trustees of Harvard, and as special reports in the volumes of the U. S. geological survey. He translated and edited, with a glossary, Dr. Hermann A. Hagen's "Synopsis of Neuroptera of North America," issued by the Smithsonian institution (Washington, 1861).

ULLMANN, Daniel, soldier, b. in Wilmington, Del., 28 April, 1810. He was graduated at Yale in 1829, studied law, was admitted to the bar, and practised in New York, where he was master in chancery from 1839 till 1844. In 1854 he was the candidate of the American or Know-Nothing party for governor of New York, and received a very large vote. In 1861 he raised the 78th New York volunteers, in which he served as colonel, was captured in August, 1862, and confined in Libby prison until October of that year, when he was released on parole. He was promoted brigadier-general on 13 Jan., 1863, and ordered to appoint a cadre of officers and to go to Louisiana to raise five regiments of colored troops, afterward increased to a corps. This was the first order issued by the U. S. government for the raising of colored troops. He was brevetted major-general of U. S. volunteers on 13 March, 1865, was mustered out, 24 Aug., 1865, and was made major-general in November, 1865. Gen. Ullmann received the degree of LL. D. from Madison university in 1861.

ULLOA, Antonio de (ool-lo'-ah), Spanish naval officer, b. in Seville, 12 Jan., 1716; d. on the island of Leon, 3 July, 1795. After studying at Seville, he entered the navy in 1733, and was ordered to serve under the French astronomers who measured an arc of the meridian in South America. With Jorge Juan he sailed from Cadiz in May, 1735, and arrived in Carthagena five months before the French scientists, but occupied his time with botanical explorations. In the geodetic observations that followed, which were begun in June, 1736, and continued four years, Ulloa was attached to La Condamine, the head of the expedition. In September, 1740, in the midst of their astronomical observations, the Spanish officers were called away by the war with England, and received orders from the viceroy to put the port of Callao in a state of defence, and in 1742 he organized the forces at Guayaquil against the British under Admiral Anson which captured Payta. For two years afterward he cruised, in command of a frigate, along the coast of Chili and the island of Juan Fernandez, and on his return to Quito in 1744, where he found only Godin, the other French academicians having terminated their labors, he assisted in the observation of the comet that appeared in that year. In October, 1745, he embarked at Callao on a French merchant vessel which entered for repairs in the harbor of Louisburg, Canada, decoyed by the French flag which the victorious English floated on the fortress. He was taken prisoner, and his valuable collections were confiscated, but he was released in England and recovered his collections through the intercession of the Royal society of London, which elected him an associate member in 1746. On his return to Spain in July he was promoted post-captain, and appointed superintendent of the mercury-mines at Jalapa in Peru. He was made rear-admiral in 1760, and became in 1764 governor of Louisiana, which had just been ceded by France: but, failing in his efforts to win over the colonists to Spain, he was recalled in 1766. In 1770 he was made lieutenant-general of the naval forces, and in 1779 he was sent with a fleet to the Azores with sealed orders to proceed to Havana and take command of an expedition for the reconquest of Florida. But, being entirely occupied with scientific observations, Ulloa forgot to open his sealed orders, and, returning to Cadiz after a cruise of two months, was arrested and tried by a court-martial in December, 1780, which acquitted him, but recommended him for land duty. During the remainder of his life Ulloa was president of the naval school for cadets at Cadiz. Ulloa formed the first cabinet of natural history in Spain and the first school of metallurgy, established at Legovia a factory where cloth was made from American products, and founded a naval observatory at San Fernando, and other useful institutions. His works include "Relación histórica del viage á la América Meridional y observaciones sobre Astronomía y Física" (5 vols., Madrid, 1748; with Jorge Juan, French translation, Paris, 1752; English, London, 1758); "Noticias Americanas; entretenimientos físico-historicos, sobre la América Meridional y la Septentrional" (1772); "Observaciones hechas en el oceano sobre un eclipse de sol con el anillo refractario" (1779; French translation, Toulouse, 1780); and "La Marina y fuerzas navales de la Europa y del Africa" (1781). David Barry published in 1828 a secret memoir on South America which he claimed to be Ulloa's work, but its authenticity is doubted.

ULLOA, Francisco de, Spanish friar, b. in Andalusia about 1498; d. in Seville in 1574. He united with the Dominicans at Salamanca, and was among the few that accompanied Bishop Vicente Valverde when he sailed for Cuzco in 1538. Ulloa was afterward prior of a convent in Lima, and visitor of the order. Having learned the Indian dialects, he explored the country, founded convents at Arequipa and Huanuco, and preached the gospel to the Indians in their own language with success. His influence was great in Peru, and Gonzalo Pizarro undertook to win him over to his cause, but Ulloa rejected his offers, and joined Pedro de La Gasca. The latter despatched Ulloa with letters and proclamations for the officials and inhabitants along the coast, and instructed him to buy supplies and prepare everything for the advance of the royal army. Ulloa's mission was so successful that Pizarro sent a party of cavalry that succeeded in taking him a prisoner, and he was carried to Lima, where he was imprisoned and suffered greatly. When peace was restored, La Gasca despatched Ulloa to Spain, in 1549, but he shortly afterward returned to this country and went to Caracas, being later made visitor of the province of Guatemala. Toward the close of his life he retired to Seville, where he died with the reputation of a saint. He wrote a curious account of his voyage from Panama to Peru, published in the 44th volume of Antonio Salva's collection, and contributed memoirs to the council of the Indies, printed in "Cartas de Indias" (Madrid, 1872).

ULLOA, Francisco de, Spanish explorer, d. on the Pacific coast in 1540. He went to Mexico with Hernan Cortes, and did good service in the fleet that the latter constructed on Lake Texcoco for the siege and capture of the city of Mexico. Of his later life little is known, except that when Cortes, on his return from Spain, resolved to make new conquests on the northern Pacific coast, he constructed in Acapulco the ship "Santa Agueda," of which he gave the command, together with that of two caravels, to Ulloa, with orders to explore the coast as far northward as possible, and to obtain all the necessary information about the country. Ulloa sailed from Acapulco on 8 July, 1539, entered on 28 Aug. the Gulf of California, where he lost a vessel in a storm, and, after putting for repairs into the Bay of Santa Cruz, which he left on 12 Sept., discovered Cape Rojo, San Andres and Santa Marta (now Cape Tosco), San Lazaro and San Eugenio, and the island of Cedros or Cerros. After despatching a messenger to Cortes, who had meanwhile sailed for Spain, Ulloa set out again for the north. On 5 April, 1540, he parted company with his consort, which arrived safely at Santiago toward the end of April. Some assert that he was never heard of afterward, but others say that he advanced fifty miles farther than Cape San Quentin, 30° 30' north latitude, and anchored safely at Acapulco on 30 May following. The latter narratives state that he was killed shortly afterward by a soldier whom he had slighted. The journal of the expedition, written by his clerk, Francisco Preciado, under the title "Relación de los descubrimientos, hechos por Don Francisco de Ulloa en un viaje por la Mar del Morte, en el navio Santa Agueda," was preserved in the archives of Seville and translated into Italian by Ramusio in the third volume of his "Voyages," and into English by James Burney in his "History of the Discoveries in the South Sea" (London, 1803), under the title "The Voyage of the Right Worshipful Knight Francisco de Ulloa, with Three Ships, set forth at the Expense of the Right Noble Fernando Cortés, Marquis del Valle, by the Coast of Nueva Galicia, Culiacan, into the Gulf of California, called el Mar Berniego, as also to the West of Cape California as far as 30 degrees North, begun from Acapulco, the 8th of July, 1539."

ULPHILAS, Herman (ool-fee'-lahs), German naturalist, b. in Paderborn, Westphalia, in 1702; d. in Berlin in 1761. He followed the sea in the Dutch service, visited the Antilles, Guiana, South America, and Batavia, and held offices at Batavia, St. Eustatius, and Demerara. He made valuable collections in natural history, which he presented to the Museum of natural history at Berlin. Toward the close of his life he was editor of the "Magazin für Naturwissenschaft." His works include "Historia naturalis Americana" (Leipsic, 1756) and "Abhandlung über die baumartigen Schotenpflanzen des Orinoco-Thales" (1757).

ULRICH, Charles Frederick, artist, b. in New York city, 18 Oct., 1858. He began his art studies at Cooper institute and the National academy, New York, and during 1875-'81 continued them under Ludwig Löfftz and Wilhelm Lindenschmit in Munich. In 1879 he gained a bronze medal at the academy there. For several years he followed his profession in New York, but about 1884 he went to Venice, Italy. He was elected an associate of the National academy in 1883, and received the Thomas B. Clarke prize there the following year for his "In the Land of Promise." He has executed several carefully and truthfully painted genre pictures, among which are "The Wood-Engraver" (1882); "The Glass-Blowers" and "The Carpenter" (1883); "A Dutch Type-Setter"; "The Waifs" (1885); and "Washing of Feet in the Venice Cathedral."

UMBSCHIEDEN, Franz, journalist, b. in Gruenstadt, Rhenish Bavaria, Germany, in 1821; d. in Newark, N. J., 13 Dec., 1874. He was educated at the Universities of Heidelberg and Munich, where he studied law and national economy, and in 1848 took an active part in revolutionary movements, travelling and making inflammatory speeches, on account of one of which on the death of Robert Blum he was compelled to flee to France. When the revolution began in Rhenish Bavaria he returned, served in the army, and was present at the occupation of Worms and at the storming of Landau, after which he went to Baden under Gen. Franz Sigel, and afterward to Switzerland, where he became a private tutor. Being expelled to appease Louis Napoleon in 1852, he went to Newark, N. J., and taught there. During the Frémont canvass in 1856 he joined the Republican party, but in 1859 he co-operated with the Democrats. In 1860 he became editor of the New York "Staats-Zeitung," which post he held until 1864, when he established the Newark "Volksmann." In 1867 he was editor of the "New Jersey Democrat," and he again edited the "Volksmann" in 1869-'74.

UNANDER, Eric, clergyman, b. in Sweden; d. after 1759. He arrived at Philadelphia with Rev. Israel Acrelius, the Swedish-American historian, 6 Nov., 1749, and took charge of Swedish Lutheran congregations at Racoon and Penn's Neck, in New Jersey, where he labored under Acrelius and afterward as regular pastor until 1756. His parish embraced a wide extent of territory. He conducted services in Swedish and English almost every Sunday, held catechetical examinations once a year in every family that was connected with his extended parish, and visited other Swedish settlements on Delaware bay, at Salem, along Timber creek, and other places. Of his labors Acrelius says: "One who has seen his toil and labor, his zeal and diligence, and thus under long-continued sickness, can safely testify that during the time that Mr. Unander lived in Racoon he did not eat the bread of idleness." When Provost Acrelius returned to Sweden he desired to accompany him, but, as the affairs of the congregations did not allow the loss of two pastors at once, he was willing to remain. He therefore became the successor of Acrelius at Christina in the year 1756, receiving his commission the previous year. He continued as pastor until 1759. The church at Christina, now Wilmington, Del., known as "Old Swedes' Church" (see illustration), has an interesting history. In 1638 the first colony of Swedes arrived, settled along Christina creek, and built Fort Christina on the site of the present city of Wilmington. The fort undoubtedly did double service, both as a place of defence and a place of worship. Rev. Reorus Tor-killus was the first pastor, who arrived with the first colony. On 28 May, 1698, the erection of a new church was begun at Christina back of the fort. In the following year the new church was dedicated under the name of Trinity Lutheran church.

Rev. Eric Tobias Björck was the pastor at the time. The historian Acrelius describes the building as follows: "The church is of granite, and is sixty feet long, thirty feet broad, and twenty feet high. The wall is six feet thick in the foundation and three feet at the windows, as well as above them. In the church there are five large arched windows and three arched doors." The following inscription (in Latin) is found on the west gable: "1698. If God be for us, who can be against us? In the reign of William III., by the grace of God, King of England. William Penn being Proprietary; William [Markham], Deputy-Governor. The most illustrious King of Swedes, CHARLES XI., now of most glorious memory, having sent hither Eric Tobias Björck of Westmania, pastor of the place." The ground for the church was given by John Stalcop, who was then one of the church wardens. To this was added an additional purchase of land in 1699 of 250 acres for a parsonage and support of the pastor. The first grant of land was for a Lutheran church, and the further purchase was made by the Lutheran congregation for their own and descendants' use. The congregation was presided over by Lutheran pastors until the year 1792, when a pastor of the Protestant Episcopal church took charge of the congregation. The church is still in a good state of preservation and is used for divine worship. The town of Wilmington is built on the church-glebe that was once owned by Trinity congregation.

UNANGST, Elias, missionary, b. in Lehigh valley, Pa., in 1824. He was graduated at Pennsylvania college, Gettysburg, in 1854, and at the theological seminary there in 1857, and in the latter year was ordained to the Lutheran ministry. He was tutor in the college during his theological course in 1854-'7. In 1878 he received the degree of D. D. from Wittenberg college, Springfield, Ohio. Dr. Unangst has been actively and successfully engaged as a missionary at Guntur, India, since 1857. In 1871 he visited the United States, but after a stay of several months he returned to India. He is now at the head of the mission stations of the general synod. He has rendered important service in the translation of the New Testament into the language of the Telugus, has also translated various tracts and hymns into the same language, and published a "Historical Sketch of the American Evangelical Lutheran Missions in India" (1879).

UNANUE, José Hipólito (oo-nah'-noo-ay), Peruvian scientist, b. in Arica, 13 Aug., 1758; d. in Lima, 15 July, 1833. He was destined by his parents for the priesthood, and was sent to Lima to study, but there his uncle persuaded him to become a physician. He founded the anatomical museum of Lima, and, as a professor of the medical college, took part in the publication of the "Mercurio Peruano," editing several articles under the pseudonym of "Ariosto." He was cosmographer of the viceroyalty, and in this post took, from 1793 till 1797, the census of Peru and published a political, ecclesiastic, and military guide to the country. He was greatly esteemed by all the European scientists that visited Peru, and a plant, "Unanuea febrifuga," was named in his honor. He founded the medical college of San Fernando, for which service he was appointed honorary physician of the royal chamber. After the beginning of the revolution he favored the patriot cause, and in 1812 was elected deputy to the Spanish cortes for Arequipa. When the independent government was installed, Unanue was appointed minister of the treasury, and afterward he was president of the first constituent congress, vice-president of the Society of the friends of the country, and a member of the council of state. He possessed the confidence of Bolivar, and when the latter abandoned Peru he appointed Unanue president of the council of ministers, which governed the country. He was honorary member of the scientific societies of Munich, Madrid, Philadelphia, and New York, and wrote "Ensayos sobre la educación de la Juventud" (Lima, 1826); "Principios de Geometría, Lógica, Metafísica y Ética" (1827); "Defensa del sistema físico de Newton" (1828); "El Verdadero Peruano" (1829); "Observaciones sobre el Clima de Lima" (1830); and "Los Andes libres" (1832).

UNCAS, Indian chief, b. in the Pequot settlement, Connecticut, about 1588; d. there in 1682. He was a Pequot by birth, but rebelled against his chief, Sassacus, was expelled from his tribe, and, gathering a band of malcontents, became their head, calling his followers Mohegans, an ancient title that the Pequots once bore. His territory lay to the east and north of Lyme, Conn. He conquered the Nipmucks in northern and northeastern Connecticut and the adjacent parts of Massachusetts, adding their country to his own. He then made overtures to the colonists, signed a treaty of peace with them, and in 1637 accompanied Col. John Mason's expedition against the Pequots, proving a powerful auxiliary. He afterward received part of the Pequot lands as his reward, but, when the war was over, manifested so much sympathy for his former tribe that he was suspected of infidelity by the English. He soon reinstated himself in their confidence, and the Pequots forthwith attempted to assassinate him. Uncas accordingly attacked and conquered Sequasson, sachem of the Connecticut river, and bravely defended himself in a constant warfare with the neighboring tribes. His principal opponent at that time was the great Narragansett chief Miantonomo, who, jealous of his intimacy with the colonists, and eager to prove the superiority of his people to the Mohegans, invaded Uncas's territory with 1,000 men. He was incited to this by Samuel Gorton, a settler, who for "his damnable errors" had been banished from the Plymouth and Massachusetts colonies. Hastily collecting all his force, about 500 warriors, Uncas marched to the unequal conflict. The armies met on the plain about a mile west of Yantic river falls, and the fight was about to begin when Uncas advanced and demanded a parley with Miantonomo. "You have," said he, "a number of brave warriors with you, and so have I with me. It is a pity that our warriors should be killed in a private quarrel between their chiefs. Step forward like a brave man, as you profess to be, and let us fight the battle ourselves. If I fall, the Mohegans shall serve the Narragansetts. But if Uncas kills Miantonomo the Narragansetts shall be mine." Miantonomo declined the single combat, a furious fight ensued in which the Mohegans were victorious, and Miantonomo was captured. Uncas took him to Hartford to consult with the colonial authorities as to what should be done with him. The commissioners decided that "there could be no safety for Uncas in the event of Miantonomo's liberation, but that by secret treachery or open force his life would be in continual danger." Six elders and six clergymen of Massachusetts decided that the Narragansett chief should be put to death. Acting on their instructions, Miantonomo was taken to Norwich and brained with a tomahawk by Uncas's brother, in his presence and that of two Englishmen, in September, 1643. Rev. Richard Hyde in 1669 said in a letter that after Miantonomo's death Uncas cut a piece out of his shoulder and ate it, but this had no authority but rumor. The colonists sent a detachment of soldiers to defend the Mohegans against the tribes that on all sides combined against them. For two years Uncas fought against the Mohawks, Pocomotocks, and Narragansetts, defending himself with bravery and skill. In 1656 he was besieged in his stronghold on Connecticut river by the Narragansett chief Pessacus, and nearly forced by hunger to surrender, but almost at the last moment he was relieved by an English ensign, Thomas Leffingwell, who managed to reach him at night in a canoe laden with provisions. In gratitude for this assistance, he gave Leffingwell a deed of all the lands upon which the town of Norwich, Conn., now stands. Leffingwell afterward sold it to a company. Although Uncas was too old to be of much service during King Philip's war, his son, Oneco, with 200 Mohegan warriors and a greater number of subjugated Pequots, marched with Maj. John Talcott to Brookfield and Hadley, and at the latter place aided in defeating 700 of King Philip's force. Uncas was never in favor with the clergy, by one of whom in 1674 he is described as "an old and wicked, wilful man, who had always been an opposer of praying to God." But on one occasion he so far yielded to the influence of a good missionary as to ask his prayers for rain during a continued drought. When it fell the next day, he professed himself almost ready to adopt the Christian religion. Although he was cruel and tyrannical, Uncas had a conception of the obligation of a treaty that was possessed by no other Indian. He kept faith with the colonists in all their warfare with other tribes, and was a singularly generous and magnanimous foe. His admirers claim that great injustice has been done him by historians, who almost unanimously praise Miantonomo at his expense. A granite obelisk was erected to his memory in Norwich in 1825, the foundation-stone being laid by Gen. Andrew Jackson. See "Uncas and Miantonomo," by William L. Stone (New York, 1842).

UNDERHILL, Edward Fitch, stenographer, b. in Wolcott, N. Y., 20 April, 1830. He was self-educated, at nineteen years of age became a stenographic reporter on the St. Louis press, and in 1853-'62 was connected with the "Tribune" and "Times" of New York city, becoming war-correspondent of the latter, and subsequently its Washington correspondent. He was one of the first court reporters in the United States, and in 1860 procured the passage of a law that made stenographers officers of the courts in New York city, which practice has since been adopted by the county courts and by nearly every state in the Union. In 1865 he also procured the passage of a law to regulate the salaries of court stenographers. He has been official stenographer of the legislature for five years, of the Constitutional convention in 1867-'8, of the state supreme court for eight years, and of the surrogate's court from 1872 till the present time. He has been admitted to the bar, and has written much in prose and verse, chiefly humorous.

UNDERHILL, John, colonist, b. in Warwickshire, England; d. in Oyster Bay, Long Island, N. Y., about 1672. He served in the Netherlands and at Cadiz, came to New England with John Winthrop in 1630, and was a representative in the assembly from Boston. He was appointed by Sir Henry Vane to command the colony's troops, and with Capt. John Mason destroyed the Indian forts at Mystic in 1637 and broke the power of the Pequots. Being banished from Boston on account of his religious opinions, he went to England and was made in 1641 governor of Exeter and Dover, but returned to this country, removed to Stamford, Conn., and afterward in 1646 to Flushing, Long Island. He was a delegate to the court in New Haven in 1643, was assistant justice there, and held an important command during the hostilities with the Dutch and Indians, 1643-'6. In 1665 he was a delegate from Oyster Bay to Hempstead, and he was at one time under-sheriff of the North Riding of Yorkshire. The Mantinenoc Indians gave him 150 acres of land, which is still owned by his descendants. He published "Newes from America," an account of the Pequot war (London, 1638).

UNDERWOOD, Adin Ballou, soldier, b. in Milford, Mass., 19 May, 1828; d. in Boston, Mass., 14 Jan., 1888. His ancestors came to Hingham before 1637 and afterward settled in Watertown. His father, Orison, was a brigadier-general of militia. After graduation at Brown in 1849 the son studied law at Harvard, was admitted to the bar in 1853, and settled in Boston in 1855. At the beginning of the civil war he was active in raising recruits, and he was appointed captain in the 2d Massachusetts infantry in April, 1861. He became major in the 33d regiment in July, 1862, lieutenant-colonel and colonel in the same year, participated in the battles of Fredericksburg, Chancellorsville, and Gettysburg, and served under Gen. Joseph Hooker at Lookout Mountain, but, being dangerously wounded, was disabled from further field duty. He was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers on 13 Jan., 1863, received the brevet of major-general of volunteers on 13 Aug., 1865, and was mustered out on 10 July, 1866. For nearly twenty years he was surveyor of the port of Boston. Gen. Underwood published "Three Years' Service of the Twenty-third Massachusetts Infantry" (Boston, 1881).

UNDERWOOD, Francis Henry, author, b. in Enfield, Mass., 12 Jan., 1825. He was educated partly at Amherst, then taught in Kentucky, read law, and was admitted to the bar. He returned to Massachusetts in 1850, and thenceforward took an active part in the anti-slavery cause. He was clerk of the Massachusetts senate in 1852, and afterward literary adviser of the publishing-house of Phillips, Sampson, and Co. He conceived the idea of uniting the literary force of the north to the Free-soil movement by means of a magazine, and after several years of effort was the means of securing the eminent writers that made the fame of the "Atlantic Monthly." He assisted in the management of that magazine for two years, until the firm with which he was connected came to an end. He was then (1859) elected clerk of the superior court in Boston, which post he held for eleven years, when he resigned and entered private business, chiefly to obtain more leisure for literary work. His studies have been mainly in English literature, but his writings cover a wide field. He served for thirteen years in the school board of Boston. In 1885 he was appointed U. S. consul at Glasgow, Scotland. His lectures on "American Men of Letters" and his occasional speeches, such as that before the Glasgow Ayrshire society "On the Memory of Burns," have been much admired. In 1888 the University of Glasgow conferred on him the degree of LL. D. His works include a "Hand-Book of English Literature" (Boston, 1871); "Hand-Book of American Literature" (1872); "Cloud Pictures," a series of imaginative stories, chiefly musical (1872); "Lord of Himself," a novel of old times in Kentucky (1874); "Man Proposes," a novel (1880); "The True Story of Exodus," an abridgment of the work by Brugsch-Bey (1880); and biographical sketches of Longfellow (1892), Lowell (1882), and Whittier (1883). Dr. Underwood is engaged upon an elaborate popular history of English literature.—His second cousin, Lucius Marcus, botanist, b. in New Woodstock, N. Y., 26 Oct., 1853, was graduated at the Syracuse university, N. Y., in 1877, and was professor of botany and geology in Illinois Wesleyan university in 1880-'3. Since 1883 he has held the chair of botany in Syracuse university. He is engaged in the study of the ferns and hepaticæ of North America, and in addition to numerous articles in scientific journals he has published "Systematic Plant Record" (Syracuse, 1881); "Our Native Ferns, and how to study Them" (Bloomington, Ill., 1881); "Our Native Ferns and their Allies" (1882; 3d ed., New York, 1888); and "Descriptive Catalogue of North American Hepaticæ" (1884). He is now preparing an "Underwood Genealogy."

UNDERWOOD, John Curtiss, jurist, b. in Litchfield, Herkimer co., N. Y., in 1808; d. in Washington, D. C., 7 Dec., 1873. He was graduated at Hamilton in 1832, and removed to Clarke county, Va., where he engaged in farming, and in 1856 was a delegate to the convention that nominated John C. Frémont for president. Being proscribed for his political sentiments, and especially for his opposition to slavery, he removed to New York, where he became secretary to a company that was formed to deal in southern lands. In 1861 he was nominated consul at Callao, Peru, but he accepted instead the office of fifth auditor in the treasury department, and while there was appointed judge of the district court of Virginia. Early in the civil war he affirmed the right of the U. S. government to confiscate the enemy's property, and also maintained the civic rights of colored citizens. In his district Jefferson Davis was indicted for treason, and he refused in June, 1866, to admit the prisoner to bail, on the ground that he was in custody of the military authorities. He still presided in May, 1867, when the Confederate leader was released. Judge Underwood was bitterly assailed for his maintenance of the rights of colored citizens and for his zeal in enforcing the Federal laws, and was forced into litigation on account of his decree sanctioning confiscation.

UNDERWOOD, John William Henry, jurist, b. in Elbert county, Ga., 20 Nov., 1816; d. in Rome, Ga., 18 July, 1888. He studied law under his father, Judge William H. Underwood, in Hall county, was admitted to the bar, practised in Habersham county for many years, and removed to Rome, Ga., in 1851. He was elected solicitor-general for the western circuit in 1843, but resigned in 1846, and was appointed chief justice of the supreme court of Nebraska by President Buchanan, which post he declined. He was elected to the legislature of Georgia in 1857, was made speaker of the house of representatives, and was then elected to congress, serving from 5 Dec., 1859, till 23 Jan., 1861, when he resigned on the secession of his state. In 1867 he was appointed judge of the Rome circuit by Gov. Charles J. Jenkins, but went out with the reconstruction act in 1868. In 1874 he was reappointed to the same office, and he was re-elected in 1878. He resigned in 1882, to take his place on the tariff commission, to which he was appointed by President Arthur.

UNDERWOOD, Joseph Rogers, senator, b. in Goochland county, Va., 24 Oct., 1791; d. near Bowling Green, Ky., 23 Aug., 1876. He is a descendant of William Thomas Underwood, who settled in Virginia about 1680. His family being in adverse circumstances, he was adopted by his maternal uncle, Edward Rogers, a soldier of the Revolution, who had emigrated to Kentucky in 1783. Removing to that state in 1803, the boy was educated in various schools and was graduated at Transylvania in 1811, after which he studied law in Lexington, Ky. He was the first volunteer to be attached to the regiment of Colonel William Dudley for co-operation with the northern army on the Canada border, was made a lieutenant, and when the captain of his company was killed in Dudley's defeat, 5 May, 1813, the command devolved upon him. Underwood was wounded, and with the remnant of Dudley's regiment was forced to surrender. After undergoing cruel treatment from the Indians, he was released on parole and returned to his home. He was admitted to the bar in the same year, and settled in Glasgow, Ky., where he was also trustee of the town and county attorney until he removed to Bowling Green in 1823. He served in the legislature in 1816-'19 and again in 1825-'6, was a candidate for lieutenant-governor in 1828, and from that year till 1835 was judge of the court of appeals. Being elected to congress as a Whig, he served from 7 Dec., 1835, till 3 March, 1843, and in 1845 was chosen to represent Warren county in the legislature, serving as speaker of the house. He was elected a U. S. senator as a Whig, and, after serving from 6 Dec., 1847, till 3 March, 1853, again practised his profession. In 1824 and 1844 he was a presidential elector on the Henry Clay ticket, and he was a delegate to the National Democratic convention at Chicago in 1864.—His brother, Warner L., b. in Goosland county, Va., 7 Aug., 1808, was graduated at the University of Virginia in 1830, served in the Kentucky legislature in 1848-'9, and was elected to congress, as an American, serving from 3 Dec., 1855, till 3 March, 1859.—Joseph R.'s son, John Cox, engineer, b. in Georgetown, D. C., 12 Sept., 1840, removed to Kentucky with his father. After graduation at Rensselaer polytechnic institute in 1862, he entered the Confederate army and served as a military engineer in Virginia, but was captured in 1863 and confined in prisons in Cincinnati and Boston until the close of the war. He then returned to Kentucky, where he has since engaged in engineering, and has contributed to the improvement of his part of the state. He was engineer in charge of the public works of Warren county, city engineer of Bowling Green in 1868-'75, and mayor of that town in 1870-'2. He was active in the reorganization of the Democratic party in Kentucky, was a member of the state executive committee, speaker of the senate in 1876, where his casting-vote defeated the whipping-post bill, and in 1876-'80 was lieutenant-governor of Kentucky. Mr. Underwood established the "Kentucky Intelligencer" in Bowling Green, but transferred this journal to Louisville, and consolidated it with the "Post." In 1881 he removed to Covington, and organized a daily newspaper publishing company in Cincinnati, Ohio, where in 1882 the "Daily News," of which he was general manager, began to be issued. He has published various official documents in the form of pamphlets and reports.

UNDERWOOD, William Henderson, jurist, b. in Culpeper county, Va., 13 Sept., 1779; d. in Marietta, Ga., 4 Aug., 1859. At an early age he removed with his father to Elbert county, Ga., obtained his education by his own exertions, and taught in a country school for several years. He studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1810, and after the war of 1812, in which he served as a captain of volunteers, rose in his profession, and for several years was judge of the western circuit, being elected to this post in 1825. He was the leading counsel of the Cherokees during their controversy with the state of Georgia, and became famous in the supreme court of the United States for the ability with which he advocated their cause.

UNZAGA, Luis de (oon-thah'-gah), Spanish soldier, b. about 1720; d. in Spain about 1790. He early entered military service, and, after taking part in the operations of Charles of Naples against Austria, was promoted brigadier, and in 1769 appointed governor of Louisiana, to succeed Alexander O'Reilly, who, by his rigorous measures against the opposition to Spanish annexation, had incurred the dislike of the creoles, and was removed by the home government. Unzaga, by his conciliatory policy, soon repaired the evils that had arisen under O'Reilly, and in 1776 was promoted and appointed captain-general of Caracas, whence he returned in 1783 to take charge of the general government of Cuba. One of his first measures was to prohibit the unrestrained cutting of cedar-wood, as this useful tree was threatened with extinction by enormous exportation and waste at home. When, in the same year, by the treaty of Versailles, Florida was restored to Spain, more than 5,000 former residents of that province, who had settled in Cuba, returned to their homes, and, to offset this loss of labor, Unzaga contracted with several French and English firms for the importation of 15,000 negroes. In February, 1785, he was superseded by Count Bernardo de Galvez, and he then returned to Spain.

UPCHURCH, John Jorden, mechanic, b. in Franklin county, N. C., 26 March, 1822; d. in Steelville, Mo., 18 Jan., 1887. His education was acquired in a country school previous to his thirteenth year. He was alternately clerk in a country store and a farmer until 1841, when he married, and opened a hotel in Raleigh. Trying to keep a temperance hotel, he failed, and was for thirteen years master-mechanic on the Mine Hill and Schuylkill Haven railroad. In 1864 he tried the oil business and lost all his savings. For four years he drifted about, and in 1868 secured a situation in the machine-shops of the Atlantic and Great Western railroad at Meadville, Pa. Here he prepared the first ritual and organized the first lodge of the Ancient order of united workmen, to which his principal reputation is due. The lodge was organized on 27 Oct., 1868, with fourteen members. It has since spread into every state and territory of the Union, has more than 150,000 members, and pays out about $2,000,000 annually in benefits to the families of deceased members. The plan that was devised and used by the society for disbursing sums of money to beneficiaries was so original and proved so popular as practically to revolutionize the life-insurance business. Other societies followed, with many variations on the plan, until the amount of life insurance that is now carried by the various fraternal beneficiary societies is many times greater than that carried by all the stock-company societies in the country. Father Upchurch, as he was called, subsequently removed to Steelville, Mo. He travelled much in the later years of his life, in the interest of the society that he had founded.

UPDIKE, Wilkins, lawyer, b. in Kingston, R. I., 8 Jan., 1784; d. there, 14 Jan., 1867. He studied law, was admitted to the bar, served many years in the legislature, and was the author of "Memoirs of the Rhode Island Bar" (Boston, 1842), and a "History of the Episcopal Church in Narragansett Pier, R. I." (New York, 1847).

UPFOLD, George, P. E. bishop, b. in Sheneley Green, near Guilford, Surrey, England, 7 May, 1796; d. in Indianapolis, Ind., 26 Aug., 1872. He came to the United States when he was eight years of age, the family settling in Albany, N. Y. He was graduated at Union college in 1814, and took a course in medicine at the College of physicians and surgeons in New York city, receiving his degree of M. D. in 1816. In 1817 he began the study of theology under the direction of Bishop Hobart. He was ordered deacon in Trinity church, New York, 21 Oct., 1818, by Bishop Hobart, and ordained priest in Trinity church, Lansingburg, N. Y., 13 July, 1820, by the same prelate. He remained in Lansingburg as rector about two years, when he removed to New York city and became rector of St. Luke's church, which post he held for eight years, when he was elected rector of St. Thomas's church. He removed to Pennsylvania in 1831, taking the rectorship of Trinity church, Pittsburg, from which post he was elevated to the episcopate. He was consecrated first bishop of Indiana, in Christ church, Indianapolis, 16 Dec., 1849. Bishop Upfold received the degree of S. T. D. from Columbia in 1831, and that of LL. D. from the Western university of Pennsylvania in 1856. His writings include "The Last Hundred Years," a lecture (Pittsburg, Pa., 1845); "Manual of Devotions for Domestic and Private Use" (New York, 1863); and sermons, pastoral letters, and addresses.

UPHAM, James, educator, b. in Salem, Mass., 23 Jan., 1815. He was graduated at Waterville college (now Colby university), Me., in 1835, and at Newton theological seminary in 1839. He was ordained to the Baptist ministry in 1840, and called, after two brief pastorates, to a professorship in the New Hampshire literary institute. His connection with this institution continued for twenty years, during the last five of which he was its president. On withdrawing from this relation in 1866 he became one of the editors of the "Watchman and Reflector," of Boston. He is now (1889) a corresponding editor of the "Religious Herald," of Richmond, Va. He received the degree of D. D. from Colby university in 1860.

UPHAM, Joshua, jurist, b. in Brookfield, Mass., 14 Nov., 1741; d. in London, England, in 1808. He was graduated at Harvard in 1763, practised law in New York and Boston, built the first woollen-mill in this country, and introduced the manufacture of salt into some of the seaboard towns. He was a judge of the supreme court of New Brunswick at the organization of the judiciary of that province, and died in London while engaged in public business relating to the affairs of the British North American provinces. — His son, Charles Wentworth, author, b. in St. John, New Brunswick, 4 May, 1802; d. in Salem, Mass., 14 June, 1875, after serving as an apothecary's apprentice, worked on a farm in Nova Scotia until 1816, when he made his way to Boston. After graduation at Harvard in 1821, and at the divinity-school in 1824, he was ordained colleague of the Rev. John Prince over the 1st church in Salem, where he remained from 8 Dec., 1824, till he was forced to abandon the ministry, owing to bronchial trouble, 8 Dec., 1844. He was mayor of Salem in 1852, and during his term of service reorganized the police force, introducing a new system, and secured the establishment of a state normal school. He was a member of the legislature in 1840, 1849, and 1859-'60, and was president of the state senate in 1857-'8. His principal effort was directed to the interest of education in the district and high schools, the endowment of colleges and improvement of the statute laws of the commonwealth, and he reported the measures that made education a regular department of the state government. In 1853 he was a member of the State constitutional convention, and he was then elected to congress as a Whig, serving from 5 Dec., 1853, till 3 March, 1855. He was chairman of a select committee to investigate the affairs and condition of the Smithsonian institution, and in an elaborate report advocated the policy of making it the foundation of a valuable library. On 24 March, 1826, he married Ann Susan, sister of Oliver Wendell Holmes. He edited the "Christian Register" in 1845-'6, contributed to magazines and reviews, and was the author of "Letters on the Logos" (Boston, 1828); "Lectures on Witchcraft, comprising a History of the Salem Delusion, 1692" (1831; enlarged ed., 2 vols., 1867); "Life of Sir Henry Vane," in Sparks's "American Biography" (1835); "Prophecy as an Evidence of Christianity" (1835); "Life of John C. Frémont" (1856); "Mémorial of Francis Peabody" (1869); "Salem Witchcraft and Cotton Mather, a Reply" (1870); and the last three volumes of the "Life of Timothy Pickering," begun by Octavius Pickering (4 vols., 1867-'72).

UPHAM, Timothy, soldier, b. in Deerfield, N. H., in 1783; d. in Charlestown, Mass., 2 Nov., 1855. He was a descendant of John Upham, who came from England in 1635, and was the first of the name in this country. His grave-stone is still standing in Malden, Mass. Timothy's father, the Rev. Timothy Upham, was graduated at Harvard in 1768, and was pastor of the Congregational church at Deerfield from 9 Dec., 1772, until his death on 21 Feb., 1811, and had three children—Hannah, who became principal of the Ontario female seminary; Nathaniel (1744–1829), who served in congress in 1817-'23; and Timothy, the subject of this sketch, who engaged in mercantile pursuits in Portsmouth, N. H., in 1807. On 12 March, 1812, he was appointed major of the 11th U. S. infantry, and soon afterward he was placed in command of the forts and harbor of Portsmouth. In September he joined the army at Plattsburg, on 12 March, 1813, he was promoted lieutenant-colonel of the 21st regiment under Col. James Miller, and at the sortie from Fort Erie he commanded the reserve. He was mustered out in June, 1815, and from 1816 till 1829 was collector of customs for Portsmouth. He was navy agent in 1841-'5, and was a major-general of the state militia.—His nephew, Thomas Cogswell, metaphysician, b. in Deerfield, N. H., 30 Jan., 1799; d. in New York city, 2 April, 1872, was the son of Nathaniel, and was graduated at Dartmouth in 1818, and in 1821 at Andover theological seminary, where he remained a year as assistant professor of Hebrew, and was ordained pastor of the Congregational church in Rochester, N. H., in 1823. In 1824 he became professor of mental and moral philosophy, and instructor in Hebrew at Bowdoin, which posts he held until 1867, afterward retaining the title of emeritus professor. Wesleyan gave him the degree of D. D. in 1843, and Rutgers that of LL. D. in 1870. Judge Upham possessed a taste for historical and antiquarian research, and published an "Address on Rebellion, Slavery, and Peace," delivered at Concord, 2 March, 1864 (Concord, 1864), and left unfinished an extensive work on the proverbs of all lands and languages.—Another brother, Francis William, author, b. in Rochester, N. H., 10 Sept., 1817, was graduated at Bowdoin in 1837, studied law under his brother, Nathaniel G. Upham, and was admitted to the bar of Massachusetts in 1844, but relinquished his profession, and in 1867-'70 was professor of mental philosophy and lecturer on history in Rutgers female college, New York city. H., 10 July, 1819; d. in Boston, Mass., 16 June, 1847, was graduated at Bowdoin in 1840, and at the medical college in Paris, France, in 1844. He published a biographical and genealogical "History of the Upham Family" (Concord, 1845).

UPHAM, William, senator, b. in Leicester, Mass., in August, 1792; d. in Washington, D. C., 14 Jan., 1853. He removed with his father to Vermont in 1802, was educated at the State university, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1812, and began practice in Montpelier. In 1827-'8 he served in the legislature, was state's attorney for Washington county in 1829, and served again in the legislature in 1830. Elected a U. S. senator as a Whig, he served from 4 Dec., 1843, until his sudden death by small-pox.

UPJOHN, Richard, architect, b. in Shaftesbury, England, 22 Jan., 1802; d. in Garrison's, Putnam co., N. Y., 16 Aug., 1878. He received a fair education, and then was apprenticed to a builder and cabinet-maker, in which trade he became a master-mechanic and continued at it until 1829. In that year he came to the United States and settled in New Bedford, Mass., where he followed his trade.

He removed to Boston in 1833, and assisted in the architectural designs of the city court-house. His earliest work was the entrances to the Boston common, and then he designed and built St. John's church in Bangor, Me. In 1839 he was called to New York city to take charge of the proposed alterations in Trinity church, which were finally abandoned, with a view to the erection of a new structure. In the preparation of the design for the new edifice the power and scope of Mr. Upjohn's skill were first made apparent, and his professional career as an architect was thereafter assured. Trinity church was completed in 1846, and was then the noblest in conception and purest in detail of all ecclesiastical structures in this country. (See illustration, page 302.) His success gained for him the building of other churches that are noted for the purity of their style, and are chiefly Gothic. Among those in New York city are the churches of the Ascension and the Holy Communion, Trinity chapel, and St. Thomas's, and, in Brooklyn, Christ and Grace churches and the Church of the Pilgrims. His civic works were mostly in the style of the Italian renaissance. In New York city these include the Trinity building and the Corn Exchange bank. His domestic buildings embody many varieties of style and are scattered throughout the country. His last years were spent at Garrison's, on Hudson river, where he designed St. Philip's church on the Highlands, which, on a small scale, is typical of the Gothic tendency of his taste. Mr. Upjohn was president of the American institute of architects from 1857 till 1876.—His son, Richard Michell, architect, b. in Shaftesbury, England, 7 March, 1828, came to New York in 1829. He attended school until 1846, and then entered his father's office. In 1851 he went abroad for further study, but in 1852 returned, and later entered into partnership with his father. Mr. Upjohn has served on commissions—national, state, and municipal—that have been appointed to consider plans and to devise improvements. Besides his association with his father in various architectural works, he has made many independent designs, among which are the churches of St. Peter, Albany; St. Paul, Brooklyn; Central Congregational, Boston; and the cathedral at Fond du Lac, Wis.; also the library building of Hobart college, Geneva, N. Y., the capitol at Hartford, Conn. (shown in the illustration), and many other buildings in various parts of the country.

UPSHUR, Abel Parker, statesman, b. in Northampton county, Va., 17 June, 1790; d. near Washington, D. C., 28 Feb., 1844. He received a classical education, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1810, and practised at Richmond, Va., until 1824, when he removed to his estate in Northampton county, and was elected to the legislature. In 1826 he was appointed a judge in the general court of Virginia, in 1829 he was a member of the convention that was called to revise the state constitution, and after the reorganization of the judicial system under that instrument he was again elected judge of the same court. This office he continued to hold until 1841, when he was called by President Tyler to fill that of secretary of the navy. On the resignation of Daniel Webster, in 1843, he was made secretary of state. In politics he belonged to the extreme state-rights pro-slavery school of the south. Early in 1844 he was on the U. S. steamer "Princeton," on Potomac river, in company with the president and the other members of the cabinet, to witness experiments with a large wrought-iron gun, which burst on being fired the third time and killed him together with several others. He became a midshipman, 4 Nov., 1841, and cruised in the sloop "St. Mary's" in 1843-'6, in which he joined the squadron in the Gulf of Mexico during the Mexican war. He served in the naval battery during the bombardment of Vera Cruz, 10 to 25 March, 1847, and after the fall of that city he attended the naval school, becoming a passed midshipman, 10 Aug., 1847. He was promoted to master, 18 July, 1855, and to lieutenant, 14 Sept., 1855, served in the frigate "Cumberland" on the coast of Africa to suppress the slave-trade in 1858-'9, and was an instructor at the naval academy in 1859-'61. When the war began he was assigned to the North Atlantic blockading squadron, and participated in the capture of the forts at Hatteras inlet and in the sounds of North Carolina in 1861. He was executive officer of the steam frigate "Wabash" at the capture of Port Royal, and commanded four boats in Commander C. R. P. Rodgers's expedition in the inland coast waters in the vicinity of Port Royal and Beaufort, S. C. He was in charge of the steamer "Flambeau," of the South Atlantic blockading squadron, in 1862-'3 in operations on the coast of South Carolina. He was promoted to lieutenant-commander, 16 July, 1862, assigned to the steam frigate "Minnesota," of the North Atlantic blockading squadron, in 1863-'4, and had the steamer "A. D. Vance" (a blockade-runner whose name was changed to the "Frolic") in 1864-'5, in which he took part in both engagements at Fort Fisher. He was promoted to commander, 25 July, 1866, and given the "Frolic," on the Mediterranean station, in 1865-'7. After promotion to captain, 31 Jan., 1872, he served as a member of the board of inspectors in 1877-'80. He had a leave of absence, during which he visited Europe, in 1880, and upon his return was a member of the board of examiners. He was commandant of the Brooklyn navy-yard in 1882-'4, and commander-in-chief of the Pacific station in 1884-'5. He was promoted to rear-admiral, 1 Oct., 1884, and was voluntarily placed on the retired list, 1 June, 1885.—A niece, Mary Jane Stith, poet, b. in Accomac county, Va., 7 April, 1828, was educated entirely at home, and early began writing for the press. On the death of her father, in 1869, she removed from Norfolk, Va., to New York city, and on 2 July, 1870, married Josiah R. Sturges. Mrs. Sturges was one of the organizers and the first president of the Harlem free hospital and dispensary for women and children. She has contributed to southern periodicals both prose and poetry, commonly under the pen-name of "Fanny Fielding." Her principal work is "Confederate Notes," an historical novel, which appeared anonymously in 1867 in the "Home Monthly," published at Nashville, Tenn.

UPSON, Ansel Judd, clergyman, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 7 Nov., 1823. He was graduated at Hamilton college in 1843, and began to study law in Utica, but became a tutor in Hamilton in 1845, and in 1849 was made adjunct professor of rhetoric and moral philosophy. From 1853 till 1870 he held the chair of logic, rhetoric, and elocution, and then, after serving as pastor of the 2d Presbyterian church in Albany, he became in 1880 professor of sacred rhetoric and pastoral theology in Auburn theological seminary. Hamilton gave him the degree of D. D. in 1870, and Union that of LL. D. in 1880. He has been a regent of the State university since 1874, and a member of the general assembly of his church in 1871 and 1877. He was in command of the 1st cavalry division in the District of East Tennessee in July and August, 1865, and of the District of Colorado from 22 Aug., 1865, till 30 April, 1866, when he was mustered out of the volunteer service. In the reorganization he became lieutenant-colonel, 25th infantry, 28 July, 1866. He had employment in the intervals of active service in preparing an original system of tactics for the use of the military forces of the government, and in 1867 his system for infantry was adopted. He was commandant of cadets at the U. S. military academy in 1870-'5, and member of a "board to assimilate the tactics" in 1873, when his system, modified for artillery and cavalry, was also accepted. Gen. Upton was sent on a tour of inspection of the armies of Europe and Asia in 1875-'7, and on his return was assigned to the artillery-school at Fort Monroe, and wrote his official report, which was published by the government in 1878. While in Nantucket he was sent twice to the gen-

He was treasurer for eight years of the Michigan Central railroad, and built numerous clipper-ships for the California and Pacific trade. He was a member of the executive council of the state in 1853, and of the constitutional convention of the same year. He was active during the civil war in measures for the relief of the sick and wounded soldiers, and made large contributions to the fund for procuring recruits. He opposed the Clarendon-Johnson treaty in regard to the Alabama, and in an open letter to Earl Russell controverted the arguments of that statesman. UPTON, Samuel, editor, b. in Middleton, Mass., in 1784; d. in Washington, D. C., 3 March, 1842. His ancestor, John (1620-'99), came to New England as early as 1638, and ultimately settled in what is now North Reading, Mass., where he became a great landed proprietor and one of the most influential citizens. He was one of the first to deprecate the inordinate influence of the clergy in the colony, and was conspicuous for his opposition to religious tests in civil matters and to the prosecutions for witchcraft. He was ancestor of all the other Uptons that are mentioned in these pages. Samuel engaged in mercantile and shipping business, first at Salem, Mass., and afterward in Castine and Bangor, Me., and Boston. In Maine he exerted a great influence in politics and edited the Bangor "Gazette" and "Whig." In 1819 he represented Castine in the 1st general court. In later life he removed to Washington, D. C., where he is buried in the Congressional cemetery.—His son, Charles Horace, politician, b. in Salem, Mass., 23 Aug., 1812; d. in Geneva, Switzerland, in June, 1877, was graduated at Bowdoin in 1834, and settled in Fairfax county, Va., whence he was elected to congress in 1860. In 1863 he was appointed U. S. consul at Geneva, Switzerland.—Another son, Edward Peirce, lawyer, b. in Castine, Me., 22 July, 1816, received an academic education, was admitted to the bar, and settled in Virginia, but about 1858 removed to Texas. During the civil war he was a devoted friend of the Union and was indicted for treason against the Confederacy, imprisoned six months, and shot at several times. One of his sons was murdered by a political mob a year after the war. He was appointed judge of the 18th judicial district of Texas in 1867, and held the post two years.—Another son, Francis Henry, lawyer, b. in Salem, Mass., 25 May, 1814; d. in New York city, 25 June, 1876, was graduated at Harvard law-school in 1835 and settled in New York city, where he rose to eminence in his profession. During the civil war he held the appointment of counsel for captors in prize courts, and while arguing a case received a stroke of paralysis from which he never recovered. He published "A Treatise on the Law of Trade-Marks, with a Digest and Review of English and American Authorities" (Albany, 1860), and "The Law of Nations affecting Commerce during War, with a Review of the Jurisprudence, Practice, and Proceedings of Prize Courts" (New York, 1863).—Francis Henry's daughter, Sara Carr, author, b. 1 Jan., 1843, resides in Washington, D. C., where she was for seventeen years translator of modern languages in the post-office department. She is a frequent contributor to magazines and has in press a volume of "Translations from the French."—Another son of Samuel Upton, Wheelock Samuel, lawyer, b. in Salem, Mass., 17 Jan., 1811; d. in Carrollton, La., 18 Oct., 1860, received an academic education, and was graduated at the Harvard law-school in 1832, and settled in New Orleans. He resigned this office in 1852 and went to California, where he settled first at Weaverville, and in 1855 in Sacramento. He was elected a representative in the legislature of California in 1856, and was prosecuting attorney of Sacramento county from 1861 till 1864. In 1865 he removed to Portland, Oregon, and was at once elected a member of the legislature on the Republican ticket. He had been a Democrat until the civil war. He was appointed associate justice of the supreme court of Oregon in 1867, and was elected to that office for a term of six years in 1868. In 1872 the legislature ordered more than eighty of his nisi prius decisions to be printed and bound with the decisions of the supreme court, and he became chief justice the same year. He declined a renomination in 1874 and resumed the practice of his profession. In the presidential controversy of 1876, the vote of Oregon being in doubt, the Republicans practically rested their case before the electoral commission on a decision that had been rendered by Judge Upton upon the question of the power of the governor of Oregon to exercise judicial functions. A majority of the supreme court of the state differed with him, but the electoral commission sustained his view. In 1877 he was appointed second comptroller of the treasury of the United States, but in 1885 he resigned, and resumed the practice of his profession in Washington. He has published a "Digest of Decisions of the Second Comptroller of the Treasury, 1869 to 1884" (Washington, 1885).

He early attained reputation as a skilful navigator, and in 1525 left Mexico as chief pilot of the fleet of Garcia de Loaysa in the expedition to the Moluccas. There he fought against the Portuguese till 1536, when he was sent to report to the emperor, but was shipwrecked on the coast of Portugal, imprisoned in Lisbon, and deprived of his papers and valuables. He escaped, and went to Valladolid, where Charles V. held his court, but, unable to obtain recognition for his services, he entered the order of St. Austin. On his return to Mexico, he was made librarian of his order. In 1558 Philip II., urged by the council of the Indies, decided to pursue the conquest of the Philippine islands. Urdaneta being named to him as the person that best knew those parts, the king wrote to him, in September, 1559, appointing him chief pilot of the expedition, which, under Miguel Lopez de Legaspi, left Acapulco, 21 Nov., 1564. After taking possession of Cebu, and conquering Mindoro, Legaspi dispatched Urdaneta to New Spain with a request for re-enforcements. He reported afterward to the king at Madrid before returning to his convent in Mexico, where he died. He wrote several memoirs and letters which are preserved in the archives of the Indies at Seville. Among them are "Relación del Viage del Comendador Garcia de Loaysa," "Relación de la expedición del Comendador Miguel Lopez de Legaspi," and "Cartas al rey Felipe II. condescripciones de los puertos de Acapulco y Navidad." In the first memoir he speaks of a strait which the French reported to exist "north of the codfish country" (Newfoundland or Labrador), communicating with the Pacific.

URDANETA, Rafael, Venezuelan soldier, b. in Maracaibo, 24 Oct., 1789; d. in Paris, France, 23 Aug., 1845. He took part in the revolutionary movement of 1810, on 25 July was appointed lieutenant, and fought in the campaigns of 1811-'12. In 1813, with the auxiliaries of Cundinamarca, he accompanied Bolivar to Venezuela. He entered Caracas on 6 Aug., after which he was promoted brigadier. In March, 1814, he defended the city of Valencia with a small force against the besieging army of 4,000 men under Ceballos till he was relieved on 3 April by Bolivar. He also took part in the victorious battle of Carabobo, 28 May, 1814, and protected the retreat of the patriot army after the defeat of La Puerta, 15 June. He retired with a remnant of the army to the western provinces, but after being routed at Mucuchies on 7 Sept. he penetrated into New Granada. There he joined Bolivar, and, after being promoted major-general and sent to Cucuta, he was defeated in Balaga in November, 1815, and with the rest of his forces joined Páez in Apure. He was second in command in the operations against Caracas in 1818, being also appointed member of the council of government in Angostura. The next year he was made general-in-chief of the army that was forming in Margarita from the German and British legions and native troops, with which he operated against Cumana and captured Barcelona. In 1821 he obtained the submission of Maracaibo and Coro, and in 1826 was sent to Venezuela, and opposed the plans of Páez, returning to Colombia in 1827 as commander of Cundinamarca. He was also member of the constituent congress of Colombia, and twice secretary of war, occupying, from September, 1830, till April, 1831, the executive of the nation to fill a vacancy. Shortly afterward he returned to Venezuela, where he was successively senator for the province of Coro, governor of Guayana, and twice secretary of war. In 1845 he was sent as minister to Madrid, but he died on his way.—His cousin, Francisco, South American soldier, b. in Montevideo, 3 Aug., 1791; d. in Bogota in 1861, entered the military service in his youth, and fought against the British in 1806-'7. In 1809 he was called by his uncle, Martin Urdaneta, to Bogota, where he entered the Spanish service, but he joined the patriot cause in 1810. In 1819 he participated in the campaign of Cauca, becoming in 1820 governor of Popayan, and in 1821 of Antioquia. In 1829 he was promoted major-general. In 1861 he used his utmost efforts to save the lives of the political prisoners in the College of Rosario, and when they were assassinated before his eyes, on 7 March, he retired to his home, where he soon died.

URE, Robert, Canadian clergyman, b. in Lanarkshire, Scotland, in January, 1823. When he was nineteen years old he emigrated to Canada, and settled at Hamilton. He studied theology, and was ordained a minister of the Free Presbyterian church in 1850. He was a pastor at Streetsville in 1850-'62, and since the latter year he has been stationed at Goderich, Ont. He was for two years a lecturer on apologetics at Knox college, Toronto, and has also been a lecturer on the same subject at Queen's university, Kingston. He aided in bringing about the union of the various Presbyterian churches in Canada, and was a moderator of the united churches. He received the degree of D. D. from Queen's university in 1876.

URFÉ, Gabriel Jules (oor-fay), West Indian navigator, b. in Martinique, W. I., in 1795; d. in the Arctic ocean in 1833. He was educated at Paris, entered the navy as a midshipman in 1810, and after the restoration of Louis XVIII., in 1814, was attached as ensign to the frigate "La Railleuse" and sent to South America. After assisting in re-establishing French consulates in Brazil, Venezuela, Mexico, and the West Indies, he was a commissioner in 1817 to receive the surrender of the administration of French Guiana from the Portuguese, and afterward took part in a campaign to Martinique and Santo Domingo. Later he was employed at Madagascar and Bourbon, and in 1830 he was attached to the department of charts in the navy office. On 4 July, 1833, he sailed as second in command of the frigate "La Liloise" with Poret de Blosseville for an exploration of the Arctic ocean. They prepared a chart of the western coast of Greenland, which they forwarded in August following to Admiral Duperré, and stopped afterward at Vagna-Fjord, whence they returned in October, navigating along the coast of Greenland. This was the last that was heard of the frigate, and the subsequent expeditions that were sent to search for it failed to discover any trace of the navigators. Urfé's works include, besides several memoirs that are published in the "Annales maritimes et coloniales," "Histoire de la découverte du Groënland par les navigateurs Scandinaves" (Paris, 1831), and "Historique de l'occupation Anglaise à la Martinique" (1832).

URFÉ, Louis Édouard d', West Indian missionary, b. in Les Saintes, Guadeloupe, in 1699; d. in Leghorn in 1762. He was educated in the college of the Jesuits at Bordeaux, entered that order in 1727, and was sent in the following year to Guadeloupe, where he resided several years and had charge of the parish of Capesterre. In 1742 he went to Cayenne, founded several missions among the Galibi Indians, explored Guiana and the basin of the Orinoco, and in 1760 became visitor of his order. He died at Leghorn during a voyage for the purpose of conferring with the general of the Jesuits. Urfé's works include "Grammaire Galibi" (Paris, 1755); "Dictionnaire Galibi" (1757); and "Histoire des établissements de la foi fondés dans la Guiane ou Nouvelle France méridionale" (1762).

URICOCHEA, Ezequiel (oo-ri-ko-chay'-ah), Colombian scientist, b. in Bogota in 1834. As early as 1846 he obtained in college the first prize in mathematics, and in 1849 he went to the United States to finish his studies, being graduated in medicine at Yale. In 1852 he went to Germany, and in 1854 was graduated at the University of Göttingen, devoting himself specially to the study of chemistry and mineralogy. He travelled through Europe for two years, and remained six months in Brussels to study astronomy in the observatory of that city. In 1857 he returned to his native country, where he was professor of chemistry till 1868. He founded the Society of naturalists of New Granada, and is a member of several scientific societies, including the Spanish academy and the Academy of history of Madrid. He has written "Memorias sobre las Antigüedades Neo-Granadinas" (Berlin, 1854); "Contribuciones de Colombia á las Ciencias y á las Artes" (Bogota, 1859-'61); "Mapoteca Colombiana" (London, 1860); "Gramática, Frases, y Oraciones de la lengua Chibcha" (Bogota, 1861); "Gramática de la lengua Chibcha" (Paris, 1871); "Alfabeto fonético de la lengua Castellana" (Madrid, 1872); and several articles in the "Mosaico."

URQUIZA, Justo José de (oor-kee'-thah), Argentine soldier, b. in Arroyo de la China, near the capital of Entre Rios, 19 March, 1800; d. in San José, 11 April, 1870. He was sent by his father to Buenos Ayres, where he received a good education in the Jesuit college. In 1820 he established himself in business in his native village, but his education and dexterity in the use of arms gave him power over his neighbors, and in one of the internal revolts he was elected commander of the National guard. He soon gained influence in politics, and, as a defender of the federal principle, was favored by the dictator Rosas. When the latter gave Manuel Oribe the means to invade Uruguay, he ordered Urquiza with 4,000 men to assist in the war, and in 1844 the latter passed the river Uruguay, obtained partial success in the encounters of Arequita and Malbajar, and finally defeated Rivera at India Muerta on 28 March, 1845, celebrating his victory by the execution of 500 prisoners. On his return he was elected in 1846 governor of Entre Rios, and by arbitrary measures soon amassed an enormous fortune. No shop of any kind could be opened without his permit, which was only given to persons that shared the profits with him, and, prohibiting the importation of wheat into the state, he reserved for himself the exclusive right of milling flour from the crop of his large farms. He waged a war against the Unitarians of Corrientes, emulating the dictator Rosas in cruelties, and soon acquired such an influence that he was in reality the dictator of Entre Rios. When in 1850 Rosas, by treaty with England and France, declared the navigation of the Parana and Uruguay closed to foreign flags, Urquiza united with the governor of Corrientes in a protest, and began to intrigue against the Argentine dictator, and when Rosas, in the beginning of 1851, went through the customary farce of resigning the executive, in the expectation of being re-elected with increased powers, Urquiza and Gov. Visaroso, of Corrientes, accepted the resignation, and declared the sovereignty of the two states restored. Urquiza, on 1 May, issued a manifesto, calling upon the nation to throw off the yoke of the dictator, and on the 29th of that month he concluded, as governor of Entre Rios, an offensive and defensive alliance with Brazil and Uruguay against Rosas. He passed Uruguay river in June with 4,000 men, captured Paysandu, and, without awaiting Brazilian reinforcements, marched against Oribe, who was still besieging Montevideo. The whole country rose to join Urquiza, and Oribe, seeing his cause lost, capitulated on 8 Oct. Re-enforced by the Uruguayan and Brazilian armies, and protected by the Brazilian fleet, Urquiza repassed the Uruguay and Parana, and, on 12 Jan., 1852, began his march with an army of 30,000 men against Rosas. The latter had fortified his camps of Palermo and Santos Lugares, but in the final battle of Monte Caseros, on 3 Feb., he was defeated after a short resistance, and fled on board a British ship, Urquiza marring his victory by the execution of the valiant

Col. Chilabert, the only one of Rosas's chiefs that had fought well. On 4 Feb. he appointed Dr. Lopez provisional governor of Buenos Ayres, and remained encamped in Palermo, whence he sent all the art treasures that had been accumulated by Rosas to his country-seat of San José. On 6 April the governors of Entre Rios, Corrientes, and Buenos Ayres, and a representative of the government of Santa Fé, declared the national executive restored, and appointed Urquiza provisional director until the meeting of a congress. But, instead of convoking congress, he summoned a meeting of all the governors at San Nicolas de los Arroyos, which on 31 May proclaimed him provisional president. On the return of Gov. Lopez from San Nicolas, stormy debates followed in the chamber of deputies, 21 and 22 June, in which Bartolome Mitre, who had prepared public opinion by editorial articles in his paper, "Los Debates," took a prominent part. Gov. Lopez resigned, flying to Palermo, and Urquiza on the 23d closed the office of "Los Debates," arbitrarily dissolved the legislature, and his opponents fled to escape imprisonment; but when the dictator left for Santa Fé, to open the constituent congress, a revolution began in Buenos Ayres on 11 Sept., which declared the province independent, electing Valentin Alsina governor. Urquiza tried to subdue the city, but after an unsuccessful campaign raised the siege on 13 July, 1853, and in November of that year was elected constitutional president for the other thirteen states, with residence in Parana. The new president signed a treaty with France, England, and the United States, declaring the navigation of the Parana and Uruguay free to all nations. In 1859 Buenos Ayres was invited to enter the union again, but refused, and Urquiza marched with the national troops against the state, defeating the forces under Mitre at Cepeda on 23 Oct., 1859. Gov. Alsina resigned, and the new governor agreed to send deputies to the congress of Parana, on condition that certain reforms should be made in the Federal constitution, to be proposed by Buenos Ayres. The latter were accepted by congress on 25 Sept., 1860, and Buenos Ayres, sent deputies; but they were refused admittance on pretext that the state electoral law was unconstitutional. Buenos Ayres armed again, and under Gen. Mitre sent her forces to defend her territory, when the new Federal president, Dr. Santiago Derqui, declared war against the province, appointing Urquiza commander-in-chief. The opposing armies met on 17 Sept., 1861, at Pavon, and Urquiza was defeated, retiring with his troops to Entre Rios. After Gen. Mitre's election to the Federal executive, Urquiza was again elected governor of his province, and fitted up his country-seat at San José in great splendor, constructing a large artificial lake by means of the labor of political prisoners. In this place he was surprised by an armed party, who assassinated him and afterward proclaimed Gen. Lopez Jordan governor.

URRUTIA, Ignacio J. de (oor-root'-yah), Cuban historian, b. in Havana in 1730; d. there in 1798. He studied law in his native city, and in 1755 was admitted to the bar. He filled several public offices, which afforded him opportunities to collect documents and information about the history of the island of Cuba, and especially of Havana. In 1787 he retired from public affairs to devote himself to his "Teatro histórico, jurídico, político, militar de la Isla Fernandina de Cuba," which was left incomplete. The first volume was published in 1795, and several chapters of the second appeared in the reprint of the first volume in the work that is known as "Los tres primeros historiadores de Cuba" (Havana, 1876). Urrutia published also "Compendio de Memorias para servir á la historia de la Isla Fernandina de Cuba" (1791).

URTIAGA, Pedro (oor-tee-ah'-gah), Mexican missionary, b. in Queretaro about 1650; d. in Porto Rico about 1720. He entered the Order of St. Francis, and set out for Central America with four other missionaries in 1694. He obtained good results among the wild Choles, Talamanca, and Tologalpa tribes, whose language he soon learned, and founded in the city of Guatemala the College of Propaganda Fide. In 1703 he went to Spain, and on his return in 1704 he was captured by a British cruiser and landed on the coast of Portugal. He returned on foot to the court of Madrid, and was appointed bishop of Porto Rico, in which city he died. Besides numerous religious works of merit, which have been reprinted many times in Mexico and Guatemala, he is author of "Diario del viage de los cinco misioneros Franciscanos desde Querétaro hasta Guatemala en 1694; y conquista espiritual de los Indios Choles, Talamancos y Tologalpos" (Mexico, 1702).

URUGUAY, Paulino José Soares e Souza (oo-roo-gah'-ee), Viscount de, Brazilian statesman, b. in Paris, France, in 1807; d. in Rio Janeiro, Brazil, 15 July, 1866. He was educated at the University of Coimbra, studied law in the Academy of São Paulo, Brazil, entered the magistracy in 1831, was a member, and afterward president, of the provincial assembly of Rio Janeiro, after the promulgation of the additional act to the constitution. He was a member of the Brazilian parliament in 1836-'49, entered the cabinet on 23 May, 1840, as minister of justice, and held the same office in 1841-'3, prepared the law of 3 Dec., 1841, which reformed the criminal procedure of the empire, was secretary of foreign relations in 1843-'4, and became a senator, 21 March, 1849. On 8 Oct. of the same year he succeeded Marquis de Olinda as secretary of foreign relations. He negotiated in 1851 the treaty of alliance between Uruguay, Entre-Rios, and Brazil, and treaties of commerce with Uruguay, Peru, and the Argentine Republic, and resigning, 6 Sept., 1853, was appointed on 8 Sept. a councillor of state, and created Viscount of Uruguay and a grandee of the first class, 2 Dec., 1854. He went to Paris in the following year as minister to settle the difficult question of the frontier between Brazil and French Guiana, returning in 1858 to Brazil. He wrote "Ensaio sobre o Direito administrativo" (2 vols., Rio Janeiro, 1862) and "Estudos praticos sobre o administração das provincias do Brazil" (2 vols., 1866).

USHER, Hezekiah, bookseller, b. in England about 1615; d. in Boston, Mass., 14 March, 1676. He was a citizen of Cambridge in 1639, and in 1646 established himself in Boston, became a select-man of the town, and, as agent for the Society for propagating the gospel, purchased in England in 1657 the press and types for printing Eliot's Indian Bible. He was a founder of the Old South church in 1669.—His son, Hezekiah, bookseller, b. in Cambridge, Mass., 6 June, 1639; d. in Boston, Mass., 11 July, 1679, was also engaged in business in Boston. During the excitement over witchcraft he was arrested, but was suffered to make his escape from the colony. His wife was Bridget, daughter of John Lisle, the regicide, and widow of Leonard Hoar.—Another son, John, lieutenant-governor of New Hampshire, b. in Boston, Mass., 27 April, 1648; d. in Medford, Mass., 1 Sept., 1726, succeeded his father in business, and became a member of the council, a colonel of militia, and treasurer of Massachusetts. His second wife was Elizabeth, daughter of Samuel Allen, whose claims to the New Hampshire patent he supported. In March, 1677, he acted in London as agent for Massachusetts colony in the purchase of the title to the district of Maine from Sir Ferdinando Gorges. He was lieutenant-governor of New Hampshire from 1692 till 1697, and was reappointed in 1702.—John's great-great-grandson, John Palmer, secretary of the interior, b. in Brookfield, N. Y., 9 Jan., 1816; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 13 April, 1889, removed to Indiana, studied and practised law, was elected to the legislature, and was attorney-general of the state. He was appointed 1st assistant secretary of the interior on 20 March, 1862, and on the resignation of Caleb B. Smith, succeeded him as head of the interior department on 8 Jan., 1863, holding the office till 15 May, 1865, when he resigned, and resumed the practice of his profession, becoming consulting attorney for the Union Pacific railroad.

USSHER, Brandram Boileau, Canadian R. E. bishop, b. in Dublin, Ireland, 6 Aug., 1845. He was educated at Delgany college, Wicklow, and in private schools. He early conceived a love for the study of medicine, but his father encountered financial losses and his studies came to an abrupt close. He was sent to New York, where he abandoned business at the end of a year and began the study of medicine in Washington and subsequently at the University of Michigan. Ten years were passed in Aurora, Ill., where he practised his profession. Hearing a sermon by Dwight L. Moody, he determined to study for the ministry, and on 9 June, 1874, he was ordained deacon in Christ church, Chicago, by Bishop Cheney, of the Reformed Episcopal church. Two years later he became presbyter in Emmanuel church, Ottawa, Canada. In Canada he has held pastorates in Toronto and Montreal, where he has had charge of St. Bartholomew's church since 1878. He and his congregation withdrew from the jurisdiction of the Reformed Episcopal church in the United States and united their fortunes with the English branch of that body, otherwise called the Reformed church of England. The general synod in England elected Dr. Ussher to the episcopate, but he declined. Two years later he was re-elected, the Canadian synod choosing him as their bishop. On 19 June, 1882, he was consecrated in Trinity church, Southend, by Bishop Gregg and seven presbyters. He returned to Canada and assumed the duties of his large diocese, which includes Newfoundland.

USSIEUX, Jacques Gérard des (oos-se-uh), French naval officer, b. in Eu, Normandy, in 1719; d. in Port Royal, Martinique, in 1781. He was a captain in the merchant service, and during the war of 1756 he commanded privateers against the English, and defended the fortifications at the entrance of St. Lawrence river. After the conclusion of peace he entered the service of Louis Antoine de Bougainville, who had obtained from Louis XV. a grant of the Falkland islands, carried emigrants there in 1764, and governed the colony during Bougainville's absence. After the retrocession of the Falkland archipelago to Spain in 1766, he was sent to make an exploration of the coast of Patagonia, and visited also the island of Georgia. At the beginning of the war of 1778 he again entered the royal navy as 1st lieutenant, and was appointed harbor-master of Port Royal. He published "Histoire de la colonie fondée aux îles Malouines par le capitaine de Bougainville, suivie d'une description de la côte de la Patagonie, et d'une relation d'un voyage à l'île Saint Pierre et à la Terre des États" (Dieppe, 1768).

VAIL, Stephen, manufacturer, b. near Morristown, N. J., 28 June, 1780; d. there, 12 June, 1864. He received ordinary educational advantages, and in 1804 became the owner of the Speedwell iron-works, near Morristown, N. J. At these works the engine of the "Savannah," the first steamship to cross the Atlantic (1819), was built. Later he contributed money to aid in the construction of the electric telegraph, and at his place the first practical exhibition of the new invention was made. He was one of the lay officers that are required on the local bench, and so acquired the title of judge.—His son, Alfred, inventor, b. in Morristown, N. J., 25 Sept., 1807; d. there, 18 Jan., 1859, was educated at Morris academy, and as a youth showed a fondness for study and investigation in natural science. In accordance with the wishes of his father, he entered the Speedwell iron-works, but on attaining his majority he determined to prepare for the Presbyterian ministry, and in consequence was graduated at the University of the city of New York in 1836. While in college he became interested in the experiments that Prof. Samuel F. B. Morse was then conducting for the purpose of perfecting a system of telegraphy. Vail became convinced of the possibility of the scheme of electric communication, and his mechanical knowledge led to various suggestions on his part to Prof. Morse. This acquaintance developed into an offer of partnership, and he obtained permission to invite Prof. Morse to Speedwell, where he persuaded his father to contribute $2,000 toward the completion of the apparatus. In 1837 an agreement was signed by Mr. Vail, in which it was stipulated that he should construct at his own expense, and exhibit before a committee of congress, one of the telegraphs "of the plan and invention of Morse," and that he should give his time and personal services to the work and assume the expense of exhibiting the apparatus and of procuring patents in the United States. In consideration, Vail was to receive one fourth of all rights in the invention in this country. Thereafter, until congress appropriated money for the building of the initial line between Baltimore and Washington, Vail was active in developing the practical parts of the telegraph. His mechanical knowledge applied to the experimental apparatus resulted in the first available Morse machine. He invented the first combination of the horizontal lever motion to actuate a pen, pencil, or style, and then devised a telegraphic alphabet of dots, spaces, and dashes which it necessitated. The dot-and-dash system had already been invented by Morse for use in a code, but Mr. Vail claimed that he was the first to apply it alphabetically. He then devised in 1844 the lever and grooved roller, which embossed on paper the alphabetical characters that he originated. In March, 1843, he was appointed assistant superintendent of the telegraph that was to be constructed between Washington and Baltimore under the government appropriation. On the completion of the line he was stationed at Baltimore, and there invented the finger-key and received at the Mount Claire depot the first message from Washington that was sent over the wires, on 24 May, 1844, at the formal opening of the line. (See MORSE, S. F. B.) The practical improvements in the original instrument that are of value in telegraphy were invented by Vail. Prior to 1837 the apparatus embodied the work of Morse and Joseph Henry alone. From 1837 to 1844 it was a combination of the inventions of Morse, Henry, and Vail, but gradually the parts that Morse contributed have been eliminated, so that the essential features of the telegraph of to-day consist solely of the work of Joseph Henry and Alfred Vail. The business relations that existed between Morse and Vail made it impossible for the latter to claim what might have been used against the validity of Morse's patents. In the years that followed, when Prof. Morse was universally hailed as the inventor of the telegraph, the reputation of his modest partner was allowed to suffer. Amos Kendall, the associate and friend of both, said, at the meeting of the directors of the Magnetic telegraph company that was held to take action on the death of Mr. Vail: "If justice be done, the name of Alfred Vail will forever stand associated with that of Samuel F. B. Morse in the history and introduction into public use of the electro-magnetic telegraph." Mr. Vail was the author of "The American Electro-Magnetic Telegraph" (Philadelphia, 1845).—His brother, George, congressman, b. in Morristown, N. J., 21 July, 1809; d. there, 23 May, 1875, received an academic education, and was associated with his father in the Speedwell iron-works. He also aided his brother, Alfred, with funds when the latter was engaged in perfecting the electric telegraph. In 1851 he was appointed by the governor of New Jersey to represent that state at the World's fair in London. Subsequently he was chosen to congress as a Democrat, and with re-election served from 5 Dec., 1853, till 3 March, 1857. In 1858 he was appointed U. S. consul at Glasgow, Scotland, but he returned to this country in 1861, settled in Morristown, N. J., and was for many years a member of the court of pardons.

VAIL, Stephen Montford, clergyman, b. in Union Dale, Westchester co., N. Y., 10 Jan., 1818; d. in Jersey City, N. J., 26 Nov., 1880. He was graduated at Bowdoin in 1838, and at Union theological seminary in 1842, having in the mean time been licensed to preach in the Methodist Episcopal church, and founded the first church of that denomination in Brunswick, Me. He became professor of languages in Amenia seminary in 1843, was subsequently pastor in Fishkill, N. Y., Sharon, Conn., and Pine Plains, N. Y., and in 1847-'9 was president of the New Jersey conference seminary at Pennington. While occupying that post he induced the trustees of the institution to admit women as pupils, and he was tried before the ecclesiastical court of his church for advocating in his writings the cause of an educated ministry. He became professor of Oriental languages in the General biblical institute of the M. E. church at Concord, N. H., in 1849, and held that chair until failing health required his resignation. In 1869 he became U. S. consul for Rhenish Bavaria, travelled extensively in the East and Egypt, and on his return settled in Southfield, Staten island, N. Y. He wrote for the Methodist press, and was professor of Hebrew in the Chautauqua school of languages. Genesee college, Lima, N. Y., gave him the degree of D. D. in 1856. Dr. Vail was an active member of the Republican party, and an early Abolitionist. Previous to the civil war he sustained a long and able controversy with Bishop John H. Hopkins on the subject of human slavery, the bishop being an earnest advocate of that institution. Dr. Vail published essays on slavery and church polity, "Outlines of Hebrew Grammar," and other educational hand-books, and "Memoir and Remains of Rev. Zenas Caldwell" (Boston, 1824); "Education in the Methodist Episcopal Church" (1853); and "The Bible against Slavery" (Concord, N. H., 1864).

VAIL, Thomas Hubbard, P. E. bishop, b. in Richmond, Va., 21 Oct., 1812; d. in Bryn Mawr, Pa., 6 Oct., 1889. On the death of his father in 1817 his mother returned to the north. The son was graduated at Washington (now Trinity) college in 1831, and at the General theological seminary in New York in 1835, was ordered deacon by Bishop Brownell in St. Mark's church, New Canaan, Conn., 29 June, 1835, and priest in Grace church, Boston, by Bishop Griswold, 6 Jan., 1837. During his diaconate he served for a short time as assistant minister in St. James's church, Philadelphia, and he was afterward assistant to Dr. Jonathan M. Wainwright in St. Paul's church, Boston. He organized the parish of All Saints, Worcester, Mass., became rector of Christ church, Cambridge, in 1837, and in 1839 of St. John's church, Essex. In 1844 he removed to Rhode Island and was made rector of Christ church, Westerly, where he remained fourteen years, serving as deputy to the General convention during part of that time. In 1857 he returned to Massachusetts as rector of St. John's, Taunton. In 1863 he went to Iowa, taking the rectorship of Trinity church, Muscatine. The degree of S. T. D. was given him by Brown in 1858, and that of LL. D. by the University of Kansas in 1875. He was consecrated first bishop of Kansas, 15 Dec., 1864, in Trinity church, Muscatine, Iowa. Bishop Vail was the author of "Hannah," a sacred drama, published anonymously (Boston, 1839); "The Comprehensive Church" (1841; 3d ed., New York, 1883); and numerous reports of school committees, charges, addresses, and pastoral letters. He edited, with a memoir of the author, Rev. Augustus F. Lyte's "Buds of Spring," poems (Boston, 1838).

VAIL, William Berrian, Canadian member of parliament, b. in Sussex, New Brunswick, 19 Dec., 1823. He is a grandson of Robert Vail, a loyalist, who removed from the United States to New Brunswick at the close of the Revolution. He is a lieutenant-colonel of militia, was a member of the executive council and provincial secretary of Nova Scotia in 1867-'74, and on 30 Sept., 1874, became a member of the privy council of Canada, and was appointed minister of militia and defence. This portfolio he resigned in January, 1878. He represented Digby in the Nova Scotia assembly from 1867 till his appointment to office in the Dominion government, when he was returned for the same constituency in the Canadian parliament. He was not a candidate at the election in 1878, but was elected in February, 1887. He is a Liberal, favors free-trade relations with all countries, and the maintenance of the integrity of the British empire. Mr. Vail's father, John C. Vail, was a representative in the New Brunswick house of assembly for twenty-five years; and his brother, Arnold Vail, M. D., was a member of the house for fifteen years, for eight years speaker, and at his death, in July, 1886, was a member of the executive and legislative councils of New Brunswick.

VAILL, Joseph, clergyman, b. in Litchfield, Conn., 3 July, 1750; d. in Killingworth, Conn., 21 Nov., 1838. His father, of the same name, removed to Litchfield from Southold, Long Island, about 1730. In 1772 the son went to Hanover, N. H., travelling most of the way on foot, with the intention of preparing for Dartmouth, and defraying his expenses by working in a saw-mill. He was graduated in 1778, studied divinity in Northbury (now Plymouth), Conn., and was licensed to preach in May, 1779. From 9 Feb., 1780, till his death he was pastor of the church at Hadlyme, Conn., where he also gave some time to teaching. He made two missionary tours, one in 1792 to Vermont, and another in 1807 to the "Black river country" in New York. After 1832 he was given a colleague. Mr. Vaill contributed to the "Connecticut Evangelical Magazine," under the pen-names of "Senex" and "Jethro," wrote for other periodicals, and, besides sermons, published a narrative poem entitled "Noah's Flood," with some minor poetical pieces (1796). See "Memoir of the Life and Character of the Rev. Joseph Vaill," by Rev. Isaac Parsons (New York, 1839).—His son, Joseph, clergyman, b. in Hadlyme, Conn., in 1790; d. in Palmer, Mass., 22 Feb., 1869, was graduated at Yale in 1811, taught in Litchfield and Salisbury, Conn., and studied theology with his father. He was pastor of the Congregational church in Brimfield in 1814-'34, and again in 1837-'41, in Portland, Me., in 1834-'7, and at Palmer, Mass., from 1854 until 1868. In 1841-'5 he was financial agent for Amherst college, and during that period of financial embarrassment he raised for its endowment the sum of $100,000. Amherst gave him the degree of D. D. in 1851. In the autumn before his death he was elected to the legislature of Massachusetts. He published "Sermons" (Springfield, 1861).

VAILLANT, Auguste Nicolas (val-yong), French naval officer, b. in Paris, France, 2 July, 1793; d. in France, 1 Nov., 1858. He entered the navy and rose rapidly in the service, but was retired in 1816 on suspicion of being a Bonapartist. He was restored in 1818, and sent to French Guiana to study the best method of colonizing that country. He made a thorough exploration of the banks of Maroni river, and produced a memoir with a map of that river, the course of which had been till then almost unknown. After serving in various parts of Europe and Africa, he was made in February, 1836, commander of the "Bonite," in which vessel he sailed round the globe, returning to France in November, 1837. In 1838 he was made captain, took part in the expedition to Mexico, and, after the capture of San Juan de Ulua, was appointed commander of this fortress and the station of Vera Cruz. After the conclusion of peace with Mexico he was engaged in the La Plata expedition, and occupied Montevideo. He was minister of marine during the early part of 1851, and gave a vigorous impulse to the colonial policy of France. The same year he was appointed governor-general of the French Antilles and commander of the stations in these quarters and on the Gulf of Mexico. He was then transferred to the government of Martinique, but was forced by ill health to return to France in 1853, to the regret of the colony, which his administration had greatly benefited. An account of his voyage of circumnavigation was published under the title

"Voyage autour du monde exécuté sur la corvette la Bonite" (11 vols., Paris, 1840-'8).

VAILLANT, François Le, South American explorer, b. in Paramaribo, Dutch Guiana, in 1753; d. in La Noue, near Sézanne, France, 22 Nov., 1824. He was the son of a French consul, and showed from early youth a strong desire for adventure, sometimes wandering alone in the forests for weeks. On his father's return to Europe, in 1763, he studied natural history at Metz, and, sailing for Cape of Good Hope in 1780, tried to traverse Africa by travelling northward in 1780-'4. Later he revisited Guiana, where he owned a large estate. He was imprisoned during the reign of terror, and settled afterward at La Noue. His works include "Voyage dans l'intérieur de l'Afrique" (2 vols., Paris, 1790), and "Second voyage dans l'intérieur de l'Afrique" (3 vols., 1796), both of which were translated into several languages; "Histoire naturelle des oiseaux d'Afrique" (6 vols., 1796-1812); "Histoire naturelle des oiseaux de paradis" (1801-'6); "Histoire naturelle des cotingas et des todiers" (1804); and "Histoire naturelle des calaos" (1804). The last three describe species of birds that inhabit Guiana. Le Vaillant contributed to the Paris academy of science several papers concerning South America, including a "Mémoire sur les coléoptères de la Guiane" (1818).

VALADES, Diego (vah-lah'-days), Mexican missionary, b., according to some authors, in Spain, but, according to others, in Tlaxcala, Mexico, about 1520; d. in Italy about 1590. He entered the Franciscan order, became a missionary to the Chichimec Indians, was superior of the convent of Tlaxcala, and on account of his learning was sent to Rome in 1570 as resident procurator-general of his order. He edited Father Jean Foher's "Itinerarium Catholicum" (1574), but his reputation rests on his remarkable work "Rhetorica Christiana ad concionandi et orandi usum accommodata, quæ quidem ex Indorum Historia maxime deprompta sunt" (Perugia, 1579; Rome, 1587), in which he describes the Indian customs, the ornaments of the Mexican temples, and the human sacrifices that were offered in them, while at the same time he praises highly the intellect and advanced civilization of the Aztecs and Tlaxcalans.

VALDÉS, Antonio José, Cuban historian, b. at Matanzas in 1770; d. in Mexico in 1824. He received his education in Havana and was successively a goldsmith, clerk in a commercial house, a printer, a teacher, and finally a journalist. After an eventful life in his native country he went to Buenos Ayres in 1818, where he founded a successful newspaper, "El Censor," but in 1820 he went to Mexico, and the Emperor Iturbide appointed him in 1822 his court printer. Valdes published "Principios generales de la lengua castellana" (Havana, 1806); "Historia General de la Isla de Cuba y en especial de la Habana" (1811; reprinted in the work "Los tres primeros historiadores de Cuba," 1876); and many educational works, which were used as text-books in the schools of the island.

VALDÉS, Gabriel de la Concepción, known as "PLÁCIDO," Cuban poet, b. in Havana in 1809; d. there, 28 June, 1844. He was the son of a colored man and passed the first years of his life in poverty and want. His early education was entirely neglected, but in later years he obtained some instruction by desultory reading. When he was seventeen years old he was already known as a remarkable improvisatore. In 1836 he fixed his residence in the city of Matanzas, and began to publish his poems in the newspapers and literary reviews. These poems revealed at once a lyrical poet of no mean value, and gave him a wide reputation, which extended to all Spanish-American countries. Some patriotic lines of his cost Plácido several months of imprisonment under Gen. Tacón's government. In 1844 he was accused of being implicated in a supposed conspiracy of the colored race against the whites, under Gen. O'Donnell's administration; and, although it has been proved of late that Plácido had nothing to do with the plot, of whose existence there have never been conclusive proofs, he and nineteen of his unfortunate fellow-citizens were shot as traitors.

His poems have passed through numerous editions in Cuba, as well as in Spain, Mexico, South America, and the United States. The first edition was published in Matanzas in 1838, another enlarged edition appeared in the same city in 1842, and the most complete edition was published in Havana in 1886. The poems of Plácido have been translated into French by Auguste Fontanes, and published in one volume (Paris, 1866). Many of them have been translated into English, German, Italian, and Portuguese. The best is his prayer, composed on the eve of death, and recited by him on his way to the place of execution. This was translated into English by Mary Weston Chapman. Valdés is one of the most popular and best known of the Spanish-American poets.

VALDÉS, Gerónimo (val-days'), Spanish soldier, b. in Villarin, Asturias, in 1784; d. in Madrid in 1857. He was finishing his law studies in the University of Oviedo in 1808, when Napoleon forced Charles IV. and Ferdinand VII. to abdicate. Valdes took an active part with his fellow-students in the rising of the principality, being appointed by the provincial junta to organize the Asturian militia. With that body he took part in the whole peninsular campaign against the French, till the retreat of Marshal Soult across the Pyrenees in 1813, obtaining the rank of colonel for his valor in the battle of Albuera, 16 May, 1811. When, after the battle of Waterloo, he saw no prospect of quick promotion in Europe, he solicited transfer to the Peruvian army, and on 8 May, 1816, sailed from Cadiz on the expedition of Gen. Jose de La Serna as adjutant on the general staff. When Serna assumed the command-in-chief of the army of upper Peru, Valdes was ordered to organize the general staff, and took part in the campaign of Salta and the retreat of Jujui. He defended the coast of Arica in 1822 with 3,000 men, and defeated Gen. Alvarado, who had been sent to oppose his progress at Torata, 20 Jan., 1823, and at Moquegua on 21 Jan., for which actions he was promoted brigadier. In the following June he marched from Lima with great rapidity, arriving at La Paz in fifty-seven days, and engaged Gen. Santa Cruz at Zepita on 25 Aug.; and, although driven back, he restrained the enemy and was able to effect his junction with Serna. In February, 1824, he was detached against Gen. Olañeta when the latter pronounced against the viceroy, and was occupied in putting down this movement, when, after the battle of Junin, 6 Aug., 1824, he received orders from Serna to join the main army in Cuzco. He assisted with his division in the battle of Ayacucho, 9 Dec., 1824, and, executing an able counter-march, fell on the left wing of the patriots under Gen. La Mar, which was already wavering when he was routed by the republican cavalry under Gen. William Miller. After the capitulation of the viceroy, Valdes was transported with the rest of the army to Europe, promoted by the king major-general, and created Viscount of Torata. At the death of Ferdinand VII. in 1833 he was governor of Carthagena, and, after proclaiming Isabella II., he marched to the north as commander-in-chief, taking part in the whole campaign against the Carlists. He was senator for Valencia and captain-general of several provinces with the rank of lieutenant-general until 1840, when he was appointed governor-general of Cuba. During his administration he improved the fortifications of Havana, constructed the military hospital, and subdued a dangerous rising of the negro slaves. He was recalled by the provisional government in 1843, and returned to Europe, where he was made by the young queen Count of Villarin.

VALDÉS, José Manuel, Peruvian physician, b. in Lima about 1780; d. there in 1840. He was of negro parentage, and studied in the convent of San Ildefonso under the protection of an Augustinian friar, but chose the medical profession, as the church, the army, and the civil service were closed to him by the prejudices of the time. In 1807 he was graduated in medicine in the University of San Marcos, where he read one of his three dissertations that were afterward printed in Madrid. Besides practising his profession, he also wrote poetry, most of which is mystic or religious. He published "Disertación sobre el Cancro Uterino" (Madrid, 1815); "Disertación sobre la Meningitis de los Niños" (1815); "Disertación sobre la Disenteria" (1815); "Poesías sagradas" (Lima, 1819); "La Fé de Cristo triunfante en Lima" (1822); "Poesías espirituales, escritas á beneficio y para el uso de las personas sencillas y piadosas" (1833); and "Salterio Peruano, ó Paráfrasis de los ciento cincuenta Salmos de David" (1836).

VALDÉS Y SIERRA, Gerónimo, Cuban R. C. bishop, b. in Gijon, Spain, in 1646; d. in Havana in 1729. After finishing his theological studies and receiving sacred orders, he was a professor in the University of Alcalá until 1706, when he was appointed bishop of Cuba. He founded in Havana in 1710 the San Isidro hospital, and in 1711 an asylum for foundlings, and caused to be constructed the monastery of Santa Teresa. In 1722 he established in Santiago de Cuba a college and seminary which was at first devoted only to theological students, but afterward it was opened also to lay instruction. He also founded several churches in other cities and spent a great deal of his income in public charities.

VALDEVIEIRA, Miguel (val-day-ve-ay'-e-rah), Portuguese soldier, b. in Portugal about 1480; d. in São Vicente, Brazil, in 1540. He was a soldier in Cabral's expedition to Brazil in 1500, and for mutinous conduct was abandoned with one companion near the present site of Porto Seguro. They were adopted by the Tupi Indians, and afterward rendered great services to explorers. Valdevieira, who had reformed, entered the Franciscan order, and assisted in the foundation of São Vicente, where he died. He left a valuable manuscript, "Viagem da provincia da Vera Cruz," in which he recounts his adventures with the Indians during his exile in the territory of Vera Cruz, as Cabral named the country at its discovery.

VALDIVIA, Luis de (val-de'-ve-ah), Spanish missionary, b. in Grenada, Spain, in 1561; d. in Valladolid, Spain, 5 Nov., 1642. He became a Jesuit in 1581, and, after finishing his studies, was sent by his superiors to Peru. He was successively master of novices and professor of theology, and labored for many years among the Indians of Chili and Peru. He attained a perfect mastery over the Indian dialects of those countries, and his works are of philological value. He returned to Spain in 1621. He wrote "Arte y gramática de la lengua que corre en todo el reyno de Chile con un vocabulario y confesionario" (Lima, 1606); "Catecismo en lengua Alentina" (1602); "Arte, gramática, vocabulario, &c., en lengua Chilena y en las dos lenguas Alentiac y Milcocoayae, que son las mas generales de la provincia de Cuyo en el reyno de Chile, y que hablan los Indios Guarpes y otros" (1608); "Relación de la entrada del presidente D. Alonso de Ribera desde Arauco á concluir paces con los Chilenos" (1608); "Relación de su entrada en el reyno de Chile para apaciguar aquellos rebeldes" (1612); and various other theological, historical, and linguistic works.

VALDIVIA, Pedro de, Spanish soldier, b. in Serena, Estremadura, about 1490; d. in Tucapel, Chili, 1 Jan., 1554. He served in the wars of Italy and Flanders, went with Georg von Spire to Venezuela, and afterward served under Pizarro in Peru, taking an active part in the campaign against the elder Almagro in 1537, in which he was appointed mariscal. As such he participated in the battle of Salinas, 6 April, 1538, and was rewarded by Pizarro with permission to conquer Chili. While he was preparing an expedition, Pedro Sanchez de Hoz arrived from Spain with a royal grant of the same country. To avoid difficulties, Pizarro advised the two competitors to join their interests, and on 28 Dec., 1539, a contract of partnership was signed. Valdivia soon gathered a considerable number of adventurers, and purchased arms, beginning the march to the south in January, 1540. On the edge of the desert of Atacama he met, in August, Sanchez de Hoz, who had been able to gather only horses, without finding followers; so, despairing of his success, he sold the animals and his share in the enterprise to Valdivia. The latter resolved to avoid the road over the Andes, which had proved fatal to Almagro's army, and set out resolutely through the desert. After a march of five months, and suffering great privations, they arrived in a beautiful valley, called by the natives Mapocho, and there Valdivia founded, on 12 Feb., 1541, the city of Santiago. He had himself appointed governor of the territory by the council of the new city, when the news of the assassination of Pizarro arrived. At the mouth of the river Aconcagua he constructed a ship to send to Peru for further supplies, but he was obliged to return in haste to Santiago to subdue a mutiny. Afterward he marched against the Indians, who had begun to resist the invaders, and defeated them at Cachapoal, returning in time to relieve the capital, which was hard pressed by the cacique Michimalonco. The resistance of the Indians became daily stronger, and as the vessel that he had constructed in Aconcagua had been destroyed by the natives, Valdivia sent, in 1542, Alonso de Monroy, with five followers, overland to Peru for re-enforcements, but, on account of the disturbance in that country in consequence of the defeat of the younger Almagro by Vaca de Castro, Monroy could not obtain much aid, and returned in September, 1543, with only seventy horsemen, sending also a vessel with provisions and ammunition to the port of Aconcagua. During the following years Valdivia made good progress in the occupation of the country, founded in the valley of Coquimbo a town, which he called Serena, and subdued the country to the south of the river Maule. To obtain further resources, he sent to Peru, and in 1547 received some aid, with the alarming news of Gonzalo Pizarro's rebellion, and the viceroys Nuñez de Vela's defeat and death. The envoy also brought a letter from Pizarro, to whose brother Valdivia owed his post, soliciting the latter's assistance; but, knowing that a royal commissioner, De la Gasca, had arrived in Peru, and judging that Pizarro's cause was lost, Valdivia resolved to offer his services to the royal army, and, leaving Francisco de Villagra in charge of the government, he sailed on 10 Dec., 1547, for Peru. He was well received by President la Gasca, and, given a place in the royal army, as by his long experience he alone was thought able to oppose the military talent of Carvajal. Owing to him, the battle of Sacsahuana was easily won, 9 April, 1548, and, notwithstanding his obligations to the family of Pizarro, he voted in the council of war for Gonzalo's execution. He was rewarded for his services with the royal confirmation of his title as governor, and, with re-enforcements returned to Chili early in 1549. The colony was in a precarious state, the Araucanians having become very troublesome, and after despatching a force under Francisco de Aguirre across the Andes to make conquests, he marched against the Indians and defeated them, founding, 5 March, 1550, in the Bay of Talcahuano the city of Concepcion, and afterward, south of Biobío river, the towns of Imperial, Valdivia, Villarica, Angol, and others. Valdivia despatched in 1552 Capt. Geronimo de Alderete with a narrative of his exploits to the emperor Charles V. By the advice of the cacique Colocolo, the Araucanians united their efforts, and, choosing as general-in-chief the famous warrior Caupolicán, they fell on the Spanish forces in the south, destroying the fortress of Tucapel, 2 Dec., 1553. Valdivia was at Concepcion when he received notice of this success, and, believing that he could easily subdue the rising, he hurried southward with only fifty mounted men. Near the ruins of the fortress he gathered the remnant of the garrison, and was suddenly attacked by the Indians, 1 Jan., 1554, and, notwithstanding his valorous defence, was overwhelmed by the successive charges that the natives made, according to the advice of Lautaro. He was captured, and, although Lautaro, who formerly had been his page, tried to defend him, was tortured and finally killed. Valdivia was a man of education, and wielded the pen as well as the sword. His letters, written to the emperor and preserved in the archives of the Indies, are models of a vigorous and fluent style, and of great historical interest.

VALDIVIESO, Antonio de (val-de-ve-ay'-so), Central American R. C. bishop, b. in Spain; d. in Nicaragua about 1535. He was a Dominican, passed some years as a missionary in Santo Domingo, and was then sent to Mexico, being assigned the province of Nicaragua as the scene of his missionary labors. The natives of this country were much less savage than those in other parts of America, and after he became acquainted with their language he was wonderfully successful. His progress, however, was arrested by an event that spread terror throughout the country. Two young officers, named Contreras, had revolted because a royal decree had forbidden them to hold Indian "encomiendas," and in a short time made themselves masters of the colony. They regarded the Indians as slaves, and treated them with frightful cruelty. Valdivieso, after remonstrating with them in vain, went to Spain to lay the matter before Charles V., who promised to put a stop to the outrage, and selected him for the bishopric of Nicaragua. He was consecrated in 1532, and sailed some days afterward. The Contreras received him with honor, and conducted him with pomp to the cathedral. For some time he lived in peace; but Charles V. was too busy with his wars in Europe to remember his promises to the bishop, who found himself alone in the struggle with the two tyrants. At first he employed all the means suggested by prudence, humble prayers, pathetic exhortations, and public and private remonstrances, and at last he threatened excommunication, and then the Contreras determined to get rid of him. He knew they intended to murder him; but, seeing that reproofs and entreaties were useless, he went to the cathedral on Sunday, fulminated a bull of excommunication against the tyrants and their adherents, and declared them separated from the assembly of the faithful. This energetic measure did not produce the expected effect. The Contreras, accompanied by some soldiers, went to the bishop's house. He was conversing quietly with a few monks of his order, when one of the brothers rushed on him and plunged his sword twice into his breast up to the hilt. His last few moments were passed in praying for his murderers.

VALDIVIESO Y ZAÑARTU, Rafael Valentin (val-de-ve-ay'-so), Chilean archbishop, b. in Santiago, 2 Nov., 1804; d. there in 1878. He studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1825, and appointed attorney of orphans, and in 1829 corporation counsel for Santiago. In 1831 he was elected deputy to congress, and served on a commission to arrange rules of municipal government under the constitution of 1828. He also led the opposition against a project to increase the salary of the president of the republic, and obtained its rejection. He was elected in 1832 a member of the court of appeals before he had attained the required age. In June, 1834, he entered the church, and after ordination was appointed chaplain of the Invalid home. In 1837 he went as a missionary to the natives of the Chiloe archipelago, and later accompanied Bishop Vicuña on his episcopal visit to the northern provinces as his secretary. He attained note as a pulpit orator, and was one of the founders of the papers "La Revista Católica" and "El Boletín Eclesiástico." In 1838 he was offered the bishoprics of Ancud and Serena, both of which he declined. When the University of Chili was founded in 1842, Valdivieso was appointed member of the faculty of theology, and afterward he was elected dean. On the resignation of Archbishop Eyzaguirre in 1852, public opinion designated Valdivieso as his successor, and the government presented him to the holy see, where his election was confirmed, and in July, 1848, he was consecrated. During his administration he introduced many reforms, founded several religious houses for orphans and the care of patients in the hospitals, and societies to protect young women and for the education of young ladies. He greatly favored the conciliary seminary, and founded the Academia de Ciencias Sagradas. In 1870 he went to Rome to assist at the ecumenical council, where, on account of his juridical knowledge, he was elected to all the special committees. He was one of the most learned churchmen of South America, and, although he is thoroughly identified with the ultramontane party, his memory is venerated even by his political opponents in Chili.

VALDUREZO, Ignacio de (val-doo-ray'-tho), Spanish missionary, b. in Catalonia in the first half of the 16th century; d. in Peru toward the end of that century. He labored for about thirty-five years in the missions of the province of Cochabamba, and learned to decipher the Quipos—necklaces of various colors intermingled with knots of different sizes—which were formerly used by the Peruvians to record historical events. His manuscript was unfortunately lost, and all that remains is recorded in a letter from Valdurezo to a canon of Charcas, Bartolome Cervantes. The manuscripts of the latter fell afterward into the hands of Anello Oliva, who utilized them in his "Historia del Reyno de Perú." Ferdinand Denis, in his "Études sur les Quipos" (Paris, 1858), commends Friar Valdurezo for his discovery.

VALE, Gilbert, author, b. in London, England, in 1788; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 17 Aug., 1866. He was educated in his native city and was intended for the church, but he abandoned preparation for that profession, came to the United States in 1829, and engaged in teaching, making a specialty of navigation, and in lecturing, publishing, and literary pursuits in New York city and Brooklyn. For several years he edited the "Citizen of the World" and subsequently the "Beacon," a literary and scientific journal. He also occupied himself with invention, and patented a combined terrestrial globe and celestial sphere to facilitate the teaching of astronomy. Mr. Vale was a free-thinker, and his writings are for the most part arguments for his peculiar tenets. He published "Fanaticism, its Source and Influence" (New York, 1835), and the "Life of Thomas Paine," including his letters to Gen. Washington, which are suppressed in other biographies of Paine (1841).—His daughter Euphemia Vale Blake, author, b. in Rye, Sussex, England, 7 May, 1824, came to this country at an early age, was educated privately, and since 1843 has been occupied in literary pursuits and in inventions. She married Daniel S. Blake in 1863. She has published "Teeth, Ether, and Chloroform" (Boston, 1847); "History of Newburyport, Mass." (1854); and "Arctic Experiences," a history of the "Polaris" expedition, with a summary of all preceding expeditions (New York, 1874).

VALENCIA, Martin de (va-len'-theah), Spanish missionary, b. in Valencia de Don Juan, kingdom of Leon, about 1466; d. in Ayotzingo, Mexico, 31 Aug., 1533. He became a Franciscan friar at Mayorga, and was early distinguished for his knowledge and austerity. He was charged in 1514 with the reformation of the convent of Santa Maria de Bonocal, and established the new province of St. Gabriel, of which he was appointed provincial in 1516. When Hernan Cortes in 1523 asked for Franciscan missionaries, the pope named Valencia to the emperor as the most fit to establish successful missions in the New World. He went to New Spain in 1524 with twelve friars, founded there the province of Santo Evangelio, learned the Indian dialects, and after 1526 preached to the natives in their language with success. He successively founded convents at Mexico, Tezcoco, Vera Cruz, Tlalmanalco, and other places, and justly deserves the name of "first apostle of Mexico." He died from exhaustion during a journey from Tehuantepec to Mexico. Father Valencia's letters to the councils of the Indies are published in "Cartas de Indias" (Madrid, 1872), and his life was written by Fray Francisco Ximenez under the title "Vida de Fray Martin de Valencia" (Seville, 1535). His manuscript works include "Cartas al Papa Adriano VI." and "Cartas al Emperador Carlos V.," which, besides other historical documents that are preserved in the archives of Simancas, are often consulted by writers on early Mexican history. His published works include "Carta al general del Orden de San Francisco, Fray Matías Weisen, dándole razón de los buenos sucesos de la conquista espiritual de México" (Seville, 1554), also in Italian and Latin translations, and "Actas de la primera junta apostólica celebrada en México en 1524" (Mexico, 1769).

VALENTIN, Louis (val-on-tang), French physician, b. in Soulanges, France, 14 Oct., 1758; d. in Nancy, France, 11 Feb., 1829. He was graduated in medicine by the faculty of Nancy in 1787, and in 1790 went to Santo Domingo as surgeon of a regiment. He gave particular attention to the diseases that were most prevalent in this colony and the means employed to combat them. When Cape Français was burned in 1793, he lost all his property, his library, manuscripts, and a rich cabinet of anatomy which he had just completed, and escaped with great difficulty to the United States, where he met his wife, whom he had believed to be murdered. The French consul placed him in charge of the hospitals in Virginia for the reception of French sailors, and he remained in the United States until 1799, when he returned to France and settled at Nancy. He was a voluminous writer on medical subjects. Among his works are "Mémoire sur l'incompatibilité des différents virus dans l'économie animale et sur leur innocuité par rapport au danger de la petite vérole" (Cape Français, 1792); "Mémoire sur le traitement et l'extirpation des tumeurs du cou, etc." (Boston, 1792); "Coup d'œil sur la culture de quelques végétaux exotiques . . . et sur quelques découvertes faites dans les États-Unis d'Amérique" (Marseille, 1808); "Coup d'œil sur les différents modes de traiter le tétanos en Amérique" (Paris, 1811); and "Notice sur l'opossum et sur quelques animaux à bourses" (Marseille, 1811).

VALENTINE, David Thomas, historian, b. in East Chester, Westchester co., N. Y., 15 Sept., 1801; d. in New York city, 25 Feb., 1869. He was educated at White Plains academy, went to New York at the age of sixteen, was employed by a grocer for six years, and then received the appointment of clerk to the marine court. In 1831 he became deputy clerk to the common council, and six years later succeeded to that office, to which he was re-elected under each succeeding administration till his death. In 1842, in pursuance of a resolution of the state legislature, he began the publication of a "Manual of the Corporation and Common Council of New York," and for twenty-five years he issued a volume annually, each containing historical and antiquarian matters relating to the city, as well as pictures and views illustrative of its history. He was also the author of a "History of New York," treating of the progress of the metropolis from its early beginnings (2 vols., New York, 1853-'6).

VALENTINE, Edward Virginus, sculptor, b. in Richmond, Va., 12 Nov., 1838. He was educated in Richmond, and when a mere boy studied anatomy at the medical college of that city. His first desire for art arose from a visit to the New York exhibition in 1851. After receiving such instruction in drawing and modelling as could be obtained in Richmond, he went to Europe in 1859 to study. Upon his return he opened a studio in Richmond, and exhibited a statuette of Robert E. Lee. He made several ideal heads, among them "The Samaritan Woman" and "Penitent Thief," which were admired for their facial expression, and several portrait busts of southern leaders, including Gen. Pierre G. T. Beauregard, Gen. James E. B. Stuart, "Stonewall" Jackson, Com. Matthew F. Maury, and Gen. Albert Sidney Johnston, a colossal head of Humboldt, a head of Beethoven, a portrait bust of Edwin Booth, and "Grief," a marble female figure. He was finally given the commission to execute the marble figure of Gen. Robert E. Lee (see illustration), in the mausoleum attached to the chapel of Washington and Lee university at Lexington, Va. This is among the finest pieces of sculpture of the kind in the United States. Another of his works is a group representing Andromache and Astyanax.

VALENTINE, Milton (val-en'-tine), theologian, b. near Uniontown, Carroll co., Md., 1 Jan., 1825. He was graduated at Pennsylvania college, Gettysburg, in 1850, and at the theological seminary there in 1852, and was ordained to the Lutheran ministry by the synod of Maryland in 1853. During his theological course he was tutor in Pennsylvania college in 1850-'3, and supplied the Lutheran congregation at Winchester, Va., in 1852. He was a missionary at Alleghany, Pa., in 1853-'4, pastor at Greensburg, Pa., in 1854-'5, principal of Emaus institute, Middletown, Pa., in 1855-'9, pastor of St. Matthew's congregation, Reading, Pa., in 1859-'65, professor of ecclesiastical history and church polity in the theological seminary at Gettysburg in 1866-'8, and president of Pennsylvania college in 1868-'84, and he has been professor of systematic theology and chairman of the faculty at Gettysburg theological seminary since 1884. He received the degree of D. D. in 1866 from Pennsylvania college, and that of LL. D. in 1886 from Wittenberg college, Springfield, Ohio. He is a frequent contributor to the periodicals of his church, especially theological reviews, and he was joint editor of the "Lutheran Quarterly Review," Gettysburg, Pa., in 1871-'5 and 1880-'6. Many of his review articles have been published separately, and have had a wide circulation. Besides these and numerous baccalaureate sermons, he has issued "Natural Theology and Rational Theism" (Chicago, 1885).

VALENZUELA, Crisanto (vah-lain-thoo-ay'-lah), Colombian patriot, b. in Gambita, Santander, in 1777; d. in Bogota, 6 July, 1816. He studied in the College of San Bartolome, where he was graduated as LL. D. in 1795, and became professor of philosophy. In 1803 he was admitted to the bar of the royal audience, and in the following year obtained the title of attorney of that court. When independence was proclaimed, Valenzuela rendered important services to the patriot cause, and occupied many posts under the republican government, among which were those of deputy and secretary of congress, secretary of the senate, and secretary of foreign relations. He was the author of the famous manifesto of the Junta de Santa Fé, entitled "Motivos que han obligado al Nuevo Reino de Granada, á reasumir su Soberanía." Valenzuela was captured at the entry of Morillo into Bogota, 26 May, and was shot, Morillo declaring in an official despatch that all graduates of colleges in South America, and especially lawyers, ought to be exterminated.

VALENZUELA, Pedro Fernandez, Spanish adventurer, b. in Cordova, Spain; d. in Spain. He lived in the 16th century. He came with Gonzalo Jimenez de Quesada to New Grenada, and was commissioned by the latter in 1538 to search for a suitable site on the prairie of Bogota on which to build a city. After exploring the country he found a place at the foot of the hills that was afterward called Monserrate and Guadalupe, on a gentle declivity to which the name Teusaquillo was given by the Indians. Quesada was satisfied and founded there the city of Santa Fé de Bogota. He was the first to discover the emerald mines of Somondoco (1537), which were worked by the Indians with wooden shovels. Afterward he contributed largely to the conquest of the Chipataes Indians, whom he treated with cruelty. At the end of several years he returned to Spain, filled with remorse for the cruel deeds he had perpetrated against the natives. He studied for the priesthood, was ordained, and spent the remainder of his life in solitude.

VALERIANO, Antonio (vah-lay-re-ah'-no), Mexican scholar, b. in Azcapotzalco about 1525; d. in the city of Mexico in 1605. He was a son of one of the caciques of Azcapotzalco, who had intermarried with the family of Montezuma, and died in Cortes's expedition to Hibueras. The boy showed such a desire for learning that he was one of the first Indian youths that the viceroy Antonio de Mendoza placed in the imperial college of Santa Cruz de Tlaltelolco, which he founded. Valeriano superseded his Franciscan teachers as professor of Latin and rhetoric, and also taught classes in Aztec and antiquarian science, in which Juan Bautista and Torquemada became his pupils. On account of his influence among the natives and his honesty, he was appointed, by the viceroy Martin Enriquez de Almanza, in 1570, governor of the Indians of Mexico, which place he held till his death. He wrote many Latin letters, of which there was a volume at the beginning of the 19th century in the Jesuit library of Tepozotlan, a "Caton Cristiano" in Aztec, and the famous "Nican mopehua, motecpana in quenin yancuican huei Tlamahuizoltica, omonexiti in cenquizca itechiposhtli Santa Maria, Dios Inantzin, tozihuapili Tlatocatzin in onca Tepeyac motenehua." The last is an Aztec relation of how the image of the Virgin appeared, painted in flowers, on the mountain of Tepeyac. According to Carlos de Sigüenza, the manuscript in Valeriano's own writing existed in the collection of Fernando Ixtlilxochitl. Some authorities think that Valeriano merely translated the narrative from the Spanish text of an unknown author.

VALERIANOS, Apostolos, known as JUAN DE FUCA, Greek navigator, b. in Cephalonia in 1531; d. in Zante in 1602. For thirty years he served as a sailor and pilot in the Spanish possessions of America. In 1590 he sailed as pilot with a commander that had been sent by the viceroy of Mexico with three ships to discover the fabulous Strait of Anian, but on the coast of California the crew mutinied, and the officers were forced to return to Acapulco. In 1592 Fuca was sent again on the same errand by the viceroy Luis de Velasco, with one caravel and an armed sloop. In latitude 48° north he found a wide inlet, through which he sailed for twenty days, and discovered many islands. To the northwest of the entry to the straits he discovered a promontory formed by high pyramidal rocks, and, on landing, found natives clad in furs. Through the northern mouth of the straits, nearly 100 miles wide, he entered the Pacific ocean again, and, judging that his commission had been fulfilled, he returned to Acapulco. Having vainly waited for several years for the just recompense of his services, he left the Spanish colonial service, and after his return, about 1596, he spoke of his discovery, in Venice, to an English officer, John Douglass, who afterward gave Fuca's diary, "Relación del viaje de Juan de Fuca y descubrimiento del estrecho de Anian," to Michael Locke, formerly English consul in Aleppo, by whom it was published (London, 1604). This account of his voyage was mingled with such romantic and improbable tales that it was generally disbelieved and taken for a skilful imposition, until the trading vessels that frequent this coast in the fur-trade rediscovered the inlet and proved the general correctness of Fuca's description. His name was given to the strait which connects the Pacific with the Gulf of Georgia. An account of Fuca's exploration is also given in the 3d volume of Purchas's "Pilgrimes." Duflot de Mofras, in his "Explorations de l'Oregon et des Californies" (Paris, 1844), and Navarrete in his "Historia de la Náutica," also mention Fuca's discovery.

VALINIÈRE, Pierre Huet de la (vah-leen-yare), Canadian clergyman, b. in Brittany in 1732; d. in Canada in 1806. He entered the Sulpitian order and went to Quebec, where he was ordained priest in 1757. After the English conquest he excited the hostility of the government, and was sent as a prisoner to England, where he remained eighteen months. He then returned to France, but was received coldly, and went again to Canada. He was advised to leave the country by his superiors, who feared complications with the government. He then travelled on foot to New York, and became pastor of the French and French Canadians in that city. Shortly afterward he spent several years in travelling through Louisiana and part of Spanish America. In 1790 he settled among the Canadians at Split Rock Bay, where he built a church and residence. His eccentricities excited so much hostility among his flock that, in order to force him to go away, they burned his house and church. He published an account of his travels in verse, entitled "Vraie histoire, ou simple précis des infortunes, pour ne pas dire persécutions qu'a souffert et souffre encore le Rev. P. H. de la V." (Albany, 1792).

VALLADOLID, Bernardino de (val-yah-do'-leed), Mexican linguist, b. in Valladolid, Yucatan, in 1617; d. in Merida in 1652. He entered the Franciscan order and became noted for his eloquence and knowledge of the Maya language, so that his early death by a fall from the stairs of the College of Merida was generally deplored. His works are "Dioscorides en Lengua de Yucatan" (Mexico, 1647) and "Conclusiones Teológicas en Idioma Mayo" (1650).

VALLANDIGHAM, Clement Laird (val-lan'-de-gam), politician, b. in New Lisbon, Columbiana co., Ohio, 29 July, 1820; d. in Lebanon, Warren co., Ohio, 17 June, 1871. He received an academic education, and from 1838 till 1840 taught at Snow Hill, Md. In 1840 he returned to Ohio, and in 1842 was admitted to the bar. In 1845-'6 he was a member of the Ohio legislature, and from 1847 till 1849 edited the Dayton "Empire." He belonged to the extreme state-rights wing of the Democratic party. He was a member of the National Democratic convention in 1856. In 1857 he was a candidate for congress against Lewis D. Campbell, and, though declared defeated, contested the seat and won it, serving from 25 May, 1858, till 3 March, 1863. During the 37th congress he became conspicuous for his bold utterances against the acts of the administration in the conduct of the war, and on 5 Dec., 1862, offered a series of resolutions in which he declared "that, as the war was originally waged for the purpose of defending and maintaining the supremacy of the constitution and the preservation of the Union, . . . whosoever should attempt to pervert the same to a war of subjugation, and for overthrowing or interfering with the rights of the states, and to abolish slavery, would be guilty of a crime against the constitution and the Union." These resolutions were laid on the table by a vote of 79 to 50. On 14 Jan. following, Mr. Vallandigham spoke to the resolutions of Mr. Wright, of Pennsylvania, defined his position on the war question, and said: "A war for Union! Was the Union thus made? Was it ever thus preserved? History will record that after nearly six thousand years of folly and wickedness in every form and administration of government, theocratic, democratic, monarchic, oligarchic, despotic, and mixed, it was reserved to American statesmanship in the 19th century of the Christian era to try the grand experiment, on a scale the most costly and gigantic in its proportions, of creating love by force, and developing fraternal affection by war; and history will record, too, on the same page, the utter, disastrous, and most bloody failure of the experiment." After his term in congress expired, Mr. Vallandigham returned to Ohio and made numerous speeches, in which he attacked the administration with great violence and bitterness. Gen. Ambrose E. Burnside, then commander of the Department of the Ohio, regarded these demonstrations of Mr. Vallandigham and his friends as intended to afford aid and comfort to the enemy; and, as the city of Cincinnati, as well as southern Ohio and the adjacent states, was in some peril from the raids of the Confederates, he deemed it his duty to suppress these demonstrations, and accordingly issued an order declaring that persons within the lines that were found committing certain specified acts for the benefit of the enemy should be tried as spies and traitors, and also said that the habit of expressing sympathy for the enemy would no longer be tolerated in the department. Mr. Vallandigham replied to this order on 1 May in a defiant speech, and Gen. Burnside ordered his arrest. He was taken to Cincinnati, and, though he issued an appeal to his adherents, was tried by court-martial, convicted, and sentenced to close confinement during the war. President Lincoln changed the sentence to a banishment across the lines. This affair occasioned much discussion both in public assemblies and in the press. Without exception, the Democratic journals denounced the whole transaction. The organs of the administration took different views, some maintaining that the necessities of the case justified the measure, while others deprecated the action of Gen. Burnside and the military commission. Not liking his reception by the leaders of the Confederacy—to whom he had given the assurance that they would succeed if their armies could only hold out till another election, when the Democrats would sweep the Republican administration out of power, and make peace—Mr. Vallandigham made his way to Bermuda, and thence to Canada, where he remained for some time. While thus in exile, he was nominated for governor by the Democratic party in Ohio, but was defeated, his rival, John Brough, having a majority of more than 100,000. The government made no objection to Mr. Vallandigham's return to Ohio, and he was a member of the Democratic national convention at Chicago in 1864, and brought about the nomination of George B. McClellan and George H. Pendleton. He was also a delegate to the National Democratic convention in 1868. His death was caused by the accidental discharge of a pistol in his own hand, in the court-room, with which he was illustrating his theory of the manner in which a homicide had taken place.

VALLE, Leandro del (val'-yay), Mexican soldier, b. in the city of Mexico, 27 Feb., 1833; d. in Monte de las Cruces, 23 June, 1861. He was a son of one of the soldiers of the war of independence, entered the military college at the age of eleven years, and in 1847 was promoted sub-lieutenant by Gomez Farias for bravery in subduing the mutiny of La Profesa. He served in the war against the United States, entered college again in 1850 to finish his studies, and in 1853 was appointed lieutenant of engineers. He was promoted captain by Santa-Anna, but resigned in consequence of the arrest of his father, and took part in the revolution of Ayutla in 1854. His conduct in the siege of Puebla, in 1856, was rewarded by Comonfort with permission to travel in Europe; but the scanty resources that were provided only enabled him to visit the military colleges of France and Prussia, without completing his technical studies, and he returned in 1857. In 1858 he took arms against the reactionary governments of Zuloaga and Miramon, served with credit in the capture of Guadalajara, and in May, 1859, was promoted brigadier. He served during the whole campaign till the final battle of Calpulalpam, 24 Dec., 1860, and after the Liberal triumph was elected to congress, resigning the place as military governor of the Federal district. When the reactionary revolution under Leonardo Marquez and other guerilla chiefs began, Valle, notwithstanding his recent betrothal, left his seat in congress to avenge the assassination of Santos Degollado, and took the field as chief of operations in the valley of Mexico. In trying to surprise the guerilla force of Galvez, he was himself surprised by superior numbers under the sanguinary Marquez, and by the latter was ordered to be shot.

VALVERDE, Vicente (vahl-vair'-day), Spanish R. C. bishop, b. in Segovia about 1490; d. in Oropesa, Peru, in 1543. He was a Dominican friar, and went to Peru about 1530, although it is not certain whether he accompanied Francisco Pizarro from Spain or arrived at San Miguel de Piura in 1531 with re-enforcements from Panama. Accompanying the army on its march to the south, he was sent by Pizarro, after the occupation of Cajamarca, to receive the advancing inca, Atahualpa, whom he saluted by means of an interpreter, and, handing him a missal, explained that he had come in the name of the Spanish monarch to convert the inca to the true religion. The latter threw the book, which he did not understand, to the ground, and Valverde on his return incited the Spaniards to vengeance for the sacrilege, as it is alleged, causing the slaughter of more than 2,000 Indians and the capture of Atahualpa, 17 Nov., 1532. When the latter was condemned to death by a court that had been instituted for the purpose by Pizarro, Valverde, to whom the sentence was submitted for consultation, approved it, but, by his offer to substitute strangulation for burning at the stake, obtained from the unhappy prince his nominal conversion and baptism a few hours before his death, 29 Aug., 1533. Valverde assisted in the entry into Cuzco on 15 Nov. of the same year, and on 23 March, 1534, consecrated the site of the new church, which was later to be his cathedral. Pizarro gave him also a large Indian commandery, where he showed great cruelty toward the natives. About the close of 1534 he went to Spain to assist Pizarro's brother, Hernando, in his negotiations at court, and while there he was named by the empress-regent in 1535 first bishop of Cuzco and Peru, as the original appointee, Fernando de Luque, had died. In 1536 Valverde was also named protector of the Indians and inquisitor, and, being confirmed by the pope, he repaired to Peru in the beginning of 1538, taking possession of his see after the execution of Diego de Almagro, which he had vainly tried to prevent. But, instead of preaching the gospel, he oppressed the Indians, whom he forced to work for the church. He was appointed by Pizarro on the commission to apportion lands and Indians to the royal officers, and the licentiate, Antonio de Gama, whom Pizarro had appointed supreme judge of Cuzco, charged Valverde in a letter to the emperor, dated 10 March, 1539, with arbitrary acts and insisted that instead of protecting the natives, he only sought to confiscate their lands, and always gave the greater part to himself and his assistant. On 11 March, 1540, he officiated at the consecration of the new cathedral of Lima. During the occupation of Cuzco by the younger Almagro, Valverde retired to one of his commanderies at Oropesa, and was murdered there in a rising of the oppressed Indians. While in Spain he presented to the emperor, by order of Pizarro, a memorial about the conquest under the title of "Relación de la Conquista de los Reynos de Perú," in which he claimed that the Indians could scarcely be considered as human beings, as they had no souls.

VAN ARSDALE, John, soldier of the Revolution, b. in Goshen, Orange co., N. Y., 5 Jan., 1756; d. in New York city, 14 Aug., 1836. Van Arsdale is well known in Revolutionary annals by his feat of climbing the flag-staff on the Battery after the evacuation of the city by the British and pulling down the English colors, which in defiance they had nailed to the staff. They had also greased the pole to prevent any one reaching the flag. Van Arsdale had served throughout the war, first as sergeant and then as captain. He suffered unusual privation and hardship in the expedition against Quebec under Benedict Arnold, was wounded and taken prisoner at the capture of Fort Montgomery and Fort Clinton, languished many months in the Sugar-house prison and in the hold of a British prison-ship, and subsequently experienced the perils of Indian warfare in several campaigns against the savages.—His son, JOHN, died in New York city, 14 Nov., 1883, aged eighty-seven years, on the eve of the celebration of the centennial of Evacuation-day, in which it was expected he would take a prominent part.

VANASSE VERTEFEUILLE, Fabien, Canadian journalist, b. in St. Davids, Quebec, 6 Nov., 1849. He was educated at Nicolet seminary, admitted to the bar in Montreal in 1875, was president of L'Institut legal of Montreal in 1873, and vice-president of the club Cartier in 1877-'9. He is editor of "L'Opinion publique" and of "Le Monde" in Montreal, and was president of the Quebec press association in 1885. He was elected for Yamaska to the Canadian parliament, 7 July, 1879, and was re-elected in 1882 and in 1887. He is a Conservative.

VAN BRUNT, Gershom Jaques, naval officer, b. in Monmouth county, N. J., 28 Aug., 1798; d. in Dedham, Mass., 17 Dec., 1863. He entered the service as a midshipman on 1 Jan., 1818, served in Com. David Porter's Mosquito fleet against pirates in the West Indies, was made a lieutenant on 3 March, 1827, and rose to be a commander on 29 May, 1846, and commanded the brig "Etna" in the Gulf during the Mexican war, during which he participated in the expedition against Tuspan and the second expedition against Tobasco. He served as a commissioner to survey the boundary-line of California in 1848-'50, and was promoted a captain on 14 Sept., 1855. He commanded the "Minnesota," and took an active part in the reduction of the forts at Cape Hatteras and in operations in the North Carolina sounds and the blockade of Hampton Roads, where he saved his ship from the Confederate ram "Merrimac." He was commissioned as commodore on 16 July, 1862, and was retired because of his age on 28 April, 1863.—His son, Henry, architect, b. in Boston, Mass., 5 Sept., 1832, was graduated at Harvard in 1854, and studied architecture. For two years during the civil war he served in the navy on the staff of the admiral commanding the North Atlantic squadron. He has practised his profession in Boston, Mass., and of late years in Kansas City, Mo., while retaining his office in the former city. Mr. Van Brunt has occasionally written on subjects connected with his art for the "Atlantic Monthly" and other periodicals. He was the architect, in conjunction with William R. Ware, of Memorial hall (see illustration), the Harvard library, the Medical school, and the buildings of the Episcopal theological school at Cambridge, Mass.; of the Conservatory of music, Stone hall, and the sanitarium of Wellesley college; of the First church of Boston, St. Stephen's church at Lynn, St. John's memorial church at Cambridge, Grace church at New Bedford, and many other ecclesiastical buildings; of public libraries in Cambridge and Dedham, Mass., and East Saginaw, Mich., as well as the library of Michigan university at Ann Arbor. He is at present a member of the firm of Van Brunt and Howe, architects of many mercantile buildings in the west and of station buildings for the Union Pacific railroad.

VAN BUNSCHOOTEN, Elias, clergyman, b. in New Hackensack, Dutchess co., N. Y., 26 Oct., 1738; d. in Sussex county, N. J., 10 Jan., 1815. He was graduated at Princeton in 1768, studied for the ministry of the Reformed Dutch church, was licensed to preach in 1773, and settled first in Schaghticoke, N. Y. On 29 Aug., 1785, he was installed as pastor at Minisink, N. Y., taking charge also of two other churches. In 1787 a fourth church was organized at a place called the Clove in Sussex county, N. J., where he resided in 1792. He gave $17,000 for the education of candidates for the ministry in Rutgers college and the New Brunswick theological seminary.

VAN BUREN, James Lyman, soldier, b. in Dunkirk, N. Y., 21 June, 1837; d. in New York city, 13 April, 1866. He was graduated at the New York free academy in 1856, studied law, and travelled in Europe, returning shortly before the beginning of the civil war. He entered the National army as a lieutenant of New York volunteers, was detailed to learn the signal code, and acted as signal officer on Gen. John G. Foster's staff at Roanoke island and at New Berne. After the taking of New Berne he served as judge-advocate of the department on the staff of Gen. Ambrose E. Burnside, and subsequently as military secretary to Gov. Edward Stanly. He rejoined Gen. Burnside after the battle of Antietam, and was with him while he commanded the Army of the Potomac, and afterward in the East Tennessee campaign. In 1864 he served with credit in Gen. Grant's campaign against Richmond, receiving the brevet of lieutenant-colonel for his bravery, and subsequently that of colonel for his services in the Knoxville campaign. In the assault on the works at Petersburg he gained the brevet rank of brigadier-general.

VAN BUREN, John Dash, merchant, b. in New York city, 18 March, 1811; d. in Newburg, N. Y., 1 Dec., 1885. He was graduated at Columbia in 1829, studied and practised law, afterward engaged in mercantile pursuits, and became the head of the importing-house of Benjamin Aymar and Co., New York city, retiring about 1850. He aided Sec. Salmon P. Chase in drafting tax and other financial bills, was a member of the legislature in 1863, and acted as Gov. John T. Hoffman's private secretary in 1868-'72. Mr. Van Buren was a frequent writer for the press on questions of financial legislation, and a strong advocate of a metallic currency.—His son, John Dash, civil engineer, b. in New York city, 8 Aug., 1838, studied at the Lawrence scientific school of Harvard, and in Rensselaer polytechnic institute, where he was graduated in 1860. After serving for a year as assistant engineer of the Croton aqueduct in New York city, he entered the engineer corps of the U. S. navy, took part in the operations on James river, and was for four years assistant professor of natural philosophy and of engineering in the U. S. naval academy, being promoted first assistant engineer on 1 Jan., 1865. He resigned his commission on 22 Sept., 1868, was admitted to the bar in 1869, and practised law for a short time in New York city, then returned to the profession of engineering, was in charge for construction in the department of docks in New York city, was appointed on a commission to investigate canals in 1875, and in 1876-'7 was state engineer and surveyor. Besides papers in the "Journal of the Franklin Institute" and the "Transactions" of the American society of civil engineers, he has published "Investigation of Formulas for Iron Parts of Steam Machinery" (New York, 1869).

VAN BUREN, Martin, eighth president of the United States, b. in Kinderhook, Columbia co., N. Y., 5 Dec., 1782; d. there, 24 July, 1862. He was the eldest son of Abraham Van Buren, a small farmer, and of Mary Hoes (originally spelled Goes), whose first husband was named Van Alen. Martin studied the rudiments of English and Latin in the schools of his native village, and read law in the office of Francis Sylvester at the age of fourteen years. Rising as a student by slow gradations from office-boy to lawyer's clerk, copyist of pleas, and finally to the rank of special pleader in the constables' courts, he patiently pursued his legal novitiate through the term of seven years and familiarized himself with the technique of the bar and with the elements of common law. Combining with these professional studies a fondness for extemporaneous debate, he was early noted for his intelligent observation of public events and for his interest in politics. He was chosen to participate in a nominating convention when he was only eighteen years old. In 1802 he went to New York city and there studied law with William P. Van Ness, a friend of Aaron Burr. He was admitted to the bar in 1803, returned to Kinderhook, and associated himself in practice with his half-brother, James I. Van Alen.

Van Buren was a zealous adherent of Jefferson, and supported Morgan Lewis for governor of New York in 1803 against Aaron Burr. In February, 1807, he married Hannah Hoes, a distant kinswoman, and in the winter of 1806-'7 he removed to Hudson, the county-seat of Columbia county, and in the same year was admitted to practice in the supreme court. In the state election of 1807 he supported Daniel D. Tompkins for governor against Morgan Lewis, the latter, in the factional changes of New York politics, having come to be considered less true than the former to the measures of Jefferson. In 1808 Van Buren became surrogate of Columbia county, displacing his half-brother and partner, who belonged to the defeated faction. He held this office till 1813, when, on a change of party predominance at Albany, his half-brother was restored. Attentively watching the drift of political events, he figured in the councils of his party at a convention held in Albany early in 1811, when the proposed recharter of the United States bank was the leading question of Federal politics. Though Albert Gallatin, secretary of the treasury, had recommended a recharter, the predominant sentiment of the Republican party was adverse to the measure. Van Buren shared in this hostility and publicly lauded the "Spartan firmness" of George Clinton when as vice-president he gave his casting-vote in the U. S. senate against the bank bill, 20 Feb., 1811.

In 1812 Van Buren was elected to the senate of New York from the middle district as a Clinton Republican, defeating Edward P. Livingston, the candidate of the "Quids," by a majority of 200. He took his seat in November of that year and became thereby a member of the court of errors, then composed of senators in connection with the chancellor and the supreme court. As senator he strenuously opposed the charter of "the Bank of America," which, with a large capital and with the promise of liberal subsidies to the state treasury, was then seeking to establish itself in New York and to take the place of the United States bank. He upheld Gov. Tompkins when, exercising his extreme prerogative, he prorogued the legislature on 27 March, 1812, to prevent the passage of the bill. Though counted among the adherents of the administration of Madison, and though committed to the policy of declaring war against Great Britain, he sided with the Republican members of the New York legislature when in 1812 they determined to break from "the Virginia dynasty" and to support De Witt Clinton for the presidency. In the following year, however, he dissolved his political relations with Clinton and resumed the entente cordiale with Madison's administration. In 1814 he carried through the legislature an effective war-measure known as "the classification bill," providing for the levy of 12,000 men, to be placed at the disposal of the government for two years. He drew up the resolution of thanks voted by the legislature to Gen. Jackson for the victory of New Orleans. In 1815, while still a member of the state senate, he was appointed attorney-general of the state, superseding the venerable Abraham Van Vechten. In this same year De Witt Clinton, falling a prey to factional rivalries in his own party, was removed by the Albany council from the mayoralty of New York city, an act of petty proscription in which Van Buren sympathized, according to the "spoils system" then in vogue. In 1816 he was re-elected to the state senate for a further term of four years, and, removing to Albany, formed a partnership with his life-long friend, Benjamin F. Butler. In the same year he was appointed a regent of the University of New York. In the legislative discussions of 1816 he advocated the surveys preliminary to Clinton's scheme for uniting the waters of the great lakes with the Hudson.

The election of Gov. Tompkins as vice-president of the United States had left the "Bucktails" of the Republican party without their natural leader. The people, moreover, in just resentment at the indignity done to Clinton by his removal from the New York mayoralty, were now spontaneously minded to make him governor that he might preside over the execution of the Erie canal which he had projected. Van Buren acquiesced in a drift of opinion that he was powerless to check, and, on the election of Clinton, supported the canal policy; but he soon came to an open rupture with the governor on questions of public patronage, and, arraying himself in active opposition to Clinton's re-election, he was in turn subjected to the proscription of the Albany council acting in Clinton's interest. He was removed from the office of attorney-general in 1819. He opposed the re-election of Clinton in 1820. Clinton was re-elected by a small majority, but both houses of the legislature and the council of appointment fell into the hands of the anti-Clinton Republicans. The office of attorney-general was now tendered anew to Van Buren, but he declined it. The politics of New York, a mesh of factions from the beginning of the century, were in a constant state of swirl and eddy from 1819 till 1821. The old party-formations were dissolved in the "era of good feeling." What with "Simon-pure" Republicans, Clintonian Republicans, Clintonian Federalists, "high-minded" Federalists cleaving to Monroe, and Federalists pure and simple, the points of crystallization were too many to admit of forming a strong or compact body around any centre. No party could combine votes enough in the legislature of 1818-'19 to elect its candidate for U. S. senator. Yet out of this medley of factions and muddle of opinions Van Buren, by his moderation and his genius for political organization, evolved order and harmony at the election for senator in the following year. Under his lead all parties united on Rufus King, a Federalist of the old school, who had patriotically supported the war against Great Britain after it was declared, and who by his candor had won the confidence of President Monroe; and Rufus King was re-elected with practical unanimity at a time when he was fresh from the hot debate in the U. S. senate against the admission of Missouri without a restriction on slavery. His anti-slavery views on that question were held by Van Buren to "conceal no plot" against the Republicans, who, he engaged, would give "a true direction" to that momentous issue. What the "true direction" was to be he did not say, except as it might be inferred from his concurrence in a resolution of the legislature of New York instructing the senators of that state "to oppose the admission, as a state in the Union, of any territory not comprised within the original boundaries of the United States without making the prohibition of slavery therein an indispensable condition of admission." In that Republican resolution of 1820 "the Wilmot proviso" of 1847 appeared above our political horizon, but soon vanished from sight on the passage of the Missouri compromise in 1821.

On 6 Feb., 1821, Van Buren was elected U. S. senator, receiving in both houses of the legislature a majority of twenty-five over Nathan Sanford, the Clintonian candidate, for whom the Federalists also voted. In the same year he was chosen from Otsego county as a member of the convention to revise the constitution of the state. In that convention he met in debate Chancellor Kent, Chief-Justice Ambrose Spencer, and others. Against innovations his attitude was here conservative. He advocated the executive veto. He opposed manhood suffrage, seeking to limit the elective franchise to householders, that this "invaluable right" might not be "cheapened" and that the rural districts might not be overborne by the cities. He favored negro suffrage if negroes were taxed. With offence to party friends, he vehemently resisted the eviction by constitutional change of the existing supreme court, though its members were his bitter political enemies. He opposed an elective judiciary and the choice of minor offices by the people, as swamping the right it pretended to exalt.

He took his seat in the U. S. senate, 3 Dec., 1821, and was at once made a member of its committees on the judiciary and finance. For many years he was chairman of the former. In March, 1822, he voted, on the bill to provide a territorial government for Florida, that no slave should be directly or indirectly imported into that territory "except by a citizen removing into it for actual settlement and being at the time a bona-fide owner of such slave." Van Buren voted with the northern senators for the retention of this clause; but its exclusion by the vote of the southern senators did not import any countenance to the introduction of slaves into Florida from abroad, as such introduction was already prohibited by a Federal statute which in another part of the bill was extended to Florida. Always averse to imprisonment for debt as the result of misfortune, Van Buren took an early opportunity to advocate its abolition as a feature of Federal jurisprudence. He opposed in 1824 the ratification of the convention with England for the suppression of the slave-trade (perhaps because a qualified right of search was annexed to it), though the convention was urgently pressed on the senate by President Monroe. He supported William H. Crawford for the presidency in 1824, both in the congressional caucus and before the people. He voted for the protective tariff of 1824 and for that of 1828, though he took no part in the discussion of the economic principles underlying either. He voted for the latter under instructions, maintaining a politic silence as to his personal opinions, which seem to have favored a revenue tariff with incidental protection. He vainly advocated an amendment of the constitution for the election of president by the intervention of an electoral college to be specially chosen from as many separate districts as would comprise the whole country while representing the electoral power of all the states. The measure was designed to appease the jealousy of the small states by practically wiping out state lines in presidential elections and at the same time proposed to guard against elections by the house of representatives, as in case of no choice at a first scrutiny the electoral colleges were to be reconvened. After voting for a few "internal improvements," he opposed them as unconstitutional in the shape then given to them, and proposed in 1824 and again in 1825 to bring them within the power of congress by a constitutional amendment that should protect the "sovereignty of the states" while equally distributing these benefits of the government. In a debate on the Federal judiciary in 1826 he took high ground in favor of "state rights" as against the umpirage of the supreme court on political questions, and deplored the power of that court to arraign sovereign states at its bar for the passage of laws alleged to impair "the obligation of contracts." He confessed admiration for the Republicans of 1802 who had repealed "the midnight judiciary act." He opposed the Panama mission, and reduced the "Monroe doctrine" to its true historical proportions as a caveat and not a "pledge." On all questions he was strenuous for a "strict construction of the constitution." He favored in 1826 the passage of a general bankrupt law, but, in opposing the pending measure, sharply accentuated the technical distinction of English law between "bankrupt" and "insolvent" acts—a distinction which, in the complexity of modern business transactions, Chief-Justice Marshall had pronounced to be more metaphysical than real, but which to Van Buren was vital because the constitution says nothing about "insolvent laws."

He was re-elected to the senate in 1827, but soon resigned his seat to accept the office of governor of New York, to which he was elected in 1828. As governor he opposed free banking and advocated the "safety-fund system," making all the banks of the state mutual insurers of each other's soundness. He vainly recommended the policy of separating state from Federal elections. After entering on the office of governor he never resumed the practice of law. Van Buren was a zealous supporter of Andrew Jackson in the presidential election of 1828, and was called in 1829 to be the premier of the new administration. As secretary of state he brought to a favorable close the long-standing feud between the United States and England with regard to the West India trade. Having an eye to the presidential succession after Jackson's second term, and not wishing meanwhile to compromise the administration or himself, he resigned his secretaryship in June, 1831, and was sent as minister to England. The senate refused in 1832 to confirm his nomination, by the casting-vote of John C. Calhoun, the vice-president. Conscientious Whigs, like Theodore Frelinghuysen, confessed in after days the reluctance with which they consented to this doubtful act. A clause in one of Van Buren's despatches while secretary, containing an invidious reference to the preceding administration, was alleged as the ground of his rejection. The offence was venial, compared with the license taken by Robert R. Livingston when, in negotiating the Louisiana purchase, he cited the spectre of a Federalist administration playing into the hands of "the British faction." Moreover, the pretext was an afterthought, as the clause had excited no remark when first published, and, when the outcry was raised, Jackson "took the responsibility" for it. The tactical blunder of the Whigs soon avenged itself by bringing increased popularity to Van Buren. He became, with Jackson, the symbol of his party, and, elected vice-president in 1832, he came in 1833 to preside over the body which a year before had rejected him as foreign minister. He presided with unvarying suavity and fairness. Taking no public part in the envenomed discussions of the time, he was known to sympathize with Jackson in his warfare on the United States bank, and soon came to be generally regarded by his party as the lineal successor of that popular leader.

He was formally nominated for the presidency on 20 May, 1835, and was elected in 1836 over his three competitors, William H. Harrison, Hugh L. White, and Daniel Webster, by a majority of 57 in the electoral college, but of only 25,000 in the popular vote. The tide of Jacksonism was beginning to ebb. South Carolina, choosing her electors by state legislature and transferring to Van Buren her hatred of Jackson, voted for Willie P. Mangum. During the canvass Van Buren had been opposed at the north and championed at the south as "a northern man with southern principles." As vice-president, he had in 1835 given a casting-vote for the bill to prohibit the circulation of "incendiary documents" through the mails, and as a candidate for the presidency he had pledged himself to resist the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia without the consent of the slave-states and to oppose the "slightest interference" with slavery in the states. He had also pledged himself against the distribution of surplus revenues among the states, against internal improvements at Federal expense, and against a national bank.

Compelled by the fiscal embarrassments of the government, in the financial crash of 1837, to summon congress to meet in special session, 4 Sept., 1837, he struck in his first message the key-note of his whole administration. After a detailed analysis of the financial situation, and of the causes in trade and speculation that had led to it, he proceeded to develop his favorite idea of an independent treasury for the safe-keeping and disbursement of the public moneys. This idea was not new. It was as old as the constitution. The practice of the government had departed from it only by insensible degrees, until at length, in spite of the protests of Jefferson, it had been consolidated into a formal order of congress that the revenues of the government should be deposited in the United States bank. On the removal of the deposits by Jackson in 1833, they had been placed in the custody of "the pet banks," and had here been used to stimulate private trade and speculation, until the crisis in 1837 necessitated a change of fiscal policy. By every consideration of public duty and safety, conspiring with what he believed to be economic advantage to the people, Van Buren enforced the policy of an independent treasury on a reluctant congress. There was here no bating of breath or mincing of words; but it was not until near the close of his administration that he succeeded in procuring the assent of congress to the radical measure that divorced the treasury from private banking and trade. The measure was formally repealed by the Whig congress of 1842, after which the public moneys were again deposited in selected banks until 1846, when the independent treasury was reinstalled and has ever since held its place under all changes of administration. He signed the independent treasury bill on 4 July, 1840, as being a sort of "second Declaration of Independence," in his own idea and in that of his party. Von Holst, the sternest of Van Buren's critics, awards to him on "this one question" the credit of "courage, firmness, and statesman-like insight." It was the chef d'œuvre of his public career. He also deserves credit for the fidelity with which, at the evident sacrifice of popularity with a certain class of voters, he adhered to neutral obligations on the outbreak of the Canada rebellion late in 1837.

The administration of Van Buren, beginning and ending with financial panic, went down under the cloud resting on the country in 1840. The enemies and the friends of the United States bank had equally sown the wind during Jackson's administration. Van Buren was left to reap the whirlwind, which in the "political hurricane" of 1840 lifted Gen. Harrison into the presidential chair. The Democratic defeat was overwhelming. Harrison received 234 electoral votes, and Van Buren only 60. The majority for Harrison in the popular vote was nearly 140,000. Retiring after this overthrow to the shades of Lindenwald, a beautiful country-seat which he had purchased in his native county, Van Buren gave no vent to repinings. In 1842 he made a tour through the southern states, visiting Henry Clay at Ashland. In 1843 he came to the front with clear-cut views in favor of a tariff for revenue only. But on the newly emergent question of Texas annexation he took a decided stand in the negative, and on this rock of offence to the southern wing of his party his candidature was wrecked in the Democratic national convention of 1844, which met at Baltimore on 27 May. He refused to palter with this issue, on the ground of our neutral obligations to Mexico, and when the nomination went to James K. Polk, of Tennessee, he gave no sign of resentment. His friends brought to Polk a loyal support, and secured his election by carrying for him the decisive vote of New York.

Van Buren continued to take an interest in public affairs, and when in 1847 the acquisition of new territory from Mexico raised anew the vexed question of slavery in the territories, he gave in his adhesion to the "Wilmot proviso." In the new elective affinities produced by this "burning question" a redistribution of political elements took place in the chaos of New York politics. The "Barnburner" and the "Hunker" factions came to a sharp cleavage on this line of division. The former declared their "uncompromising hostility to the extension of slavery." In the Herkimer Democratic convention of 26 Oct., 1847, the Free-soil banner was openly displayed, and delegates were sent to the Democratic national convention. From this convention, assembled at Baltimore in May, 1848, the Herkimer delegates se-ceded before any presidential nomination was made. In June, 1848, a Barnburner convention met at Utica to organize resistance to the nomination of Gen. Lewis Cass, who, in his "Nicholson letter," had disavowed the "Wilmot proviso." To this convention Van Buren addressed a letter, declining in advance a nomination for the presidency, but pledging opposition to the new party shibboleth. In spite of his refusal, he was nominated, and this nomination was reaffirmed by the Free-soil national convention of Buffalo, 9 Aug., 1848, when Charles Francis Adams was associated with him as candidate for the vice-presidency. In the ensuing presidential election this ticket received only 291,263 votes, but, as the result of the triangular duel, Gen. Cass was defeated and Gen. Zachary Taylor, the Whig candidate, was elected. The precipitate annexation of Texas and its natural sequel, the war with Mexico, had brought their Nemesis in the utter confusion of national politics. Van Buren received no electoral votes, but his popular Democratic vote in Massachusetts, Vermont, and New York exceeded that of Cass. Henceforth he was simply a spectator in the political arena. On all public questions save that of slavery he remained an unfaltering Democrat, and when it was fondly supposed that "the slavery issue" had been forever exorcised by the compromise measures of 1850, he returned in full faith and communion to his old party allegiance. In 1852 he began to write his "Inquiry into the Origin and Course of Political Parties in the United States" (New York, 1867), but it was never finished and was published as a fragment. He supported Franklin Pierce for the presidency in 1852, and, after spending two years in Europe, returned in time to vote for James Buchanan in 1856. In 1860 he voted for the combined electoral ticket against Lincoln, but when the civil war began he gave to the administration his zealous support.

Van Buren was the target of political accusation during his whole public career, but kept his private character free from reproach. In his domestic life he was as happy as he was exemplary. Always prudent in his habits and economical in his tastes, he none the less maintained in his style of living the easy state of a gentleman, whether in public station at Albany and Washington, or at Lindenwald in his retirement. As a man of the world he was singularly affable and courteous, blending formal deference with natural dignity and genuine cordiality. Intensely partisan in his opinions and easily startled by the red rag of "Hamiltonian Federalism," he never carried the contentions of the political arena into the social sphere. The asperities of personal rivalry estranged him for a time from Calhoun, after the latter denounced him in the senate in 1837 as "a practical politician," with whom "justice, right, patriotism, etc., were mere vague phrases," but with his great Whig rival, Henry Clay, he maintained unbroken relations of friendship through all vicissitudes of political fortune. As a lawyer his rank was eminent. Though never rising in speech to the heights of oratory, he was equally fluent and facile before bench or jury, and equally felicitous whether expounding the intricacies of fact or of law in a case. His manner was mild and insinuating, never declamatory. Without carrying his juridical studies into the realm of jurisprudence, he yet had a knowledge of law that fitted him to cope with the greatest advocates of the New York bar. The evidences of his legal learning and acute dialectics are still preserved in the New York reports of Johnson,

Cowen, and Wendell. As a debater in the senate, he always went to the pith of questions, disdaining the arts of rhetoric. As a writer of political letters or of state papers, he carried diffusiveness to a fault, which sometimes hinted at a weakness in positions requiring so much defence. As a politician he was masterful in leadership—so much so that, alike by friends and foes, he was credited with reducing its practices to a fine art. He was a member of the famous Albany regency which for so many years controlled the politics of New York, and was long popularly known as its "director." Fertile in the contrivance of means for the attainment of the public ends which he deemed desirable, he was called "the little magician," from the deftness of his touch in politics. But combining the statesman's foresight with the politician's tact, he showed his sagacity rather by seeking a majority for his views than by following the views of a majority. Accused of "non-committalism," and with some show of reason in the early stages of his career, it was only as to men and minor measures of policy that he practised a prudent reticence. On questions of deeper principle—an elective judiciary, negro suffrage, universal suffrage, etc.—he boldly took the unpopular side. In a day of unexampled political giddiness he stood firmly for his sub-treasury system against the doubts of friends, the assaults of enemies, and the combined pressure of wealth and culture in the country. Dispensing patronage according to the received custom of his times, he yet maintained a high standard of appointment. That he could rise above selfish considerations was shown when he promoted the elevation of Rufus King in 1820, or when he strove in 1838 to bring Washington Irving into his cabinet with small promise of gain to his doubtful political fortunes by such an "unpractical" appointment. As a statesman he had his compact fagot of opinions, to which he adhered in evil or good report. It might seem that the logic of his principles in 1848, combined with the subsequent drift of events, should have landed him in the Free-soil party that Abraham Lincoln led to victory in 1860: but it is to be remembered that, while Van Buren's political opinions were in a fluid state, they had been cast in the doctrinal moulds of Jefferson, and had there taken rigid form and pressure. In the natural history of American party-formations he supposed that an enduring antithesis had always been discernible between the "money power" and the "farming interest" of the land. In his annual message of December, 1838, holding language very modern in its emphasis, he counted "the anti-republican tendencies of associated wealth" as among the strains that had been put upon our government. This is indeed the main thesis of his "Inquiry," a book which is more an apologia than a history. In that chronicle of his life-long antipathy to a splendid consolidated government, with its imperial judiciary, funding systems, high tariffs, and internal improvements—the whole surmounted by a powerful national bank as the "regulator" of finance and politics—he has left an outlined sketch of the only dramatic unity that can be found for his eventful career. Confessing in 1848 that he had gone further in concession to slavery than many of his friends at the north had approved, he satisfied himself with a formal protest against the repeal of the Missouri compromise, carried through congress while he was travelling in Europe, and against the policy of making the Dred Scott decision a rule of Democratic politics, though he thought the decision sound in point of technical law. With these reservations, avowedly made in the interest of "strict construction" and of "old-time Republicanism" rather than of Free-soil or National reformation, he maintained his allegiance to the party with which his fame was identified, and which he was perhaps the more unwilling to leave because of the many sacrifices he had made in its service. The biography of Van Buren has been written by William H. Holland (Hartford, 1835); Francis J. Grund (in German, 1835); William Emmons (Washington, 1835); David Crockett (Philadelphia, 1836); William L. Mackenzie (Boston, 1846); William Allen Butler (New York, 1862); and Edward M. Shepard (Boston, 1888). Mackenzie's book is compiled in part from surreptitious letters, shedding a lurid light on the "practical politics" of the times. Butler's sketch was published immediately after the ex-president's death. Shepard's biography is written with adequate learning and in a philosophical spirit.—His wife, Hannah, b. in Kinderhook, N. Y., in 1782; d. in Albany, N. Y., 5 Feb., 1819, was of Dutch descent, and her maiden name was Hoes. She was educated in the schools of her native village, and was the classmate of Mr. Van Buren, whom she married in 1807. She was devoted to her domestic cares and duties, and took little interest in social affairs, but was greatly beloved by the poor. When she learned that she could live but a few days, she expressed a desire that her funeral be conducted with the utmost simplicity, and the money that would otherwise have been devoted to mourning emblems be given to the needy.—His brother, Lawrence, soldier, b. in Kinderhook, N. Y., in 1783; d. there, 1 July, 1868, served in the war of 1812-15, in which he attained the rank of major. He was a presidential elector on the Democratic ticket in 1852.—Martin's son, Abraham, soldier, b. in Kinderhook, N. Y., 27 Nov., 1807; d. in New York city, 15 March, 1873, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1827, and attached to the 2d infantry as 2d lieutenant. He served for two years on the western frontier, and for the next seven years as aide-de-camp to the general-in-chief, Alexander Macomb, except during several months in 1836, when he accompanied Gen. Winfield Scott as a volunteer aide in the expedition against the Seminole Indians. He was commissioned as a captain in the 1st dragoons on 4 July, 1836, resigning on 3 March, 1837, to become his father's private secretary. He brought daily reports of the proceedings of congress to President Van Buren, who was often influenced by his suggestions. At the beginning of the war with Mexico he re-entered the army as major and paymaster, his commission dating from 26 June, 1846. He served on the staff of Gen. Zachary Taylor at Monterey, and subsequently joined the staff of Gen. Scott as a volunteer, and participated in every engagement from Vera Cruz to the capture of the city of Mexico, being brevetted lieutenant-colonel for bravery at Contreras and Churubusco on 20 Aug., 1847. He served in the paymaster's department after the war till 1 June, 1854, when he again resigned, after which he resided for a part of the time in Columbia, S. C. In the following year he accompanied his father to London as an attaché of the legation. In February, 1845, he was elected attorney-general of the state of New York, serving till 31 Dec., 1846. He took an active part in the political canvass of 1848 as an advocate of the exclusion of slavery from the territories, but did not remain with the Free-soil party in its later developments. He held high rank as a lawyer, appearing in the Edwin Forrest and many other important cases, was an eloquent pleader, and an effective political speaker. He died on the voyage from Liverpool to New York. He was popularly known as "Prince John," was tall and handsome, and of elegant manners and appearance.—Abraham's wife, Angelica, b. in Sumter district, S. Preston and of Mrs. James Madison, who, while her kinswoman was completing her education in Philadelphia, presented her to President Van Buren. A year later she married Maj. Van Buren, in November, 1838, and on the following New-Year's-day she made her first appearance as mistress of the White House. With her husband she visited England (where her uncle, Andrew Stevenson, was U. S. minister) and other countries of Europe, in the spring of 1839, returning in the autumn to resume her place as hostess of the presidential mansion. VAN BUREN, William Holme, surgeon, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 5 April, 1819; d. in New York city, 25 March, 1883. His grandfather, Beekman, and his great-grandfather, Abraham, who came from Holland in 1700, after studying under Boerhaave at Leyden, were physicians to the New York city almshouse. He was a student at Yale of the class of 1838 for two years, and was subsequently granted his degree. On leaving college, he studied medicine at the University of Pennsylvania and in the Paris hospitals. He received his diploma from the University of Pennsylvania in 1840, presenting an essay on "Immovable Apparatus," which was published by the faculty, and on 15 June of that year was appointed an assistant surgeon in the U. S. army. Resigning on 31 Dec., 1845, he went to New York city to assist his father-in-law, Valentine Mott, in his surgical clinic in the medical department of the University of the city of New York. He soon took high rank both as an operative surgeon and family practitioner, also as a teacher and demonstrator of anatomy and surgery. When Bellevue hospital was organized in 1847 he was appointed one of the surgeons. In 1849 he became surgeon to St. Vincent hospital, and in 1852 he was elected to the chair of anatomy in New York university medical college. He was visiting surgeon to New York hospital from 1852 till 1868, and from the latter date consulting surgeon. He was consulting surgeon also to Bellevue and Charity hospitals. He was one of the founders of the U. S. sanitary commission in 1861, and served as the medical member of its executive committee throughout the civil war, declining the appointment of surgeon-general of the U. S. army. He resigned his professorship in the University medical college in 1866, on being elected professor of surgery for the newly established department of diseases of the genito-urinary system in Bellevue hospital medical college. In 1868 this chair was combined with that of principles and practice of surgery, and in 1871-'3 he acted as professor of clinical surgery also. He was vice-president of the New York academy of medicine, president of the New York pathological society, and a corresponding member of the Paris surgical society. Yale conferred on him the degree of LL. D. in 1879. Dr. Van Buren performed amputation at the hip-joint, removed foreign bodies from the trachea, and tied the internal and external iliac and the subclavian arteries. In abscess of the breast, and often in cases of carbuncle, he was averse to the use of the knife, placing more reliance than surgeons commonly do in the reparative processes of nature. He gave much study to hereditary taints and constitutional tendencies, and in later life, though still famed for his skill in amputations and other operations of general surgery, principally devoted his attention to the specialty of diseases of the genito-urinary organs. Besides many medical papers, he published, with Dr. Charles E. Isaacs, a translation of "Bernard and Huette's Manual of Operative Surgery and Medical Anatomy" (New York, 1855); a translation of Charles Morel's "Compendium of Human Histology" (New York and London, 1861); "Contributions to Practical Surgery" (Philadelphia, 1865); "Lectures on Diseases of the Rectum" (New York, 1870); and, with his pupil, Dr. Edward L. Keyes, "Text-book on Diseases of the Genito-Urinary Organs, with Syphilis" (1874).

VANCE, Joseph, governor of Ohio, b. in Washington county, Pa., 21 March, 1786; d. near Urbana, Ohio, 24 Aug., 1852. When he was a child his father removed to Kentucky, and thence went to Urbana. The son became a successful merchant in that place, and afterward engaged extensively in farming and stock-raising. He was a member of the State constitutional convention of 1820, served in the legislature in 1812-'16, and was elected to congress as a Democrat in 1822, and re-elected for five successive terms, serving till March, 1835. He was governor in 1836-'8. In 1842 he was re-elected to congress as a Whig, and served through two terms, during one of them as chairman of the committee on claims. In 1848 he was a delegate to the Whig national convention.

VANCE, Zebulon Baird, senator, b. in Buncombe county, N. C., 13 May, 1830. He was educated at Washington college, Tenn., and at the University of North Carolina, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1852, established himself at Asheville, N. C., was chosen county solicitor, and in 1854 was elected to the legislature. When Thomas L. Clingman entered the senate, Vance was elected to succeed him in the house of representatives, taking his seat on 7 Dec., 1858. He opposed the secession of North Carolina, yet after that step was taken he raised a company and was chosen captain, and soon afterward was appointed colonel of the 26th North Carolina regiment, which became one of the most famous of the organizations of southern soldiers. In 1862 he was elected governor, while serving in the field. He soon saw the impossibility of obtaining sufficient supplies for the troops of his state without recourse to foreign aid, and therefore sent agents abroad, and purchased a fine steamship in the Clyde, which successfully ran the blockade, not only supplying the state troops with clothing and arms, but furnishing also large stores for the use of the Confederate government and for the hospitals, and general supplies for the people of his state. As early as December, 1863, perceiving the desperate nature of the undertaking in which the south was engaged, he urged President Davis to neglect no opportunity of negotiation with the U. S. government, but at the same time he was so earnest and efficient in contributing men and material for the support of the cause that he was called the war governor of the south. He was also conspicuous in his efforts to ameliorate the condition of Federal prisoners in his state. He was overwhelmingly re-elected for the next two years in 1864. When the National troops occupied North Carolina, Gov. Vance was arrested and taken to Washington, D. C., where he was confined in prison for several weeks. In November, 1870, he was elected U. S. senator by the legislature, but he was not allowed to take his seat, and resigned it in January, 1872. In the same year he was again a candidate for a senatorship, but was defeated by Augustus S. Merrimon, to whom the Republicans gave their votes. He received a pardon from President Johnson in 1867, and his political disabilities were removed by congress in 1872, soon after he had been refused a seat in the U. S. senate by reason of those disabilities. He continued to practise law in Charlotte, taking no part in politics, except his conspicuous efforts as a private citizen to overthrow the reconstruction government in North Carolina. In 1876, after an animated canvass, he was elected governor by a large majority. He resigned on being again elected U. S. senator, took his seat on 4 March, 1879, and by his wit and eloquence soon acquired a high rank among the Democratic orators of the senate. In 1884 he was re-elected for the term ending on 4 March, 1891.

VAN CLEVE, Horatio Phillips, soldier, b. in Princeton, N. J., 23 Nov., 1809. He studied for two years at Princeton, then entered the U. S. military academy, was graduated in 1831, served at frontier posts in Michigan territory, was commissioned as 2d lieutenant of infantry on 31 Dec., 1831, and on 11 Sept., 1836, resigned and settled in Michigan. He taught in Cincinnati, Ohio, in 1840-'1, then engaged in farming near Ann Arbor, Mich., was an engineer in the service of the state of Michigan in 1855, then United States surveyor of public lands in Minnesota, and in 1856 engaged in stock-raising. On 22 July, 1861, he was commissioned as colonel of the 2d Minnesota infantry. He served under Gen. George H. Thomas at Mill Springs, for his part in which action he was promoted brigadier-general of volunteers on 21 March, 1862. He was disabled by a wound at Stone river, but resumed command of the division on his recovery, was engaged at Chickamauga, and was in command of the post and forces at Murfreesboro, Tenn., from December, 1863, till 24 Aug., 1865, when he was mustered out, having been brevetted major-general on 13 March, 1865. He was adjutant-general of Minnesota in 1866-'70, and in 1876-'82.

VAN CORTLANDT, Oloff (or Oliver) Stevense, soldier, b. in Wijk, near Utrecht, Holland, in 1600; d. in New York, 4 April, 1684. He came to New Netherland as an officer in the service of the West India company, arriving there in the ship "Håring" (The Herring), with Director Kieft, on 28 March, 1638. Of the origin of his family nothing is definitely known. He had a good education, and the offices he subsequently held, his seal with the Van Cortlandt arms, still in the possession of his descendants, as well as articles of Dutch plate bearing the same arms, show that his position was good, and that of a gentleman. He remained only a short time in the military service, having been appointed by Kieft in 1639 "commissary of cargoes," or "customs officer," and in 1643 keeper of the public stores of the West India company, a responsible post under the provisions of the charters of freedoms and exemptions, being the superintendent of the collection of the company's revenue in New Amsterdam, most of which was paid in furs. In 1648 he resigned from this office, was made a freeman of the city, and entered upon the business of a merchant and brewer, in which he was eminently successful, becoming one of the richest men in New Amsterdam. In 1649 he was chosen colonel of the burgher guard, or city train bands, and also appointed one of the "Nine Men," a temporary representative board elected by the citizens. He was previously one of the "Eight Men," a similar body, in 1645. In 1654 he was elected schepen, or alderman, and the next year, 1655, appointed burgomaster, or mayor, of New Amsterdam. This office he filled nearly uninterruptedly till the capture by the English in 1664, at which he was one of the commissioners that were appointed by Director Stuyvesant to negotiate the terms of surrender, and was active in their settlement, the document bearing his signature with those of the other commissioners. He was also engaged in several temporary public matters as a councillor and commissioner during the administration of Stuyvesant, notably in the Connecticut boundary matter in 1663, and the settlement of Capt. John Scott's claim to Long Island in 1664. He acted in similar capacities under the first English governors, Nicolls, Lovelace, and Dongan, and was chosen the trustee of Lovelace's estate to settle it in 1673. He married, on 26 Feb., 1642, Annetje, sister of Govert Loockermans, who came out with Director Van Twiller in 1633, and was so prominent afterward in New Netherland affairs. "Govert Loockermans, after filling some of the highest offices in the colony," says O'Callaghan, "died, worth 520,000 guilders, or $208,000, an immense sum when the period in which he lived is considered." Oloff Stevense Van Cortlandt died on 4 April, 1684, and his wife followed him about a month afterward. They had seven children—five daughters and two sons. The oldest of the latter was Stephanus, and the youngest Jacobus, who, respectively, were the progenitors of all of the name now living. The former founded the oldest branch, the Van Cortlandts of the manor of Cortlandt, the latter the younger branch, the Van Cortlandts of Cortlandt House, Yonkers.—His son, Stephanus, statesman, b. in New York, 4 May, 1643; d. there, 25 Nov., 1700, was the first and only lord of the manor, and one of the most eminent men of the province of New York after it became an English colony. Except the governorship, he filled at one time or another every prominent office in that province. When Lieut.-Gov. Nicholson went to England, at the beginning of Jacob Leisler's insurrection and actual usurpation, to report in person to King William, he committed the government, in his absence, to Stephanus Van Cortlandt and Frederick Philips. This fact caused Leisler to seek their lives, and forced them to escape from the city of New York to save themselves. Van Cortlandt's career was, perhaps, the most brilliant and varied, in the fifty-seven years it occupied, of any inhabitant of New York in the 17th century. He was a youth of twenty-one when, in 1664, the English capture took place and New Amsterdam became New York. Brought up under the eye of his father, and educated by the Dutch clergymen of New Amsterdam, whose scholarship was vastly higher than it has pleased modern writers to state, and which would compare favorably with that of the clergy of the 19th century, young Van Cortlandt, long before the death of his father in 1684, showed how well he had profited by the example of the one and the learning of the others. He was a merchant by occupation. His first appointment was as a member of the court of assizes, the body instituted under "the Duke's Laws" over which Gov. Richard Nicolls presided, and which exercised both judicial and legislative powers. In 1668 he was appointed an ensign in the Kings county regiment, subsequently a captain, and later its colonel. From 1677, when, at the age of thirty-four, he was appointed the first native American mayor of the city of New York, he held that office almost consecutively till his death in 1700. When, by the Duke of York's commission and instructions to Gov. Dongan, a governor's council was established in New York, Stephanus Van Cortlandt and Frederick Philipse were named by the duke therein as councillors, and with them Dongan was to appoint such others as he deemed fit for the office. Stephanus Van Cortlandt's name was continued in each of the commissions of all the succeeding governors down to and including Bellomont's in 1697, and he continued in the office till his death in 1700. Early in this latter year he was appointed chief justice, but he only filled the office till his demise in November of the same year. He had many years before been appointed judge of the common pleas in Kings county, and later, in 1693, a justice of the supreme court of the province. In 1686 Dongan made him commissioner of the revenue, and on 10 Nov., 1687, he was appointed by the king's auditor-general in England, William Blathwayt, deputy auditor in New York, his accounts being regularly transmitted to England and approved. He was appointed also deputy secretary of New York, and personally administered the office, the secretary always residing in England, after the British custom. He was prominent in all the treaties and conferences with the Indians as a member of the council, and was noted for his influence with them. His letters and despatches to Gov. Edmund Andros, and to the different boards and officers in England that were charged with the care of the colonies and the management of their affairs, remain to show his capacity, clear-headedness, and courage. Equally esteemed and confided in by the governments of James as duke and king, and by William and Mary, in the troublous times in which he lived, and sustained by all the governors, even though, as in Bellomont's case, they did not like him personally, no greater proof could be adduced of his ability, skill, and integrity. His estate was erected into the lordship and manor of Cortlandt by patent of William III., bearing date 17 June, 1697. The Van Cortlandt manor-house, which is shown in the accompanying illustration, is one of the oldest edifices that now remain on the borders of Hudson river. It stands on the northern shore of Croton bay, and was built both as a country residence and as a fort, the walls being of reddish freestone, nearly three feet in thickness, pierced with loop-holes for musketry. It was built originally as a fortified trading-house by Stephanus, and added to by the successive owners. In it were entertained some of the most notable persons in the history of the state, beginning with the early colonial governors. George Whitefield preached to the tenants of the manor from its veranda, while Benjamin Franklin rested there on his return from his Canadian mission in 1776. Washington, Rochambeau, Lafayette, and Lauzun were among its guests, and Col. Henry B. Livingston had his quarters there while watching the "Vulture" at the time of Arnold's treason. Here, too, were entertained eminent Methodist preachers in the early days of that church, including Bishop Asbury and Freeborn Garretson.

—Philip, third son of Stephanus, merchant, b. in New York city, 9 Aug., 1683; d. there, 21 Aug., 1746, was a man of good abilities, and possessed of great decision of character. He was a merchant in New Amsterdam, and, like his father, took an active part in public affairs. In June, 1729, he was recommended to the king for appointment as a councillor of the province by Gov. Montgomerie in place of Lewis Morris, Jr. The appointment was made, 3 Feb., 1730, he took his seat in April of the same year, and continued in the council until his death, when he was succeeded by Edward Holland through the recommendation of Gov. George Clinton. He was a member of the commission on the part of New York in the case of the colony of Connecticut and the Mohegan Indians. His wife was Catharine, daughter of Abraham de Peyster, to whom he was married in 1710. He left six surviving children—five sons and one daughter, Catharine, who was killed by the bursting of a cannon on the Battery while watching the firing of a salute in honor of the king's birthday, 4 June, 1738, in her thirteenth year. By the death of his elder brothers (Johannes, who left only a daughter, Gertrude, the wife of Philip Verplanck, and Oloff, or Oliver, who died a bachelor) Philip became the third head of the Van Cortlandt family. His five sons were Stephen, Abraham, Philip, John, and Pierre.—STEPHEN, the eldest, who succeeded his father as the head of the family, was born 26 Oct., 1710, married, in 1738, Mary Walton

Ricketts, and died, 17 Oct., 1756, leaving two sons, Philip and William Ricketts Van Cortlandt.—PHILIP the elder, the fourth head of the family, b. 10 Nov., 1739, preferring a military life, entered the British army, in which he served many years, dying on 1 May, 1814. He is buried in Hailsham church, where a mural monument is erected to his memory. He married, on 2 Aug., 1762, Catharine, daughter of Jacob Ogden, of New Jersey. They had the large number of twenty-three children (several being twins), of whom twelve lived to grow up, five being sons and seven daughters. The former all became officers in the British regular army.

—Pierre, first lieutenant-governor of the state of New York, youngest son of Philip, the third son of Stephanus, b. in Cortlandt manor, 10 Jan., 1721; d. in New York, 1 May, 1814. In consequence of the deaths in early manhood of his brothers Abraham, Philip, and John, unmarried, and of the death, in 1756, of his eldest brother, Stephen, and the absence in the army of his nephew, Philip, Stephen's eldest son, Pierre became early and closely identified with the affairs of the manor and the interests of his relatives therein. Marrying Joanna, a daughter of Gilbert Livingston, he naturally leaned to the political side of his wife's family in the party contests anterior to the opening of the American Revolution. He was the representative of the manor in the colonial assembly from 1768 till 1775, and, unlike his nephew, Philip, the head of the family, took the American side in the Revolutionary war. He was a member of the Provincial convention, the council of safety, and the Provincial congress, and, upon the organization of the state government in 1777, was chosen lieutenant-governor of New York and served in that office till 1795, when he declined a re-election, the long period of eighteen years. In 1777 he was president of the convention at Kingston which framed the first constitution of the state of New York. He left two sons, Gen. Philip and Gen. Pierre. He was an admirable presiding officer, gentle but firm, strict but impartial, and commanded the respect and esteem of senators of all parties.

Pierre Van Cortlandt

—Philip, soldier, b. in Cortlandt manor, 1 Sept., 1749; d. there, 5 Nov., 1831, was the eldest son of Lieut.-Gov. Pierre Van Cortlandt, and was educated at Coldenham academy and graduated at King's (now Columbia) college in 1758. He became a surveyor. In June, 1775, he was commissioned lieutenant-colonel of the 4th battalion, New York infantry, and on 30 Nov., 1776, by Washington, colonel of the 2d New York regiment, in place of Col. Ritzema, who had joined the British. He was present at the surrender of Burgoyne, and in 1779 he was engaged with Gen. John Sullivan in the Indian campaign in western New York. In 1781 he took part in the Virginia campaign, and witnessed the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown. His highest rank in actual service was colonel, but after the disbandment of the army at the peace, congress gave him the rank of brigadier-general.

He was subsequently a member of the New York assembly and senate, and one of the commissioners of forfeitures for the southern district of New

P. V. Cortlandt

York. He sat in congress for the Westchester district from 1793 till 1809. He was for many years treasurer of the state Society of the Cincinnati, and accompanied Lafayette on his travels through the United States during his visit in 1824. He lies buried in the family cemetery near the Cortlandt manor-house at Croton. —Pierre, soldier, second son of Lieut.-Gov. Pierre, b. in Cortlandt manor, 29 Aug., 1762; d. there in July, 1848, was a leading man in Westchester county, its representative in congress in 1811-'12, and major-general of the militia, one of his aides being James Fenimore Cooper. He was graduated at Rutgers college in 1783, and in 1843 was given the degree of LL. D. by that institution. He studied law with Alexander Hamilton, but did not practise long, giving his attention to politics and to his estate. He was a presidential elector for Jefferson in 1800 and for Gen. William H. Harrison in 1840, and a candidate on the defeated Henry Clay ticket in 1844. From 1833 till his death he was president of the Westchester county bank. He married first, in 1801, Catharine, daughter of Gov. George Clinton and widow of Capt. John Taylor, of the British army, and secondly, in 1813, Ann, daughter of John Stevenson and Magdalen Douw, of Albany, by whom he had one child, Col. Pierre Van Cortlandt (1815-'84). —Jacobus, merchant, b. in New York, 7 July, 1658; d. there in 1739, was the younger of the two sons of Oloff, first above named, and ancestor of the Yonkers branch. His estate at Yonkers, continuously held by his descendants to this day, has been purchased by the city of New York for its new "Van Cortlandt park" of about 800 acres. He was one of the most eminent men of his time and one of the till 1715. In 1719 he was mayor of the city of New York. He was a large land-holder in Westchester county, notably in the town of Bedford, where a large part of his property came by descent and wills of relatives to his grandson (through his daughter Mary), Chief-Justice John Jay, who built thereon the residence in which he died, and which now belongs to the latter's grandson, John Jay. (See illustration.) Jacobus Van Cortlandt was an officer and member of the Dutch church. He married Eve Philipse, the step-daughter of the first Col. Frederick Philipse, whose wife, by birth Margaret Hardenbrook, was the widow of Peter Rudolph de Vries, by whom she had one daughter, who, after her mother's marriage to Frederick Philipse, was adopted by him and called by his name. His only son by this marriage, Frederick (1698-1749), who married, in 1724, Frances Jay, was the father of James, and Augustus, of Yonkers. The latter (1728-1824) was for many years prior to the Revolution clerk of the common council of New York city, and to his unflinching loyalty to his trust, as well as to his king, is due the preservation of the ancient city records of New York, for of his own motion and on his own responsibility, in 1775, he placed them in chests, in a vault built at his own expense, in his own garden, "made," as he informed the Provincial congress, "for that purpose of stone and brick, well arched, and exceedingly dry," and kept them till after the peace of 1783.

VANCOUVER, George, English navigator, b. in 1758; d. near London, England, 10 May, 1798. He entered the British navy, joining the "Resolution," under Capt. Cook, in 1771, and served as midshipman in Cook's second voyage (1772-'5), and on his third voyage (1776-'80), when that commander lost his life. In December of that year he was made lieutenant, and appointed to the sloop "Martin," on board which he continued till he was removed to the "Fame," one of Lord Rodney's fleet, in the West Indies. In 1784 he was appointed to the station in Jamaica, sailed in the "Europe," and was there till the vessel returned to England in September, 1789. Vancouver, in 1791, was appointed to command a squadron and sent to the northwest coast of North America, with instructions first to visit the Sandwich islands, then go to Nootka, where, in 1792, with mutual concessions on the part of the Spanish government and the court of St. James, a matter in dispute was amicably arranged; and, further, to make an accurate survey of the coast from the 30th degree of north latitude northward, in order to find if there were any waterways, by inlets, rivers, or lakes, between that coast and Canada, or any passage from the North Pacific to the Atlantic ocean. His careful survey occupied the summers of 1792-'3, the intervening winter being spent in completing the examination of the Sandwich group. In 1794 he returned to the American coast and surveyed it as far as Cook's inlet, on the completion of which he was promoted to post-captain. Then he sailed along the western coast of South America, doubled Cape Horn, and returned to Britain, reaching the Shannon in September, 1795. The greater part of the surveys was performed in boats, but his constitution was undermined by the service. His training, under Capt. Cook manifested itself in the same enforcement of discipline and in the same care for the health and comfort of his crew that had characterized that great commander. Vancouver's island was named in his honor. From that time till his death he was occupied in the preparation of his journals for publication. All the charts were completed, the narrative printed and corrected almost to the end of the third volume, and what little remained was prepared for the press by his brother John. The "Voyage of Discovery to the North Pacific Ocean and Round the World" was published by the government (3 vols., London, 1798), with an atlas.

VAN CURLER, or CORLEAR, Arendt, pioneer, b. in Holland about 1600; d. in Lake Champlain in 1667. He was a cousin of Killian Van Rensselaer, came to this country in 1630, and rose through subordinate offices to be the superintendent of the manor and colony of Rensselaerwyck, having jurisdiction from Beeren island in the Hudson to the mouth of Mohawk river, controlling nearly a thousand square miles of fur-bearing territory. By his energy, talents, and character he made the patroon's colony more prosperous than that at New Amsterdam. He early mastered the language and learned the nature of the Iroquois Indians, and often visited their towns, either to ransom Christian captives or to make covenants of amity. He may be considered as the real founder of that Dutch policy of peace with the Indians that was afterward followed by the English, which, by making an invincible obstacle to French ambition, aided so powerfully to secure this continent to Germanic instead of Latin civilization. In 1646 (the same year in which the patroon died) he married Antonia, widow of Jonas Bronck (who founded Bronxville, N. Y.), and visited Holland. On his return he lived on his farm near West Troy, N. Y., using all his influence to keep peace between the whites and Indians and to check the trade in "fire-water." He greatly assisted Gov. Peter Stuyvesant in treating with the Indians, especially at Esopus, in 1660. In 1661, having outgrown the semi-feudal ideas of the patroon system, he led a company of free settlers from Holland to Schenectady, which he had first bought from the Mohawks, and founded an agricultural settlement, in which all purchasers could hold land in fee simple. He several times assisted French individuals or companies when in straits of captivity, starvation, or ambuscade; yet, by simple honesty of character, kept the friendship and unbounded confidence of the savages. In 1664, on the English conquest of New Netherlands, Col. Richard Nicolls sent for him to consult as to the Indian policy, and Van Curler's propositions were adopted. In 1667, while on a visit to Canada, by invitation of the French governor, Tracy, he was drowned in the middle of "Corlear's lake," or, as it is now called, Lake Champlain. The Mohawk Indians always addressed the governors of New York and of Canada as "Corlear," and the Indian title of Queen Victoria is Kora Kowa—"the Great Corlear." He left about 2,000 letters and papers, which are preserved chiefly in Albany, N. Y. A biography of Arendt Van Curler is in preparation.—Two others of the same name are ANTHONY Van Curler, the trumpeter, and JACOBUS Van Curler, who was sent by Gov. Van Twiller, of New Netherlands, to occupy territory in what is now Connecticut. He purchased land from Sassacus, sachem of the Pequots, and on 8 June, 1633, landed with a company of soldiers at what is now Dutch Point, Hartford, and erected a trading-factory, called the House of Hope. Hans Janse Eencluyts, being in charge of the artillery, forbore to fire on the Englishman, William Holmes, while sailing past the fort to make a settlement at Windsor, and the Dutch finally evacuated the Connecticut valley. Van Curler was the first school-master in New York city, and his farm was on the point of land near the foot of Grand street, on East river, still called Corlear's hook. He afterward removed to Long island.

VAN DAM, Rip, colonial governor, b. in Albany, N. Y., about 1662; d. in New York city after 1736. He became a prominent merchant in the West India trade, resisted Lord Bellomont's restrictions on commerce, and, in consequence of the seizure of some of his vessels for supposed infraction of the custom laws, engaged in politics, entered the assembly in 1699, and became a leader of the opposition party. With other merchants he signed a petition to the king protesting against Bellomont's acts. Lord Cornbury, who removed some of the councilors for promoting political disorder, appointed Van Dam to one of the vacancies. He continued in the council for nearly thirty years, and as its senior member and president assumed the administration and acted as governor from the death of Gov. John Montgomery on 1 July, 1731, till the arrival of his successor on 1 Aug., 1732. He was opposed to courts of chancery, and refused to take the oath as chancellor. When Gov. William Cosby on his arrival exhibited an order for an equal division of the salary, emoluments, and perquisites, Van Dam refused to pay over any part of the salary that he had received unless Cosby divided the larger sum that he had obtained in England for pretended expenditures in the colony. They each brought suits, which were finally dropped without a settlement, after arousing intense partisan feeling between the aristocratic friends of the governor and the popular party, which supported Van Dam. Van Dam absented himself from the meetings of the council, and Gov. Cosby, on his death-bed, secretly suspended him from office in order to prevent his succeeding again to the direction of the government. George Clarke, who was next in length of service, was sworn in, but Van Dam claimed the office, and the rival governors each called a meeting of the council. Van Dam was sustained by the chief justice, and his adherents were ready to support his claim with arms, when the arrival from England of despatches that were addressed to Clarke put an end to the controversy. He published "Heads of Articles of Complaint against Gov. Cosby" (Boston, 1734).

VAN DEN BROEK, Theodore, clergyman, b. in Alkmaar, Holland, in 1783; d. in Little Chute, Wis., 5 Nov., 1851. He belonged to the order of St. Dominick, and came to the United States in 1832. After spending some time in studying the language and customs of the country at the Dominican convent of St. Rose, Ky., he determined to devote himself to the Indian mission. After laboring at Green Bay in 1834-'6 he went to Little Chute and established a school for the Indians; but his mission embraced almost the entire state of Wisconsin for several years. He visited the more distant stations generally in winter, often slept on the snow, and was frequently called to visit sick persons at a distance of 200 miles. He taught the savages agriculture and trained them to use carpenter's tools, as well as instructing them in the arts of masonry and plastering. With their aid he built a fine church in 1839. Between 1834 and 1842 he converted more than 600 Menominees. In 1844 he established the mission of St. Francis on Wolf river or Lake Powahegan, which in 1846 numbered 400 Indians, with a good church and school. Father Van den Broek was the pioneer of Roman Catholic colonization in Wisconsin. In 1847 he left Little Chute and went to Europe. Shortly after his arrival in Amsterdam he published a pamphlet describing the advantages that Wisconsin offered to industrious immigrants. This publication, with his lectures, induced a large number of Hollanders to emigrate, and in 1848 three vessels arrived with them at New York. These people were settled at Little Chute, Hollandtown, Green Bay, and other localities. The work of Father Van den Broek in Holland continued to bear fruit, and Dutch colonies were founded not only in Wisconsin, but in Minnesota, Nebraska, and other western states.

VANDENHOFF, George, actor, b. in England, 18 Feb., 1820. He first appeared on the stage as Leon in "Rule a Wife and Have a Wife" at the Covent Garden theatre, London, on 14 Oct., 1839. In the summer of 1842 he came to the United States, appearing at the Park theatre, New York, as Hamlet, on 21 Sept. After a successful career he retired from the stage in November, 1856, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1858, but devoted himself chiefly to public readings and the teaching of elocution in the cities of the United States and also in England, making New York city his ordinary residence. He was the author of "A Plain System of Elocution," which was republished under the title of "The Art of Elocution" (New York, 1846); "Dramatic Reminiscences, or Actors and Actresses in England and America" (London, 1859); "Leaves from an Actor's Note-Book, with Reminiscences and Chit-Chat of the Greenroom and the Stage in England and America" (1860); "Clerical Assistant, or Elocutionary Guide" (1862); and "A Lady's Reader, with Rules for reading Aloud" (1862). His wife, whom he married in Boston on 20 Aug., 1855, was, as Miss Makeath, successful on the stage in the rôle of Julia in "The Hunchback," and in other characters, making her first appearance in Philadelphia on 25 Dec., 1854. She finally retired from the stage, and gave dramatic instruction in New York until her death in 1883.

VANDERBILT, Cornelius, financier, b. near Stapleton, Staten island, N. Y., 27 May, 1794; d. in New York city, 4 Jan., 1877. He was descended from Jan Aertsen Van der Bilt, a Dutch farmer, who settled near Brooklyn, N. Y., about 1650.

Cornelius's great-grandfather, a son of the emigrant ancestor, removed about 1715 to New Dorp, Staten island, where the family was converted to Moravian doctrines by religious exiles from Bohemia. His father was a farmer in moderate circumstances, who conveyed his produce to market in a sailboat, which the son early learned to manage. The boy, who was hardy and sengers and goods between New York city and Staten island, and at the age of eighteen he was the owner of two boats and captain of a third. A year later he married a cousin, Sophia Johnson, and removed to New York city. He extended his interests in boats, sloops, and schooners, engaged in traffic as well as transportation along the shores of New York bay and Hudson river, and built new craft on the latest and most approved models. In 1817 he engaged as captain of a steamboat that made trips between New York city and New Brunswick, N. J., and for twelve years worked for a salary. In 1827 he leased the ferry between New York city and Elizabeth, and, by putting on new boats, made it very profitable. Returning to New York city in 1829, he began to build steamboats of improved construction and fittings, and to compete in prices and service with the wealthy capitalists who owned the existing lines on Hudson river and Long Island sound. His success as a steamboat builder and manager caused the title of "Commodore" to be popularly attached to his name. Before he was forty years old his wealth was estimated at $500,000. He withdrew his steamboats from the Hudson river by arrangement with Robert L. Stevens, but maintained lines connecting New York city with Bridgeport, Norwalk, Derby, New Haven, Hartford, and New London, Conn., Providence and Newport, R. I., and Boston, Mass. When the emigration of gold-seekers to California began, he established a passenger line, by way of Lake Nicaragua, gaining large profits. Selling this in 1853, he visited Europe in the "North Star," which was constructed after his own designs, and surpassed all steam yachts that had before been built. The company to which he had transferred the Nicaragua short line evaded payment, and on his return Vanderbilt again engaged in the California traffic, threatening to force his dishonest competitors into bankruptcy. This he accomplished, and in the course of eleven years he accumulated $10,000,000 in this business. He engaged in ocean transportation while British ships were withdrawn during the Crimean war, building three of the finest and fastest steamers, and establishing a line between New York and Havre. His offer to carry the mails for nothing impelled the government to withhold the subsidy that it had paid to the Collins line and caused the cessation of its operations. A few years later Vanderbilt, who had begun to invest largely in the stock of the New York and New Haven railroad as early as 1844, retired from the transatlantic trade on account of the sharp competition of Europeans, and gradually transferred his capital from shipping to railroad enterprises. When the "Merrimac" attacked the National vessels in Hampton Roads, he had his finest steamship, the "Vanderbilt," fitted up for naval purposes and sent to James river, intending to run down the Confederate ram. He gave the vessel to the government, and, at the conclusion of the war, congress voted him a gold medal in recognition of his gift. His first important railroad venture was in 1863, when he purchased a large part of the stock of the New York and Harlem railroad, and obtained a charter for a connecting street railroad through New York city, causing the stock to rise from ten dollars a share to par. Daniel Drew and other heavy speculators, with foreknowledge of the intention of the city council to cancel the franchise for a horse-car line through Broadway, sold stock for future delivery, causing it to decline heavily. Vanderbilt bought what was offered, till it was all in his hands, resolute, early became schooled in practical affairs and the direction of men, but neglected every opportunity for education. When sixteen years of age he purchased a boat, in which he ferried pas-and the sellers could only make their deliveries by paying him double the prices that he had contracted to pay them. He began in the same year to purchase the shares of the Hudson River railroad, a competing line, and, when he had obtained the control, procured the introduction of a bill for the consolidation of this and the Harlem road. Members of the legislature entered into a combination with stock-jobbers to defeat the measure, after promising their support, and in this way to cause Harlem stock, which had risen from $75 to $150 a share in anticipation of the consolidation, to fall below the former price, enabling them to make profits by selling while it declined. With the aid of financial allies, Vanderbilt was able to take all bids of stock, effecting a "corner" of much greater dimensions than the former one. The speculators for a fall had agreed to deliver 27,000 more shares than the entire stock of the road, and, when the time for settlement came, the Vanderbilt "pool" could make the price what they chose, but did not venture to raise it above $285 for fear of precipitating a general panic. After this stroke, by which he gained many millions, he purchased large amounts of New York Central railroad stock. Fearing that the road would pass into his hands, the managers in 1864 made secret arrangements to have freight and passengers forwarded to New York city by river steamers, instead of by the Hudson river railroad. In retaliation, in the second winter after the discriminations began, Vanderbilt changed the terminus of the Hudson river railroad at Albany to the eastern side of the river, and ordered the employés to receive no freight from the Central railroad. The stock of the New York Central railroad fell in the market, and Vanderbilt and his associates gradually increased their holdings. In 1867 Vanderbilt was elected president of the company. The Harlem and Hudson river railroads had improved greatly in efficiency and economy under Vanderbilt's administration. He now applied the same methods of reform to the New York Central road, increasing the rolling-stock, improving the tracks, systematizing the service, and increasing the connections. In order to put an end to unprofitable competition in rates, he next sought to obtain control of the New York, Lake Erie, and Western railroad (then called the Erie), and bought freely, while Daniel Drew, Jay Gould, and James Fisk sold "short" for a fall, winning the contest by flooding the market with new shares, illegally issued. They obtained from Vanderbilt about $7,000,000, but, after a legal controversy over the fraudulent issue, were willing to repay nearly $5,000,000. In 1869 he procured an act for the consolidation of the New York Central and Hudson River companies, and in the same year divided new shares among the stock-holders, adding 107 per cent. to the nominal capital of the New York Central and 80 per cent. to that of the Hudson River road. Notwithstanding the doubling of the stock, the market value of the shares, which in 1867 had ranged from $75 to $120, reached $200 in 1869. By purchasing a controlling interest in the Lake Shore, the Canada Southern, and the Michigan Central railroads, he extended his system to Chicago, making it a trunk-line for western traffic. He erected the Grand Central station in New York city, with viaducts and tunnelled approaches, for building which the city paid half of the cost. Four tracks were laid on the New York Central line. Of the capital stock of the railroads that composed the trunk-line, amounting to $150,000,000, Vanderbilt owned one half. Although he had never contributed to benevolent enterprises, toward the close of his life he gave $50,000 to Rev. Charles F. Deems to purchase the Church of the Strangers, and $1,000,000 to found Vanderbilt university at Nashville, Tenn. He had a fortune generally estimated at $100,000,000, all of which he left to his eldest son, William Henry, except $11,000,000 bequeathed to the latter's four sons, and $4,000,000 to his own daughters. His voyage to England and along the coasts of Europe from Russia to Turkey was recounted by Rev. Dr. John O. Choules in "The Cruise of the Steam Yacht 'North Star'" (Boston, 1854). Mr. Vanderbilt was an extremely handsome man, with a beautiful complexion. He was tall and graceful, and to the last retained an erect figure and an elastic step.—His son, William Henry, financier, b. in New Brunswick, N. J., 8 May, 1821; d. in New York city, 8 Dec., 1885, was educated at Columbia grammar-school. Leaving school at the age of seventeen, he engaged in business as a ship-chandler, and a year later became a clerk in the banking-house of which Daniel Drew was the senior partner. He married in his twentieth year, and, his health failing, settled in 1842 on a small farm in New Dorp, Staten island, that his father gave him. This he cultivated profitably, enlarging and improving it with but slight aid from his father, who at that time had a poor opinion of his financial ability. This estimate was altered when the son managed with great success the Staten Island railroad, of which he was made receiver. When "Commodore" Vanderbilt engaged in railroad financiering at the age of seventy, he intrusted the business management of the railroads that came into his control to William H., who was chosen vice-president of the Harlem and Hudson River corporations in 1864, and afterward of the New York Central. To these great establishments he applied the same watchful attention and frugal economies which had restored to prosperity the bankrupt Staten Island road, and with the same success. While participating no more in the speculative plans of his father than he formerly had in his steamship enterprises, he aided materially toward their success by his efficient management. When he succeeded to the control of the railroad property he averted the consequences of a protracted war of rates and of a threatened strike of laborers by conciliation and compromise. With equal prudence he avoided a contest over his father's will with his brother, Cornelius Jeremiah, and two of his sisters, by agreeing to pay the brother the income from $1,000,000, which was five times as much as the will awarded him, and increasing by $500,000 the legacy of each of his sisters. Under his administration was completed the acquisition of the Canada Southern railroad, which was effected by a guarantee of its bonds, and that of the Michigan Central by purchases in the open market. Between 1877 and 1880 he gained control of the Chicago and Northwestern line, comprising with its tributaries 4,000 miles of road. He obtained connection with St. Louis by means of the Cleveland, Columbus, Cincinnati, and Indianapolis railroad. In November, 1879, in order to obviate financial rivalries by interesting other capitalists in the New York Central road and to put his own property into a more manageable shape, he sold 250,000 shares of the stock to an English and American syndicate, investing the $30,000,000 that he obtained in U. S. government bonds, of which a year later he held $53,000,000. In 1880 he sold his interests in the Western Union telegraph company. In 1881 he lowered rates in competition with the New York, Western, Lake Erie, and other trunk lines, primarily in order to discourage the construction of the "Nickel Plate" railroad. On 4 May, 1883, he formally resigned the office of president of the New York Central and Hudson River, Lake Shore and Michigan Southern, and Michigan Central companies, and sailed for Europe. At the same time the companies were reorganized by the election of his son Cornelius as chairman of the board of directors of the New York Central, and Michigan Central companies, and of his son William Kissam as chairman of the Lake Shore road. The Nickel Plate road, when completed, was acquired and added to the New York Central system, while the West Shore road was forced into bankruptcy by a reduction of rates. Mr. Vanderbilt built a fine mansion, which, with two other family residences, is shown in the illustration, in New York city, which he filled with modern paintings, chiefly of the French school, and with other works of art. Five houses were built for his sons and daughters in Fifth avenue near his own. He was fond of driving, as his father had been, and purchased Maud S. and other famous trotting-horses. He added $200,000 to the endowment of Vanderbilt university, and gave $100,000 for a theological school and $10,000 for a library in connection with the university. In 1884 he gave $500,000 for new buildings to the College of physicians and surgeons, and a year afterward his daughter, Emily, wife of William D. Sloane, built and endowed in connection with it a maternity hospital at a cost of $250,000, and his four sons have erected and equipped a building for clinical instruction in connection with the college as a memorial of their father. He distributed $100,000 among the train-men and laborers of the New York Central railroad when they refrained from striking in 1877, gave $50,000 to the Church of St. Bartholomew, and paid $103,000 for the removal of the obelisk that the Khedive Ismail gave to the United States and for its erection in Central park, New York city. Gen. Ulysses S. Grant, two days before the failure of Grant and Ward, borrowed from Mr. Vanderbilt, on an exchange check, $150,000, which went to protest. The general then sent to Mr. Vanderbilt, as security for this loan, deeds to certain real estate, and his swords, medals, works of art, and the gifts made him by foreign governments. Mr. Vanderbilt proposed to return all this property to Gen. Grant, but found that impossible, as it was liable to be seized by creditors of the firm of Grant and Ward. He then offered to give them to Mrs. Grant; but she declined to receive them. He then proposed to transfer all the property to the Union trust company, in trust for Mrs. Grant and her heirs. Mrs. Grant and the general refused this, on the ground that the original debt was a debt of honor. Mr. Vanderbilt then proposed that the presents should be transferred to Mrs. Grant during her life, and at her death be placed in the archives of the National government at Washington. This proposition was accepted, and Mrs. Grant immediately transferred the articles to the government. By his will he left $10,000,000 to each of his eight children, one half of each bequest to be held in trust; to his eldest son $2,000,000 more; $1,000,000 to the eldest son of the latter; and the residuary estate in equal parts to his two eldest sons, subject to the payment of an annuity of $200,000 to the widow, to whom he left his house and the artistic objects that it contained. He bequeathed $1,000,000 for benevolent purposes, including gifts to Vanderbilt university, the Metropolitan museum of art, the Young men's Christian association, the missions of the Protestant Episcopal church, and St. Luke's hospital. He also provided for building and maintaining a Moravian church and a family mausoleum at New Dorp, Staten island. The bulk of the family fortune, including the railroad securities, has, by agreement among the heirs, been left to the management of the two principal heirs, Cornelius and William Kissam.—The eldest son of William H., Cornelius, financier, b. on Staten island, N. Y., 27 Nov., 1843, was educated at private schools and trained to business. He was treasurer of the New York and Harlem railroad from 1867 till 1877, then vice-president till 1886, and since that date has been its president. In addition to his connection with the roads previously mentioned, in 1883 he became president of the Canada Southern company. He is a director in thirty-four different railroad companies, and is a trustee of many of the charitable, religious, and educational institutions of New York city. Among Mr. Vanderbilt's benefactions are the gift of a building in New York city for the use of railroad employes, a contribution of $100,000 for the Protestant Episcopal cathedral, and a collection of drawings by the old masters and the painting of the "Horse Fair," by Rosa Bonheur, to the Metropolitan museum of art.—The third son, FREDERICK WILLIAM, is secretary and treasurer of the New York, Chicago, and St. Louis railway company, and is a director in most of the roads comprising the Vanderbilt system.—The youngest son, GEORGE WASHINGTON, has established a free circulating library in New York city, which was opened in July, 1888, and has maintained a manual training-school.

VANDERHEYDEN, Dirk, owner of the site of Troy, N. Y., b. in Albany, N. Y., about 1680; d. there in October, 1738. The first of the name in Albany came to this country from Holland about 1590. Dirk was an innkeeper in his native town and a speculator in lands. In 1720 he obtained a grant of 490 acres of land in fee, at a yearly rent of five schepels of wheat and four fat fowls. This grant, called the "Poesten Bouwery," was afterward known as Vanderheyden's ferry, and in 1789 was named Troy. The Vanderheyden mansion, which was bought by Dirk's descendant, Jacob, in 1778, was built in 1725 by Johannes Beeckman, a burgher of Albany. The bricks were imported from Holland, and it was one of the best specimens of Dutch architecture in the state. Its dimensions were fifty feet front by twenty in depth, with a hall and two rooms on a floor, the massive beams and braces projecting into the rooms. It is described by Washington Irving in the story of Dolph Heyliger, in "Bracebridge Hall," as the residence of Heer Anthony Vanderheyden. The weather-vane, a horse going at full speed, was placed by Mr. Irving above the turret of the doorway at Sunnyside, when in 1833 the Vanderheyden house was demolished and a Baptist church was built on its site. The Vanderheyden mansion is shown in the accompanying illustration.

VANDERLYN, John, artist, b. in Kingston, Ulster co., N. Y., 15 Oct., 1775; d. there, 24 Sept.,

1852. After receiving an education at Kingston academy, he went to New York, where he engaged in business, and devoted his leisure to art, attending the drawing-school of Archibald Robertson. Subsequently he went to Philadelphia, where he spent some time in the studio of Gilbert Stuart, and copied his portraits of Aaron Burr and Egbert Benson. Through the generosity of Aaron Burr, who heard of the young artist's difficulties, Vanderlyn was enabled to continue his studies. In 1796 he went to France, where he remained for five years. After his return in 1802 he painted two views of Niagara falls, which were engraved and published (London, 1804), and portraits of Burr and his daughter. The following year he went abroad again, and spent several years in England and Paris, where he painted for Joel Barlow the "Death of Miss McCrea." In 1805 he visited Rome, and there painted, in 1807, his "Marius amid the Ruins of Carthage." On his return to Paris the following year he exhibited it at the salon, where it gained for him the Napoleon gold medal. This painting belongs now to Bishop Kip, of California. He also executed various copies after the old masters, and in 1812 painted his famous "Ariadne." This picture was subsequently bought and engraved by Asher B. Durand, and is now in the Pennsylvania academy of fine arts. He returned to the United States in 1815, and painted portraits of various eminent men, including Washington (for the National house of representatives), James Monroe, John C. Calhoun, Gov. Joseph C. Yates, Gov. George Clinton, Andrew Jackson, and Zachary Taylor. At this time he projected also a panoramic exhibition, and erected in New York the "Rotunda." He exhibited there panoramas of Paris, Athens, Mexico, Versailles (by himself), and some battle-pieces; but the enterprise was not successful, and the building passed out of his hands. This, and the want of appreciation for the arts in this country, seem to have dispirited and embittered him. His last large composition-picture, "The Landing of Columbus," painted in Paris for one of the panels in the capitol at Washington, is hardly more than respectable. It was engraved for the United States five-dollar bank-notes. Vanderlyn will always be known as the painter of "Marius" and "Ariadne," which latter, though scarcely showing great originality, is a noble work. The New York historical society owns his portraits of Aaron Burr, Robert R. Livingston (1804), Roger Strong, and Henry Benson (1823).

VANDERPOEL, Aaron, congressman, b. in Kinderhook, N. Y., 5 Feb., 1799; d. in New York city, 18 July, 1871. He was carefully educated, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1820, and began practice in his native town. He was in the assembly in 1826-'30, and in congress in 1833-'7 and 1839-'41, having been chosen as a Democrat. He then retired from political life, settled in New York city, and was a judge of the superior court in 1842-'50. During his congressional service he acquired the soubriquet of the "Kinderhook roarer," on account of the power of his voice and his oratorical flights.—His nephew, Aaron J., lawyer, b. in Kinderhook, N. Y., 18 Aug., 1825; d. in Paris, France, 23 Aug., 1887, was the son of Dr. John Vanderpoel, a successful physician, and the personal and political friend of Martin Van Buren. Aaron was graduated at the University of New York in 1842, studied law under William Curtis Noyes, settling in Kinderhook, and subsequently in New York city. He formed a partnership with A. Oakey Hall and Augustus L. Brown in 1853, under the name of Brown, Hall, and Vanderpoel. The firm had a large practice, especially as counsel for the city in many municipal affairs. In 1873, by the withdrawal of Mr. Hall, the firm was reorganized as Vanderpoel, Green, and Coming. Mr. Vanderpoel was in constant practice before the courts for more than thirty years, and perhaps appeared in more cases than any other lawyer at the New York bar. He was an authority on corporation law, for many years was sheriff's counsel, counsel for the police commissioners, and engaged in many important railroad suits. He declined a nomination to the bench of the court of appeals in 1885. In 1880 the University of New York gave him the degree of LL. D. At the time of his death he was president of the Manhattan club.

VANDERPOEL, Ann Priscilla, philanthropist, b. in London, England, 25 June, 1815; d. in New York city, 4 May, 1870. Her father, Robert O. Barnes, came to this country with his family in 1833. She married Dr. Edward Vanderpoel in 1837, and for many years was identified with philanthropic work in New York city. She founded the Ladies' home U. S. hospital in 1861, and gave her gratuitous services, for four years and a half, as a nurse to the Union soldiers, her labors being recognized by the government, especially by President Lincoln, who sent her an engraved certificate as a memorial of her work. In July, 1863, during the draft riots in New York city, she saved Mayor George Opdyke's house from fire and pillage by driving in an open carriage from Fourth street to Mulberry street, where the police office was situated, and sending a company of soldiers to his aid. To reach the office she exposed her life by breaking through a dense mob. She has been called the Florence Nightingale of New York.

VAN DER VEER, Albert, surgeon, b. in Root, N. Y., 10 July, 1841. He studied at Albany medical college, was graduated in 1862 at the National medical college, Washington, D. C., and served through the civil war as a surgeon. He then settled in Albany, where in 1869 he became professor of the principles and practice of surgery in the Medical college. In 1882 he was given the chair of surgery and clinical surgery. During this time he was also connected with Albany and St. Peter's hospitals. Dr. Van der Veer has achieved success in abdominal surgery. He has been president of the New York state medical society, and is a member of various other medical societies at home and abroad. Albany medical college gave him the degree of M. D. in 1869, Williams that of A. M. in 1882, and Union and Hamilton that of Ph. D. in 1883. He has contributed to "Wood's Reference Handbook of Medicine and Surgery," and to several medical journals.

VAN DERVEER, Ferdinand, soldier, b. in Butler county, Ohio, 27 Feb., 1823. He was educated at Farmer's college, Ohio, enlisted as a private in an Ohio regiment during the Mexican war, rose to the rank of captain, and headed one of the assaulting columns at the capture of Monterey. He subsequently practised law, and became sheriff of Butler county, Ohio. At the beginning of the civil war he became colonel of the 35th Ohio volunteers, succeeded to the command of Gen. Robert L. McCook's brigade, and led it till the autumn of 1864, when he was made brigadier-general of volunteers, and assigned to the 4th corps. Gen. Van Derveer saw much active service, and, among many other engagements, participated in the battles of Mill Springs, Chickamauga, and Mission Ridge. Since 1870 he has been judge of the court of common pleas of Butler county, Ohio.

VAN DE VELDE, James Oliver, R. C. bishop, b. near Termonde, Belgium, 3 April, 1795; d. in Natchez, Miss., 13 Nov., 1855. He received his early training from a refugee French priest who had been sheltered by his family, was afterward placed in a boarding-school near Ghent, and was professor of French and Flemish in Pueri when he was eighteen years old. He afterward entered the Seminary of Mechlin, where he taught Latin, while studying logic and theology. In 1817 he came to the United States and became a student in the Jesuit novitiate at Georgetown. After two years he was appointed professor of belles-lettres in St. Mary's college, and he was ordained a priest in 1827. He was chaplain of the Convent of the Visitation till 1829, when he was given charge of the missions of Rockville and Rock Creek, Md. In 1831 he was sent to St. Louis, and named professor of rhetoric in the Jesuit college. In 1833, when this college was made a university, he was appointed vice-president and procurator. He was vice-provincial of Missouri in 1837, and in 1840 became president of St. Louis university. He set out for

Rome the same year, to attend the congregation of procurators, as representative of his province. On his return he resumed the presidency of his college, and he was named vice-provincial again in 1843. Under his administration the Jesuit institutions in the west became very prosperous. He built several churches and novitiates, and created new Indian missions. In 1848 he became socius of the provincial, and in this capacity attended the council of Baltimore. He was nominated for the see of Chicago, and was consecrated bishop on 11 Feb., 1849. He at once made a thorough visitation of his diocese, and founded two orphan asylums; but his health soon gave way, and this, added to the opposition he encountered from part of his diocese, induced him to implore the pope to accept his resignation. Not succeeding, he set out for Rome in 1852, bearing the decrees of the plenary council that was held in that year in Baltimore. He was well received by Pius IX., who decided to transfer him to a milder climate. While making a circuit of his diocese after his return, he received his brief of nomination to the vacant see of Natchez on 29 July, 1853. During his administration of the diocese of Chicago seventy churches had been begun and the greater number of them were completed, and he erected several other religious and charitable institutions. On arriving in the state of Mississippi, he visited the different congregations, made efforts to procure additional priests, founded schools, and took measures for completing the cathedral and erecting a college. On 13 Oct., 1855, he sustained an injury from a fall which eventually led to his death.

VANDEWATER, George Roe, clergyman, b. in Flushing, L. I., 25 April, 1854. He was graduated at Cornell in 1874, at the General theological seminary, New York city, in 1879, ordained to the priesthood in the latter year, and was rector of the Protestant Episcopal church at Oyster Bay, Long Island, in 1878-'80, where he was instrumental in building a church and founding a library. He then became rector of St. Luke's church, Brooklyn, N. Y., organized the church and congregation of St. Bartholomew, was active in what is known as the advent mission revival in 1885, and instrumental in organizing the Parochial mission society, of which he became general secretary. He subsequently conducted missions in various parts of the country with success, and on 1 June, 1887, was appointed general missionary of the Parochial mission society of the Episcopal church for one year, still retaining his pastorate. In 1888 he became rector of St. Andrew's church, New York city. He is identified with the cathedral and the cathedral schools in Garden City, Long Island, and is a trustee of Cornell, and of the General theological seminary. Nashotah seminary gave him the degree of D. D. in 1886. He has published "Manual of Church Music" (Brooklyn, 1886); "The Hymn-Book for Missions" (New York, 1887); and "Manual of Church Prayer" (Brooklyn, 1888).

VAN DORN, Earl, soldier, b. near Port Gibson, Miss., 17 Sept., 1820; d. in Spring Hill, Tenn., 8 May, 1863. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1842, assigned to the 7th infantry, and served in garrisons. After his promotion to 2d lieutenant, 30 Nov., 1844, he took part in the military occupation of Texas in 1845-'6, was made 1st lieutenant, 3 March, 1847, and brevetted captain on 18 April for "gallant and meritorious conduct in the battle of Cerro Gordo." He was at Contreras and Churubusco, and was brevetted major, 20 Aug., 1847, for gallantry in those actions. He also took part in the assault and capture of the city of Mexico, and was wounded at Belen gate. He was aide-de-camp to Gen. Persifer F. Smith, from April, 1847, till May, 1848, at Baton Rouge, La. Lieut. Van Dorn engaged in the Seminole war in 1849-'50, was made captain in the 2d cavalry, 3 March, 1855, took part in the battle with the Comanches, 1 July, 1856, and commanded the expedition against those Indians near Washita Village, Indian territory, 1 Oct., 1858, where he was four times wounded, twice dangerously by arrows. He was again engaged with the Comanches in the valley of Nessentunga, 13 May, 1859. He became major of the 2d cavalry, 28 June, 1860, but resigned on 31 Jan., 1861, and was appointed by the legislature of Mississippi brigadier-general of the state forces, afterward succeeding Jefferson Davis as major-general. He was appointed colonel of cavalry in the regular Confederate army, 16 March, 1861, took command of a body of Texan volunteers, and on 20 April captured the steamer "Star of the West" at Indianola. On 24 April, at the head of 800 men, at Salaria, he received the surrender of Maj. Caleb C. Sibley and seven companies of U. S. infantry, and on 9 May he received that of Col. Isaac V. D. Reeve with six companies of the 8th infantry. He became brigadier-general on 5 June, and major-general on 19 Sept., 1861, and on 29 Jan., 1862, took command of the Trans-Mississippi department. He was defeated at Pea Ridge on 6-8 March (see CURTIS, SAMUEL R.), and, being superseded by Gen. Theophilus H. Holmes, joined the Army of Mississippi. At Corinth, 3-4 Oct., where he was in command with Gen. Sterling Price, he was again defeated, and he was superseded by Gen. John C. Pemberton. On 20 Dec. he made an attack on Holly Springs, Miss., which was occupied by Col. Murphy with a body of U. S. troops, and captured a large amount of valuable stores. On 10 April, 1863, he made an unsuccessful attack on Gen. Gordon Granger at Franklin, Tenn. In the following month Gen. Van Dorn was shot by a physician named Peters, on account of a private grievance. Gen. Van Dorn provoked many strictures at one time by an order restricting the comments of the press on the movements of the army, though the step was taken in obedience to the commands of Gen. Braxton Bragg. He possessed a cultivated taste, and was a fine draughtsman. When stationed at Newport, Ky., barracks, opposite Cincinnati, he devised and successfully tried in that city an elevated electric railway.

VAN DYKE, Hendrick, pioneer, b. in Holland about 1599; d. in New York in 1688. He came to this country in 1636 or in 1640, in the service of the West India company, as ensign commander of their troops. He was sent by Gov. William Kieft on several expeditions against the Indians, and in 1643, under his orders, destroyed a large Indian village on Long Island sound, killing about 500 persons. He returned to Holland on 25 June, 1645, was appointed fiscal or attorney-general of the New Netherlands, and in 1646 sailed for New Amsterdam with Peter Stuyvesant, the new governor of the province. During the voyage he offended Stuyvesant, and when they reached New Amsterdam the governor excluded him from the council for twenty-nine months, and succeeded in depriving him of all his influence and dignities. In 1650 he made an earnest protest to the home government "against the excesses of Director Stuyvesant," but the latter influenced his dismissal in March, 1652. In 1655, at a time when the citizens were entirely unprepared for an attack, the Indian tribes that surrounded New Amsterdam landed within the city limits with 500 warriors, broke into houses, abused the people, and among others wounded Van Dyke, who was seated peacefully in his garden. The citizens rushed to the fort, a struggle ensued, and three Indians were killed. The savages took to their boats, but in revenge laid waste the farms on the New Jersey coast, killed 50 of the inhabitants of Staten island, and took 100 prisoners. This uprising is almost universally explained by historians on the theory that Van Dyke had killed an Indian woman who was stealing fruit from his garden: but the statement is not substantiated by the earliest and most reliable authorities. His closing years were passed in retirement. He is described as a "thrifty man, dealing in real estate, and loaning money." In 1675 he married the widow of Jacob Van Couwenhoven. See "Colonial New York," by George W. Schuyler (2 vols., New York, 1885).—His descendant in the fourth generation, Henry Herbert, financier, b. in Kinderhook, N. Y., in 1809; d. in New York city, 22 Jan., 1888, was apprenticed to a printer early in life, and at twenty-one years of age became editor of the Goshen "Independent Republican." He was subsequently connected with the Albany "Argus," and was active in state politics as a Free-soil Democrat, following the lead of Martin Van Buren in the revolt against the "Hunker" Democrats that resulted in the election of Zachary Taylor to the presidency as a Whig. He subsequently joined the Republican party, and was a presidential elector on the Frémont ticket in 1856. He became superintendent of public instruction for the state of New York in 1857, and in 1861 superintendent of the state banking department, holding office till 1865, when he was chosen by President Johnson assistant U. S. treasurer. The failure of his health compelled his resignation of that post in 1869. He was president of the American safe deposit company in 1883-'8, and, among other business offices, held the presidency of the Erie transportation company.—Henry's brother, Cornelius Van Allen, clergyman, b. in Kinderhook, N. Y., 13 Aug., 1818, studied at Kinderhook academy, was graduated at Jefferson medical college in 1837, and the same year became a missionary to Syria, under the care of the American board. Having become proficient in Arabic, he was appointed principal of a seminary at Abeih, on Mount Tabor, Palestine, and at the same time engaged in the preparation of mathematical and scientific books in the Arabic. He was ordained to the ministry of the Congregational church in 1846, and after the death of Dr. Eli Smith was called by the American board to Beyrout to complete the latter's work on the Arabic version of the Scriptures. As there were certain principles in Dr. Smith's version that Dr. Van Dyke found it necessary to change, he rewrote the whole, with the exception of the Pentateuch, in the style of the Koran. He was invited by the American Bible society to come to New York in 1864, and to superintend its publication. After two years he completed an edition of the whole Bible, and one of the New Testament alone, with vowel points (New York, 1867). He was manager of the mission press in Beyrout in 1857-'80, subsequently physician to St. John's hospital and professor of pathology in the Syrian Protestant college, and since 1882 has been physician to St. George's hospital. Rutgers gave him the degree of D. D. in 1865. He has published tracts, is the author in Arabic of a series of mathematical, chemical, astronomical, and hygienic works, and has translated into that tongue the "Shorter Catechism" (Beyrout, 1843) and "The Schönberg-Cotta Family" (1865).

VAN DYKE, Henry Jackson, clergyman, b. in Abingdon, Montgomery co., Pa., 2 March, 1822. He was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1843 and at Princeton theological seminary in 1845, was ordained to the ministry of the Presbyterian church the same year, and was pastor in Bridgeton, N. J., in 1845-'52, and in Germantown, Pa., in 1852-'3. At the last date he was called to the 1st Presbyterian church in Brooklyn, N. Y., which charge he continues to hold. The University of Missouri gave him the degree of D. D. in 1860. He is an effective speaker and lecturer, and is popular as a pastor, occupying a high place in the Presbyterian church as an authority on doctrine and discipline. He was active in 1870 in the movement for the reunion of the northern and southern branches of that body, and moderator of the General assembly in 1876.—His son, Henry Jackson, clergyman, b. in Germantown, Pa., 10 Nov., 1852, was graduated at Princeton in 1873, and at the Theological seminary there in 1877. He became corresponding editor of the Philadelphia "Presbyterian" in 1876, edited the "Princeton Book," and was licensed to preach the same year. He studied at the University of Berlin in 1877, became pastor of the United Congregational church, Newport, R. I., in 1878, and since 1882 has been in charge of the Brick (Presbyterian) church, New York city. Princeton gave him the degree of D. D. in 1884. He has published "The Reality of Religion" (New York, 1884), and many contributions to periodicals, including a series of articles on "Gospel History in Italian Painting."

VAN DYKE, John, jurist, b. in Lamington, N. J., 3 April, 1807; d. in Wabasha, Minn., 24 Dec., 1878. He was admitted to the New Jersey bar in 1836, and immediately rose to prominence in the Suydam-Robinson murder trial. He held many offices of trust and was the first president of the Bank of New Jersey at New Brunswick. He was elected to congress in 1847 and served two terms, during which his course was marked by bitter opposition to slavery. In politics he was a Whig, and afterward one of the founders of the Republican party in New Jersey. In 1859 he became one of the state supreme court judges, which post he held until 1866. Two years later he went to Minnesota, and was there, by special appointment, judge of the 3d judicial district. He published some anti-slavery pamphlets and contributed to magazines.—His son, Theodore Strong, author, b. in New Brunswick, N. J., 19 July, 1842, was graduated at Princeton in 1863, and admitted to the bar in 1866. He practised law in Minnesota from 1869 till 1876, when feeble health forced him to remove to southern California. He chose literature in nature for his subject, and soon became known through his letters on shooting, fishing, natural history, and gun-rifling in sporting journals. He was the first to make known the internal beauties and advantages of southern California to the sportsman, settler, and invalid. In 1884 he travelled through Mexico as a special correspondent for several New York papers. In addition to his magazine and newspaper contributions, he has published "The Rifle, Rod, and Gun in California" (New York, 1881); "The Still Hunter" (1883); "Southern California" (1886); and "Southern California the Italy of America" (San Diego, Cal., 1887).—Another son, John Charles, author, b. in New Brunswick, N. J., 21 April, 1856, was admitted to the New York bar in 1877, but immediately abandoned the law for literature. He studied art in Europe in 1883, 1887, and 1888, was editor of the "Studio" in 1884, and, besides many articles in magazines and newspapers, principally on art topics, has published "Books, and how to use Them" (New York, 1883); "Principles of Art" (1887); and "How to judge of a Picture" (1888).

VAN DYKE, Joseph Smith, clergyman, b. in Bound Brook, N. J., 2 Nov., 1832. He was graduated at Princeton in 1857, and at the theological seminary there in 1861, was tutor in Greek while studying theology, pastor of the 1st Presbyterian church in Bloomsbury, N. J., in 1861-'9, and since the latter year has held a charge in Cranbury, N. J. In 1859-'60 he lectured on education. Princeton gave him the degree of D. D. in 1884. He has published "Popery the Foe of the Church" (Philadelphia, 1871); "Prohibition of the Liquor Traffic" (New York, 1879); "Through the Prison to the Throne, Illustrations of Life from the Biography of Joseph" (1881); "From Gloom to Gladness, Illustrations of Life from the Biography of Esther" (1883); "Giving or Entertainment? Which?" (1883); and "Theism or Evolution" (1886).

VAN DYKE, Nicholas, statesman, b. in New Castle county, Del., 25 Sept., 1738; d. there, 19 Feb., 1789. He was educated in his native county, studied law, was admitted to the Philadelphia bar in 1765, and attained eminence in the profession. He took an active part in the military and political affairs of his county, attaining the rank of major in the militia. In 1774, when the freeholders of New Castle county held a general meeting to consider the Boston port bill, he was appointed on the committee of thirteen to correspond with the other colonies. On this committee he was associated with Thomas McKean and George Read. He was a deputy from his county to the State convention of July, 1776, which framed the first constitution of the state. He was elected with James Sykes, 22 Feb., 1777, to the Continental congress in the room of John Dickinson and John Evans, who declined to serve. He continued in congress until 1783, and was one of the delegates that ratified the articles of confederation. In 1781 congress appointed him one of a committee of five to confer with the people of New Hampshire relative to the admission of that colony into the "federal union of these states." In 1777 he was a member of the council of the state of Delaware, and in 1779 its speaker. In 1777 he was also appointed a judge of admiralty. He was elected president of the state of Delaware in 1783, holding the office until 1786. Gov. Van Dyke was a firm believer in the sovereignty of the state.—His son, Nicholas, senator, b. in New Castle, Del., 20 Dec., 1769; d. there, 21 May, 1826, was graduated at Princeton in 1788. In his class were David Stone, afterward governor and chief justice of North Carolina, William Kirkpatrick, subsequently Federal judge and a member of congress, and Smith Thompson, afterward secretary of the navy and justice of the U. S. supreme court, yet President Witherspoon said of him in a letter to George Read, 2 Oct., 1787: "If you have any opportunity of seeing Mr. Van Dyke, please assure him that his son is, I think, without doubt, the first in his class." After his graduation he studied law with his brother-in-law, Kensey Johns, and was admitted to the bar at New Castle in April, 1792. He was elected in 1799 to the legislature of Delaware, and in 1807 to congress, serving until 1811. In 1815 he became a member of the senate of Delaware, and from 1817 till 1826 he was a member of the U. S. senate. Lafayette, who was present at the wedding of Mr. Van Dyke's daughter to Charles I. Du Pont, and gave away the bride, was his personal friend, and declared that "in his judgment Mr. Van Dyke was one of the first statesmen in rank whom he knew in America." William T. Reed said of him: "If surpassed by some of his contemporaries (inferior to few, if any, members of the bar throughout the Union) in profound knowledge of the law and in dialectical power, he was a sound lawyer, and superior to them all as a fluent, graceful, and successful advocate and in the skilful management of his cases. He never lost his predilection for general literature, and was remarkable for the ease and elegance of his manners and conversational powers, for his taste in architecture and his fondness for indulging in it. In the senate of the United States he not only maintained but increased the high reputation of the representatives of Delaware for statesmanship and ability as a debater. He was of the Federal party."

VANE, Sir Henry, governor of Massachusetts, b. in Hadlow, Kent, England, in 1612; d. in London, 14 June, 1662. He was the son of Sir Henry Vane, comptroller of the household of Charles I., and was educated at Westminster school and Oxford. Through his father's influence he early entered the diplomatic service and visited Vienna, in 1631, with the English ambassador. It is supposed that he spent a short time in Geneva, for he returned to England a thorough Puritan, and, refusing the career that was open to him as the son of a courtier, sailed in 1635 for New England. An impressive bearing and great abilities, joined to the fact of his high birth, led to his taking an active part in the affairs of the colony of Massachusetts. Within a month after his arrival he was admitted to membership in the church of Boston, and before three months had expired, with Hugh Peters, he procured a meeting in Boston of the principal magistrates and ministers of the colony, with a view to healing some distractions in the commonwealth and "effecting a more firm and friendly uniting of minds." At this meeting Vane declared in favor of a more rigorous administration of government than had thus far been pursued. In May, 1636, notwithstanding his youth, Vane was chosen governor of the colony. According to John Winthrop, "the ships congratulated his election with a volley of shot." It was expedient before all things that the colonists should be united, but Vane had a horror of all forms of bigotry, and he had no sympathy with the attacks of the clergy on Anne Hutchinson, with many of whose opinions he agreed. A strong opposition was organized against him, and he was defeated at the annual election in 1637. But he had gained the affection of the people of Boston, and was at once chosen by them one of their representatives to the general court. The majority of that body declared the election of Vane and his associates void, whereupon the inhabitants returned them a second time on the next day. In order to put down the Hutchinson heresy, a law was passed by the general court that no strangers should be received within the jurisdiction of the colony except such as should be allowed by some of the magistrates. This created such public discontent that Gov. Winthrop put forward a "Defence," to which Vane immediately replied with "A Brief Answer to a certain Declaration made of the Intent and Equity of the Order of Court that none should be received to inhabit within this Jurisdiction but such as should be allowed by some of the Magistrates." Vane returned to England in August, 1637, and thereafter it is recorded by Winthrop that "he showed himself in later years a true friend to New England, and a man of a noble and generous mind." He was elected to parliament in 1640, was made treasurer of the navy with Sir William Russell, and during the same year he was knighted. In November, 1640, he was chosen to the long parliament, and before the assembly met he found among his father's papers (so it has been asserted) notes that subsequently formed the chief evidence in causing the impeachment and execution of the Earl of Strafford. The use of this information brought about a collision between father and son, and it was several years before they were reconciled. He became a zealous opponent of the royalist party and turned the fees of his office—£30,000 a year—over to parliament, deeming such a revenue too great for a subject. In July, 1643, he was sent to Scotland as one of the commissioners to negotiate an alliance, and by his persuasion the "Solemn league and covenant" was adopted. During the progress of the war he was placed on all commissions that were empowered to treat with the king, and was also one of the parliament's committee that occasionally accompanied the army. When the house of commons discussed the terms of settlement that were offered by the king, he led the minority that favored their rejection, but yielded to the majority, and retired. In 1649 he returned to public life as a member of the council of state, and had almost exclusive direction of the navy and the conduct of foreign wars. The forcible dissolution of the parliament by Oliver Cromwell in 1653 brought him into open enmity with that leader. He then went to Raby castle and devoted himself to writing theological works. Certain of his publications being regarded as seditious, he was imprisoned in Carisbrooke castle, but was soon released. After the death of Oliver Cromwell he returned to parliament, when he became the leader of the Republican party. On the restoration of the monarchy he was imprisoned, and after a trial for treason was beheaded. Sir Henry Vane's labors in behalf of New England were arduous and important. The charter for the colony of Rhode Island was procured in great measure through his influence, and Roger Williams declared that his name ought ever to be held in honored remembrance by her people. See his biography by George Sikes, a contemporary; "Life of Sir Henry Vane," by Charles W. Upham, in Sparks's "American Biography" (Boston, 1835); "Statesmen of the Commonwealth," by John Forster (London, 1840); and "The Life of Young Sir Henry Vane, Governor of Massachusetts Bay and Leader of the Long Parliament," by James K. Hosmer (Boston, 1888).

VAN ELTEN, Hendrick Dirk Kruseman, artist, b. in Alkman, Holland, 14 Nov., 1829. He began the study of art in his native town, and in 1844 went to Haarlem, where he studied with Cornelis Sieste and other masters. His professional life has been spent in Holland and in New York, in which city he has resided since 1865. He is a member of various academies and art societies in Holland and Belgium and in the United States, and a chevalier of the Order of the Lion.

H. Vane

In 1871 he was elected an associate of the National academy, and in 1885 he became an academician. He has received medals at Amsterdam (1860) and Philadelphia (1876), and has contributed many pictures to the exhibitions at the Academy of design. His "Clearing off, Adirondacks," "The Grove in the Heath," "Russell's Falls, Adirondacks," and "Autumn in the White Mountains" were at the Philadelphia exhibition of 1876.

VAN HORNE, William C., railroad president, b. in Will county, Ill., in February, 1843. He began his railway career as a telegraph-operator on the Illinois Central in 1856, was attached in various capacities to the Michigan Central and Chicago and Alton railroads from 1858 till 1872, was general superintendent of the St. Louis, Kansas City, and Northern line in 1872-'4, general manager of the Southern Minnesota in 1874-'8, and president in 1877-'9, and in 1879 also filled the office of general superintendent of the Chicago and Alton. He was next general superintendent of the Chicago, Milwaukee, and St. Paul road, then became general manager of the Canadian Pacific railroad, of which the section through the wheat-districts of Manitoba had just been completed. He was elected vice-president of the company in 1884, and in 1888 became its president.

VAN KOUGHNET, Philip (van-ko'-net), Canadian statesman, b. in Cornwall, Upper Canada, in 1789; d. there, 17 May, 1873. His father, Michael, a United empire loyalist, removed to Canada at the time of the American Revolution. The son was present at the battle of Chrysler's Farm, 11 Nov., 1813, as a subaltern officer, and at the battle of the Windmill, at Prescott, 13 Nov., 1837, as lieutenant-colonel of the 5th battalion of incorporated militia, and remained in command till the regiment was disbanded. He was a member of one or the other branch of the legislature of Upper Canada for more than thirty years, being in the legislative council in 1840, when the union of Upper and Lower Canada took place. At the time of his death he was chairman of the board of government arbitrators for the Dominion.—His son, Philip Michael Scott, Canadian statesman, b. in Cornwall, Ont., 26 Jan., 1823; d. in Toronto in the autumn of 1869, was admitted to the bar in 1844, began practice in Toronto, and in 1850 was appointed queen's counsel. In 1856 he became president of the executive council and minister of agriculture in the Taché-Macdonald government in the place of Sir Allan N. MacNab, who had resigned. When the Cartier-Macdonald ministry was formed he vacated the office of minister of agriculture for that of commissioner of crown lands. He resigned his portfolio in 1862, and was appointed chancellor of Canada, in which post he continued till his death. He represented Rideau division in the legislative council of Canada, and became and continued during his political career leader of the government in that body. He was at one time a delegate to England to confer with the imperial government regarding the international railway.—Another son, LAURENCE, b. in Cornwall, Ont., 7 Oct., 1836, was educated at Trinity college, Toronto, and in May, 1880, became deputy superintendent-general of Indian affairs in the Dominion.

VAN LENNEP, Henry John, missionary, b. in Smyrna, Asia Minor, 8 March, 1815; d. in Great Barrington, Mass., 11 Jan., 1889. His ancestors were Dutch. In 1830 he was sent to this country, and he was graduated at Amherst in 1837. After studying one year at Andover theological seminary, he was ordained to the ministry of the Congregational church, returned to Asia Minor as a missionary, and established new mission-posts in European Turkey, Asia Minor, and Syria. He subsequently was connected with collegiate and theological institutions in Constantinople, Smyrna, and Tocat, and made many exploring expeditions and travelled extensively in Egypt and the East. He also became familiar with ten oriental dialects, in five of which he was able to preach. He lost his sight from cataract in 1869, returned to this country, was professor of natural sciences and modern languages in Ingham university, Le Roy, N. Y., in 1876-'8, and subsequently a teacher in Great Barrington, Mass. He published "Travels in Asia Minor" (2 vols., London, 1870), and "Bible Lands" (1879).—His wife, Mary Elizabeth, missionary, b. in Hartford, Conn., 16 April, 1821; d. in Constantinople, Turkey, 27 Sept., 1844, was a daughter of the Rev. Joel Hawes, and was educated in Hartford and New Haven. She married Mr. Van Lenne in 1843, accompanied him to Asia Minor, and established a school for native girls in Constantinople. See an interesting "Memoir" by her mother (Hartford, Conn., 1847).

VAN NESS, John Peter, congressman, b. in Ghent, N. Y., in 1770; d. in Washington, D. C., 7 March, 1847. He studied at Columbia and was prepared for the bar, but was prevented from practising by delicate health. He was chosen to congress as a Democrat in 1800. After he became major of the uniformed militia of the District of Columbia the house of representatives declared that he had forfeited his seat by accepting a commission from the general government, and he was relieved from office, 17 Jan., 1803. On the death of his wife's father he came into possession of a large fortune, built a fine mansion, and entertained on a luxurious scale. He then became a citizen of Washington, occupied many offices of trust, was president of the Metropolitan bank, mayor of the city, and a trustee of various institutions.—His wife, Marcia Burns, philanthropist, b. in Washington, D. C., in 1782; d. there in September, 1832, was a daughter of David Burns, of Washington, and was married in 1802. She was carefully educated, and, as the wealthiest heiress in her section of the country, held a conspicuous place in Washington society. While meeting all the claims that her large wealth and high standing could present, she led a life of much benevolence and religious beauty. She established the Protestant orphan asylum, gave the ground on which two churches were built, and contributed liberally to charities. Mr. and Mrs. Van Ness were buried in a mausoleum that was erected after the pattern of the Temple of Vesta at Rome. It stood in the grounds of the Protestant orphan asylum, and for many years was one of the curious and interesting relics of old Washington. It has since been removed to a cemetery. Mrs. Van Ness was the only woman in Washington that ever received a public funeral, which was awarded her on account of her extensive charities.—His brother, William Peter, jurist, b. in Ghent, N. Y., in 1778; d. in New York city, 6 Sept., 1826, was graduated at Columbia in 1797, adopted the profession of law, and settled in New York city, where he became the devoted friend and protégé of Aaron Burr. He took Burr's challenge to Hamilton, and was one of his seconds in the duel. Van Ness became judge of the southern district of New York in 1812, being appointed by President Madison, and held office until his death. Judge Van Ness suffered much opprobrium from his connection with the Burr-Hamilton duel, and is described by the partisans of the latter as "a brilliant but unscrupulous politician." In his own party, however, he was popular and respected. Washington Irving was his intimate friend. He published "Examination of Charges against Aaron Burr," under the pen-name of "Aristides" (New York, 1803); with John Woodworth, "Laws of New York, with Notes" (2 vols., Albany, 1813); "Reports of Two Cases in the Prize Court for New York District" (1814); and "Concise Narrative of Gen. Jackson's First Invasion of Florida" (1826).—Another brother, Cornelius Peter, jurist, b. in Kinderhook, N. Y., 26 Jan., 1782; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 15 Dec., 1852, was educated for the bar, removed to Burlington, Vt., and practised his profession with success until 1809, when he became U. S. district attorney. From that year until his death he occupied public office. He was collector of the port of Burlington in 1815-'18, a commissioner to settle the U. S. boundary-lines under the treaty of Ghent in 1817-'21, a member of the legislature in 1818-'21, having been chosen, as a Democrat, chief justice of Vermont in 1821-'3, governor from the latter date till 1829, and U. S. minister to Spain in 1829-'37. In 1844-'5 he was collector of the port of New York. The University of Vermont gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1823. He published a "Letter to the Public on Political Parties, Caucuses, and Conventions" (Washington, D. C., 1848).—Their first cousin, William W., jurist, b. in Claverack, N. Y., in 1776; d. in Charleston, S. C., 27 Feb., 1823, was admitted to the bar in 1797, practised in his native town and in Hudson, N. Y., was a member of the assembly in 1804-'6, and the leader of the Federalist party. He was appointed a judge of the supreme court in 1807, and held office till 1822. In January, 1820, he was tried before a committee of the legislature on the charge of using his office to obtain the charter of the American bank. The trial was conducted with great ability, and Judge Van Ness was acquitted, but he never recovered from the effect of the charge, and fell into delicate health, from which he finally sank while on a southern tour. He was removed from the bench in 1822, under the act of the Constitutional convention of that year, and resumed the practice of law. Dr. Jabez D. Hammond says of him: "He was one of the shrewdest and most sagacious men whom New York ever produced, of fascinating manners, and remarkable conversational powers."

VAN NEST, Rynier, clergyman, b. near North Branch, N. J., 8 Feb., 1739; d. in Schoharie, N. Y., 24 Feb., 1776. His ancestor, Peter, came to this country from Holland in 1647. Rynier was licensed to preach in the Reformed Dutch church in 1773, and was pastor on Long Island and in New York state from that date until his death. He was president of the General synod in 1767-'88. He was devoted to the Whig cause, and gave liberally in support of the Continental congress.—His great-nephew, Abraham Rynier, clergyman, b. in New York city, 1 Feb., 1823, was graduated at Rutgers in 1841, at the New Brunswick theological seminary in 1847, and was licensed to preach in the Reformed Dutch church. He was pastor in New York city in 1848-'62, in charge of the American chapel in Paris in 1863-'4, of the American chapel in Rome in 1864-'5, of the American Union church in Florence, Italy, in 1866-'75, and of a church in Philadelphia in 1878-'86. He received the degree of D. D. in 1860 from the University of Pennsylvania, and Rutgers. He was president of the evangelization committee of the Free church of Italy in 1875, of the General synod in 1879, and organized the Reformed Dutch church in Geneva, Switzerland. He has published "Signs of the Times" (New York, 1854); "Reports of Union Church, Florence" (1868, 1870, 1872); "Life of Rev. George W. Bethune" (1869); and "Reports of the Florence Orphan Asylum" (1876); and edited James S. Cannon's "Pastoral Theology" (1853) and George W. Bethune's "Lectures on the Heidelberg Catechism" (1864).

VAN NIEUWENHUYSEN, Wilhelmus, clergyman, b. in Holland about 1645; d. in New York city, 17 Feb., 1681. He came to this country in 1671 as an assistant to Samuel Drisius, and ministered with great success till after 1674. He was subsequently involved in a struggle between the English governors and the non-conformist churches, and successfully resisted an attempt to install Nicholas Van Rensselaer, an Episcopal clergyman, over the Dutch church in Albany. Four years later, by permission of Gov. Edmund Andros, Van Nieuwenhuysen convened the four Dutch clergyman that were then in New York, and with their elders organized a classis. This was the first formal ecclesiastical body among the Dutch in this country, and the last for about seventy years. Their ordination of a clergyman was subsequently ratified by the classis of Amsterdam. There was a steady growth in the membership of his church during his ministry in New York. He also supplied the churches on Long Island during their vacancy. Henricus Selyns, his relative and successor, wrote a poem on his life and work, which concludes with the lines

"Now is New Netherland, by Nieuwenhuysen's mission, And Nieuwenhuysen, by New Netherland's contrition, Led to the New Jerusalem for new delights;
What church more safety finds than in renewed rites?"

VAN NORMAN, Daniel Cummings, educator, b. in Nelson, Canada West, 17 Aug., 1815; d. in New York city, 24 June, 1886. He was graduated at Wesleyan in 1838, joined the Canada Wesleyan conference the next year, and was professor of classics and physics in Victoria college, Coburg, in 1838-'45. He founded the Burlington ladies' academy, Hamilton, Ont., in 1845, was its principal till 1851, and in the latter year assumed the charge of Rutgers female institute, New York city, which post he held till 1857. He then founded and became principal of the Van Norman institute, a school for young ladies, successfully conducting that institution until his death. He received the degree of LL. D. from Wesleyan in 1860. Late in life Dr. Van Norman left the Methodist and united with the Presbyterian church. He was secretary of the American foreign and Christian union for many years, and a member of scientific and literary bodies, and, although he held no regular pastorate, had preached more than 4,000 sermons.

VAN NOSTRAND, David, publisher, b. in New York city, 5 Dec., 1811; d. there, 14 June, 1886. He was educated at Union hall, Jamaica, N. Y., and in 1826 entered the publishing-house of John P. Haven, who gave him an interest in the firm when he became of age. In 1834 he formed a partnership with William Dwight, but the financial crisis of 1837 led to its dissolution. Mr. Van Nostrand then accepted the appointment of clerk of accounts and disbursements under Capt. John G. Barnard, at that time in charge of the defensive works of Louisiana and Texas, with headquarters at New Orleans. While so engaged he devoted attention to the study of scientific and military affairs, and on his return to New York city began the importation of military books for officers of the U. S. army, afterward receiving orders from private individuals and from academic institutions for foreign books of science. His place of business was at first at the corner of John street and Broadway, and as his trade increased he began the publication of standard works by American authors on military and scientific subjects. This extension, with the growing demands for books on scientific subjects, led to his removal to 23 Murray street, where he continued until his death. In 1869 he began the publication of "Van Nostrand's Engineering Magazine," a monthly journal, which was devoted to selections from foreign sources, but also contained original papers on mathematics. Mr. Van Nostrand was one of the founders of the St. Nicholas and Holland societies, and was an early member of the Century and Union league clubs of New York city.

VAN RENSSELAER, Killian, colonist, b. in Amsterdam, Holland, in 1595; d. there in 1644. He was descended from a long line of eminent citizens of Amsterdam, was carefully educated, and became a wealthy pearl and diamond merchant in his native town. He took an active part in the formation of the West India company, placed several of his vessels at the disposal of the corporation, and twice advanced money to save its credit. He sent an agent to the New Netherlands to trade with the Indians for land on the west side of Hudson river, from twelve miles south of Albany to Smack's island, "stretching two days into the interior," soon afterward concluding the purchase of all the land on the east side of that river, both north and south of Fort Orange, and "far into the wilderness." This great feudal estate included the entire territory that is comprised in the present counties of Albany, Columbia, and Rensselaer, and was named Rensselaerswick. He colonized it with laborers and emigrants, whom he sent out in his own ships with provisions and implements of warfare and industry. Van Rensselaer remained in Holland, but managed his affairs through a director. In 1640 he sent Adrian Van der Donck to be sheriff of the colony, and subsequently Dr. Johannes Megapolensis "for the edifying improvement of the inhabitants and Indians thereabouts." To obviate, as much as possible, the dangers of life among the latter, he required that all his colonists, except the farmers and tobacco-planters, should live near each other, so as to form a church neighborhood. At his death his estate descended to his eldest son, JOHANNES; but the latter, being under age, was placed under the guardianship of Johannes Van Wely and Wouter Van Twiller, who rendered homage to the states-general in the name of their ward. But the colony had in reality become an independent power, and was regarded as injurious to the rights of the province. The West India company became jealous for their privileges, and in 1648 Peter Stuyvesant, then governor of New Amsterdam, went with a military escort up the Hudson river, ordered that no buildings should be erected within a prescribed distance of Fort Orange, and in many ways attempted to cut off the powers of the patroon of Rensselaerswick. A bitter controversy with Brandt Arent Van Slecht-enhorst, the director, ensued, but in 1674 the West India company confessed that Stuyvesant's aggressions were unwarranted and in violation of the colony's charter. While this controversy was in progress, JAN BAPTIST Van Rensselaer, the second son of the first patroon, came to this country as the representative of his brother Johannes, his commission as director dating 8 May, 1652. He retired in 1658, worn out by controversies with Stuyvesant, and was succeeded by his brother Jeremias. Jan Baptist built the Van Rensselaer mansion, and brought from Holland massive and elaborately carved furniture, large quantities of silver plate, and many portraits of his ancestors. The manor house, in internal improvements and finish, resembled the Holland homestead. The lord of the manor resided there with his tenantry, maintaining the authority of a landed lord in Europe. The second patroon, Johannes, never came to this country. —Killian's third son, Jeremias, b. in Amsterdam, Holland, about 1632; d. in Rensselaerswick, N. Y., in October, 1674, was in charge of the colony for sixteen years. He was treated with respect and courtesy by Stuyvesant, by whom, when the province was threatened by the English, he was invited to New Amsterdam to preside over the convention that assembled there, to take measures of defence. When the English gained possession of New Netherlands in 1664, he took the oath of allegiance to the Duke of York. According to the terms of surrender, he was left in peaceable possession of the colony, and conducted its affairs without interference from the new government. He was confirmed in most of his rights and privileges, and the colony was erected into a manor and governed according to English rule. The village of Beverwyck, which had grown up under the shadow of old Fort Orange, was detached from the manor, and incorporated into the city of Albany. Van Rensselaer soon acquired reputation as an executive officer; his correspondence, which is still preserved by his descendants, is a valuable record of events, and attests his great energy and business-like qualities. He also wrote to Holland minute accounts of various occurrences in this country under the pen-name of the "New Netherland Mercury." He preserved peace with the neighboring Indians, and so attached them to him that they guarded his estates as carefully as they did their own. He married

Maria Van Cortlandt. Jeremias was succeeded by his nephew, KILLIAN, son of Johannes. His patent was issued in 1685, under the title of first lord of the manor, and third patroon. By this patent the heirs in Albany relinquished to the heirs in Holland all title and right to the land in Holland, and the Hollanders gave up all the Albany settlement. Killian died without issue, and was succeeded by Jeremias's son, Killian, second lord of the manor, b. in Rensselaerswick in 1662; d. there in 1719. He was an officer of militia and a magistrate, represented the manor in the assembly in 1693-1704, and was a member of the council from the latter date until his death. In 1705 he conveyed Claverack, or the "lower manor," to his brother, Hendrick. He married Maria, daughter of Stephen Van Cortlandt.—Jeremias's brother, Nicholas, clergyman, b. in Amsterdam about 1638; d. in Albany, N. Y., in 1678, was the fourth son of the first patroon. He was liberally educated in Holland, and studied theology there, but began a tour of Europe before taking his degree. In Brussels he met Charles II. of England, who was then in exile, and Van Rensselaer predicted to him that he would be restored to the throne. He subsequently went to England as chaplain to the Dutch embassy, and the king, recognizing him and recollecting his prediction, gave him a gold snuff-box with his likeness in the lid, which is still in possession of the Van Rensselaer family. After the Dutch ambassador left Great Britain, Van Rensselaer was licensed by Charles to preach to the Dutch congregation at Westminster, was ordained a deacon in the English church, and appointed lecturer at St. Margaret's, Lothbury. When Sir Edmond Andros was commissioned governor of the New Netherlands, in 1674, Van Rensselaer accompanied him to this country, bearing a letter of recommendation from the Duke of York, in which he requested that Van Rensselaer be placed in charge of one of the Dutch churches in New York or Albany when there should be a vacancy. He became colleague pastor of the church in Albany shortly after his arrival, and in September, 1675, was invited by the governor to preach in the Dutch church in New York; but the pastor, William Van Nieuwenhuysen, absented himself from the service, and forbade Van Rensselaer's baptizing any children that might be presented for that ordinance. Subsequent events proved that Van Nieuwenhuysen rejected his ordination as not being in conformity with the order of the Dutch churches, nor with the terms of the treaty. Van Rensselaer referred the matter to the governor and council, and the trial was considered of much importance by both the church and the civil authorities, since it involved their privileges and rights, as defined in the articles under which the province was surrendered to the English. Nieuwenhuysen and his consistory presented a written answer, which was rather in justification of the former's conduct toward Van Rensselaer than a formal answer to the question why he should not be allowed to preach. The matter was passed over, and Van Rensselaer returned to his charge in Albany; but in 1676 he was thrown into prison, "for some dubious words spoken in a sermon," Jacob Leisler and Jacob Milburne making the complaint. He appealed to the governor and council, and gave a bond of 1,500 guilders to prosecute the matter to the end. Leisler failed to furnish the bond that was required of him, a warrant was issued for his arrest, and the churches and people were thrown into a ferment. At last a court was held at Albany, before which Van Rensselaer and Nieuwenhuysen appeared with papers and witnesses. After a review of the whole case, they were told by order of the governor "to be reconciled according to Christian love and duty." They answered, "With all our hearts," and the court ordered the parties to "forgive and forget," and that Leisler and Jacob Milburne pay the whole costs, as giving the first occasion for the differences.

Van Rensselaer again resumed his charge, but a year later he was refused a seat among the elders. It was resolved that he have a suitable one behind the magistrates, but in 1677 he was deposed by the governor, "on account," say the Reformed church authorities, "of his scandalous life"; but this is not substantiated by unprejudiced witnesses. He left no children.—His wife, ALIDA, was the daughter of Philip Schuyler, and subsequently married Robert Livingston.—Killian's grandson, STEPHEN, inherited the manor, removed the old house, and in 1765 built the present mansion, seen in the illustration. He governed under the title of the seventh patroon. He married Catherine Livingston, daughter of Philip Livingston, signer of the Declaration of Independence, and with his father-in-law "sternly opposed the encroachments of the crown."—Their son, Stephen, eighth patroon, b. in New York, 1 Nov., 1765; d. in Albany, N. Y., 26 Jan., 1839, was graduated at Harvard in 1782, and the next year married Margaret, daughter of Gen. Philip Schuyler. He was always addressed by courtesy as the patroon, although with the establishment of the colonial government he lost his baronial rights. After leaving college he entered at once on the improvement of his splendid although somewhat diminished estates, and, to induce farmers to settle on his lands, placed rentals so low that they yielded only one per cent. at a fair valuation. In consequence he soon had 900 farms of 150 acres each under cultivation. Having secured his patrimony, he entered politics, and, as a great landholder and at the same time an ardent patriot, was destined to bridge the chasm between the two opposite political systems. He was chosen to the assembly in 1789 as a Federalist, became a leader of that party, was state senator in 1791-'6, lieutenant-governor in 1795, and in 1798 and 1808-'10 was in the assembly. He became major of militia in 1786, colonel in 1788, and major-general in 1801. He was one of the first to propose the establishment of a canal between Hudson river and the great lakes, was appointed in 1810 a commissioner to report to the assembly on the route, and made an investigating tour of it the same year, the report of which was favorably received in 1811; but the project was delayed by the beginning of the second war with Great Britain. In 1812 he was appointed to command the U. S. forces on the northern frontier. Although he opposed the war as premature, he at once organized a militia force that was sufficient in numbers to overrun the province of Upper Canada. But he had no regular soldiers, and his officers were deficient in both courage and military skill. On 13-14 Oct., 1812, he fought the battle of Queenston Heights. The importance of that place arose from the fact that it was the terminus of the portage between Lake Ontario and the upper lakes. Gen. Van Rensselaer had minute information as to the situation and strength of each post of the enemy on the western bank of Niagara river, and his force numbered 6,000 men. The immediate command of the attacking party was assigned to Lieut.-Col. Solomon Van Rensselaer, who, on the morning of 13 Oct., with 300 militia and 300 regulars, under Lieut.-Col. John Chrystie, crossed the river. After a brilliant attack by Van Rensselaer, who received wounds that compelled him to withdraw, Capt. John E. Wool assumed command and stormed and captured the heights. The next day British re-enforcements, numbering 1,300 soldiers and 500 Indians, arrived under command of Gen. Roger H. Sheaffe. The militia on the American shore could overlook the battle-field and see the approach of Sheaffe; but when Gen. Stephen Van Rensselaer attempted to move them across the river to the support of the American force, they refused to stir. The law provides that militia shall not be compelled to serve beyond the bounds of their state against their will. They fell back on this privilege, and Van Rensselaer was powerless to induce them to fight. The Americans on the heights were unable to hold their position, and on the afternoon of 14 Oct. surrendered in a body. In his official despatches Gen. Van Rensselaer ascribes the disaster to the refusal of the militia to go to the aid of the captors of the heights. He was severely censured for his tardiness in making the attack, and the fact that he was a leader of the Federalist party, and opposed to the war, increased public dissatisfaction. On 24 Oct. he resigned his command and left the service. At the close of the war he again became canal commissioner, and chairman of the commission. When the Erie and Champlain canals were completed in 1825 he had been president of their boards for fourteen years. He was chosen to the assembly in 1818, served in the State constitutional convention in 1821 and in congress in 1823-'9, having been elected to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Solomon Van Rensselaer. In that body he earnestly supported John Quincy Adams for the presidency. He became a regent of the University of New York in 1819, and was subsequently its chancellor until his death. He promoted the interests of the State agricultural society, and was its president in 1820. Under his direction and at his expense Prof. Amos Eaton made a geological survey along the line of the canal from Albany to Buffalo, N. Y., in 1821-'3, and of another line that began in Massachusetts. From the data collected in these surveys he became convinced of the need for further technical education; to supply which he founded Rensselaer polytechnic institute at Troy, defraying for a long time half of its expenses. Yale gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1825. Gen. Van Rensselaer was tall, of commanding presence, and had dark, expressive eyes. He was the patron of benevolent objects. His second wife, whom he married in 1802, was Cornelia, daughter of Chief-Justice William Paterson, of New Jersey. He published "An Agricultural and Geological Survey of the District adjoining the Erie Canal" (Albany, 1824).—His eldest son, Stephen, the last patroon, b. in Albany, N. Y., 29 March, 1789; d. there, 25 May, 1868, was graduated at Princeton in 1808, and inheriting the manor by his father's will, at his death became the last patroon. During the anti-rent troubles in 1839 he sold his townships, and at his death the manor passed out of the hands of his descendants. He was an accomplished gentleman of the old school, and served as major-general of militia. He married Harriet Elizabeth, daughter of William Bayard, of New York.—Another son of Gen. Stephen, Cortlandt, clergyman, b. in Albany, N. Y., 26 May, 1808; d. in Burlington, N. J., 25 July, 1860, was graduated at Yale in 1827, studied at Union theological seminary, Prince Edward county, Va., and at Princeton theological seminary. He was a missionary to the slaves in Virginia in 1833-'5, was ordained the latter year, became pastor of the Presbyterian church in Burlington, N. J., in 1837, of the 2d Presbyterian church, Washington, D. C., in 1841, and agent of Princeton theological seminary in 1844, raising $100,000 for its endowment. He was secretary of the Presbyterian board of education in 1846-'60,

C. Van Rensselaer

and founded and edited the "Presbyterian Magazine" and "The Home, the School, and the Church." The University of New York gave him the degree of D. D. in 1845. Much of his large fortune was devoted to benevolent objects and to the religious enterprises of the Presbyterian church. After his death, selections from his published writings appeared under the title of "Miscellaneous Sermons, Essays, and Addresses," edited by his son, Cortlandt Van Rensselaer (Philadelphia, 1861).—Another son of Stephen, Henry, soldier, b. in Albany, N. Y., in 1810; d. in Cincinnati, Ohio, 23 March, 1864, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1831, but resigned from the army the next year and engaged in farming near Ogdensburg, N. Y. He was a member of congress in 1841-'3, having been chosen as a Whig, and in 1855-'60 was president of mining companies. At the beginning of the civil war he was appointed chief-of-staff to Gen. Winfield Scott, with the rank of brigadier-general, and he became inspector-general with the rank of colonel on the retirement of Gen. Scott, served in the Department of the Rappahannock in April and August, 1862, subsequently in the 3d army corps, and in the Department of the Ohio from 17 Sept. until his death.—The elder Stephen's brother, Philip S., mayor of Albany, b. in Albany, 15 April, 1767; d. there, 25 Sept., 1824, became mayor of Albany in 1799, and held office for nineteen years, the longest service of any mayor of that city. He was a public-spirited, energetic officer, and active in promoting educational, moral, and religious interests. He married Ann Van Cortlandt. He was president of the Albany Bible society for many years, a trustee of Union, and a founder of Albany academy.—Gen. Stephen's kinsman, Jeremiah, congressman, b. in New York in 1741; d. in Albany, N. Y., 22 Feb., 1810, was graduated at Princeton, in 1758, actively supported the Revolution, and was a member of the 1st congress, serving in 1789-'91. He was a presidential elector in 1800, and lieutenant-governor of New York in 1800-'4. He was active in the promotion of schemes for internal improvement, and a member of the Inland navigation company, of which Philip Schuyler was the first president.—The second son of the first Jeremiah, Hendrick, landowner, b. near Albany, N. Y., about 1667; d. there in July, 1740, was the founder of the Claverack branch of the Van Rensselaer family. He received as his portion of his grandfather Killian's estate what was known as the Claverack patent, containing about 62,000 acres of land in Columbia county, and 1,500 acres out of the manor proper, opposite the city of Albany. He built a substantial brick house on the latter estate and one at Claverack, which is still standing. He was employed in many public capacities, being mayor of Albany, commissioner of Indian affairs, and a representative in the assembly. In 1698 he bought from the Schaghticoke Indians a tract of six square miles on Hoosac river, for which he procured a patent. This purchase interfered greatly with the city of Albany, and, Van Rensselaer declining to sell his patent to the council, the controversy became a state affair. In 1699 the dispute was amicably settled and he passed his patent over to the city. His wife was a granddaughter of Anneke Jans Bogardus, through whom their descendants became heirs to Trinity church farm.—His grandson, Henry Killian, soldier, b. near Albany in 1744; d. in Greenbush, N. Y., 9 Sept., 1816, commanded a New York regiment during the Revolution, was wounded at the capture of Gen. Burgoyne, and carried the ball in his body for thirty-five years. In July, 1777, he was attacked by a large force near Fort Ann, and made a brave resistance, but, learning of the abandonment of Fort Ticonderoga, withdrew after receiving another severe wound. He was subsequently a general of militia.—His son, Solomon, soldier, b. in Rensselaer county, N. Y., 6 Aug., 1774; d. in Albany, N. Y., 23 April, 1852, entered the service, 14 March, 1792, as a cornet of cavalry. He became captain, raised a volunteer company, and, pushing through the wilderness, joined Gen. Anthony Wayne in Ohio in the Miami campaign. At the battle of Maumee Rapids in August, 1794, he made a brilliant and effective charge against the savages, and was shot, it was supposed fatally, through the lungs. A litter was sent to take him from the battle-field, but he refused to be laid upon it. "You young dog, then how are you going?" exclaimed Gen. Wayne. "I am an officer of the cavalry, and I shall go on horseback," was his reply. "You will drop by the road," said Wayne. "If I do, just cover me up and let me die

Sol. Van Rensselaer

there," said Van Rensselaer. He was mounted on his own charger, as he desired, and one of his own dragoons, on either side, supported him five or six miles. When his cousin, Stephen, became brigadier-general of the forces of the north in 1812, he became adjutant-general of New York militia, and negotiated the important agreement by which Lake Ontario was granted by the British during an armistice as a public highway for purposes of transportation of American troops and stores. At the assault of Queenston Heights, 13 Oct., 1812, he commanded the attacking party, was the first to spring ashore, on a large rock at the foot of the rapids, and with 225 men, formed under a fierce fire, climbed the bank and routed the enemy at the point of the bayonet, but fell with several wounds. He served in congress in 1819-'22, having been chosen as a Federalist, and was postmaster at Albany in 1822-'39. He accompanied Gov. George Clinton to Ohio in 1824 in the interest of the Erie canal, and was one of the delegates from the state of New York at its opening on 4 Nov., 1825. In 1797 he married Harriet, daughter of Col. Philip Van Rensselaer. He published a "Narrative of the Affair at Queenston" (New York, 1836). See "A Legacy of Historical Gleanings," by his daughter, Mrs. Catherine Van Rensselaer Bonney (Albany, N. Y., 1875).—Henry's brother, Nicholas, soldier, b. in Rensselaer county, N. Y., in 1754; d. in Albany, N. Y., in 1848, was a colonel in the Revolution, and served with gallantry on the heights of Stillwater. After the surrender of Gen. Burgoyne he was despatched by Gen. Horatio Gates to announce the news at Albany.—Another brother of Henry, Killian K., congressman, b. in Rensselaer county, N. Y., in 1763; d. in Albany, 18 June, 1845, after receiving a thorough education entered the law, and attained reputation at the bar. He was chosen to congress as a Democrat in 1800, and served by re-election till 1811.—Another great-grandson of the first Jeremiah, Robert, soldier, b. in Claverack, N. Y., in 1741; d. there, 11 Sept., 1802, was a general of militia during the Revolution, and commanded the force that pursued and defeated Sir John Johnson on his Mohawk valley raid in 1780. After graduation at Union college in 1838, and at the Episcopal general theological seminary in 1841, he was made deacon in St. Paul's chapel, New York city, 27 June 1841, by Bishop Benjamin T. Onderdonk, and priest, in St. Paul's church, Whitehall, N. Y., by the same bishop. He was rector of St. Paul's church, Whitehall, N. Y., in 1841-'5; of Grace church, Albany, N. He has published "Sister Louise, the Story of her Life Work" (New York, 1883), and has made large contributions to religious literature.

VAN SANTVOORD, Cornelius, clergyman, b. in Holland in 1637; d. in Schenectady, N. Y., 6 Jan., 1752. He studied in the University of Leyden, came to this country about 1718, and became pastor of the Reformed Dutch church of Staten island, organized in 1690. He was here from 1718 till 1742, preaching both in French and in Dutch, many of his hearers being French Protestant refugees, settled on the island. In the latter year he removed to Schenectady, and became pastor of the Reformed Dutch church there, in which place he remained until his death. His intimate friend, Theodorus J. Frelinghuysen, who came to this country from Holland two years after him, settling at Raritan, N. J., and arousing much opposition by his bold and earnest evangelism, found strong support in Mr. Van Santvoord, who published in his defence a small volume entitled "A Dialogue between Considerans and Candidus." He was a friend and had been a favorite pupil of the eminent Prof. John Marek, of Leyden university, two of whose works he translated—one a "Commentary on the Apocalypse," with added notes and reflections, the preface being written by Prof. Wesselius of the same university (Leyden, 1736); the other "A Dissertation on the Slaughtering of the Innocents at Bethlehem," designed to establish the literal interpretation of prophecy.—His great-grandson, Staats, clergyman, b. in Schenectady, N. Y., 15 March, 1790; d. in New Baltimore, N. Y., 29 May, 1882, was graduated at Union in 1811 and at New Brunswick theological seminary in 1814, ordained to the ministry of the Dutch Reformed church, and was pastor of the church of Belleville, N. J., in 1814-'28, of the church in Schodack, N. Y., in 1829-'34, and thence removed to New Baltimore, where he resided until his death. He retired after completing his fiftieth year in the active ministry of the Reformed Dutch church. In 1864 he was in the service of the Christian commission at Nashville, Tenn. His last public appearance was in his ninety-first year, when he attended the 200th anniversary of the Dutch Reformed church at Schenectady, of which his ancestor was pastor, delivering the benediction in Dutch. Union gave him the degree of D. D. in 1876. He published several sermons, and "A Spiritual Gift," a series of fifteen discourses (New York, 1851).—Staats's son, Cornelius, clergyman, b. in Belleville, N. J., 8 April, 1816, was graduated at Union in 1835, and studied at New Brunswick and Princeton theological seminaries. He became pastor of the Dutch Reformed church in Canastota, N. Y., in 1838, subsequently filled charges in New York state, was chaplain in the U. S. army in 1861-'5, associate editor of the "Interior," Chicago, Ill., in 1869-'71, and commissioner of schools in Ulster county, N. Y., in 1871-'6. Rutgers gave him the degree of D. D. in 1855. He was a special correspondent of the "New York Times" during the civil war, has published numerous magazine and newspaper articles, "Discourses and Miscellanies" (New York, 1856), and "Memoirs of Eliphalet Nott," with contributions by Prof. Tayler Lewis (1876).—Another son of Staats, George, lawyer, b. in Belleville, N. J., 8 Dec., 1819; d. in East Albany, N. Y., 6 March, 1863, was graduated at Union in 1841, studied law in Kinderhook, and removed to Indiana, but returned to the former town and practised there in 1846-'52. In 1852 and 1856 he was a member of the state assembly, and in 1860-'3 district attorney of Rensselaer county. He was killed in a railroad accident. He wrote for the "Democratic Review" lives of French revolutionists, and is the author of "The Indiana Justice" (Lafayette, 1845); "Life of Algernon Sidney" (New York, 1851); "Principles of Pleading in Civil Actions under the New York Code" (1852-'4; enlarged edition, with additions, 1855; with appendix, notes, and references, 1858); "Lives of the Chief Justices of the United States" (1854); "Precedents of Pleading" (1858); and "Practice in the Supreme Court of New York in Equity Actions" (Albany, N. Y., 1860-'1).

VAN SATLEE, Antony Jansen, pirate, b. probably in Holland about 1600; d. on Long Island, N. Y., in March, 1670. He was in New Amsterdam as early as 1630, and resided there till 1639, when he was banished for his crimes and unruly manner of life, having acquired the soubriquet of the "Turk" from his cruel and fierce character. He is found in the records under several aliases, that indicate that he engaged in the piracies on the coast of Morocco before coming to this country. When he was banished from New Amsterdam he settled on the west end of Long Island, obtaining a patent for 100 acres of land.

VAN SCHAACK, Peter, lawyer, b. in Kinderhook, N. Y., in March, 1747; d. there, 17 Sept., 1832. His ancestors were early settlers of New York state, emigrating from Holland. Peter was graduated at Columbia in 1768, studied law under William Smith the elder, and at twenty-six years of age was appointed sole reviser of the colonial statutes. He was conscientiously opposed to the Revolution, and, notwithstanding his personal popularity and intimacy with the most eminent men of the country, was summoned before the committee on conspiracies at Albany in June, 1777, and required to take the oath of allegiance to the Continental congress. He refused, was ordered to Boston within ten days, and from that time was constantly restrained, the authorities even refusing to permit him to take his dying wife to New York, as she entreated. In October, 1778, he was banished, went to England, and remained there till the summer of 1785. During his residence abroad he associated with the chief scholars and statesmen of Great Britain. When he returned to this country he was welcomed by his old associates and by people of all parties, and, resuming his profession, was eminently popular and successful. From constant study his eyesight became impaired early in life, and during his later years he was totally blind. He also devoted much time to his law-school, which numbered nearly one hundred pupils annually. Judge Van Schaack was well versed in polite literature as well as legal lore, a fine classical scholar, and a brilliant conversationalist, and his residence at Kinderhook, which is still standing, was the resort of many eminent persons of both England and this country. Columbia gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1778. He published "Laws of the Colony of New York" (2 vols., New York, 1773), and "Conductor Generalis, or the Duty and Authority of Justices, Sheriffs, Constables, etc., Revised and Adapted to the United States" (1788). See his "Life, Journal, Diary, and Letters," edited by his son, Henry C. Van Schaack (1842).—His son, Henry Cruger, lawyer, b. in Kinderhook, N. Y., 3 April, 1802; d. in Manlius, N. Y., 16 Dec., 1887, received an academic education at Hudson and legal instruction from his father, and at twenty-one years of age was admitted to the bar and began practice at Black Rock, near Buffalo. In 1827 he removed to Manlius, N. Y. During his sixty years of professional life Mr. Van Schaack published the life of his father, already referred to, and several pamphlets, including "Henry Cruger," an address read before the New York historical society (New York, 1859); "History of Manlius Village" (Fayetteville, N. Y., 1873); "An Old Kinderhook Mansion" (New York, 1878); and "Captain Thomas Morris" (1882). He was a noted collector of manuscripts, and his collection of autograph letters—including those of most of the heroes and patriots of the Revolution—was one of the most extensive and valuable in the country.

VAN SCHAICK, Gozen, soldier, b. in Albany, N. Y., in January, 1737; d. there, 4 July, 1787. His father, Sybrant, was mayor of Albany in 1756-'61. Gozen was appointed lieutenant in the expedition against Crown Point in 1756, in which the French and Indians were defeated at Sabbath Day Point, became captain in 1758, took part in the expeditions against Fort Frontenac and Fort Niagara, and was appointed major of a New York regiment in 1759. He became lieutenant-colonel of the 1st New York regiment in 1762, participated in the battle of Ticonderoga, and received a severe wound on the cheek from a French musket that led to a cancerous disease of which he finally died. At the beginning of the Revolution he became colonel of the 2d New York regiment, and on 22 Nov., 1775, he was appointed to command the 1st New York battalion. A few weeks later he was sent on an expedition to Cherry Valley to protect the inhabitants from the incursions of the Indian chief, Joseph Brandt, and did good service during this campaign and the subsequent ones. At the battle of Monmouth he acted as brigadier-general under Lord Stirling. In 1779 he was appointed to head a select detachment, with which he destroyed the Onondaga settlements. For that service congress gave him a vote of thanks. He was a rigid disciplinarian, his regiment being one of the best in the service, and his patriotism was freely shown in sacrificing his fortune to the public good.

VANSITTART, Henry, British naval officer, b. in Bisham Abbey, Berkshire, England, in 1779; d. in Woodstock, Canada, in 1844. He entered the navy in 1791, was made a lieutenant in 1794, and assigned to the command of the sloop "Hermes" in 1798. During the ensuing year he was employed in convoying merchant vessels to and from British America, and in 1800 he captured several of the enemy's armed vessels on the Jamaica station, where, in the following year, he obtained post rank in the "Abergavenny," of fifty-four guns. He was engaged in 1803 in blockading the rivers Elbe and Weser, and in February, 1804, sailed for the Jamaica station, where he was actively employed during the succeeding four years. While off Havana, in the summer of 1806, on board his frigate, the "Fortunee," he succeeded, with the aid of an armed schooner, in capturing two Spanish gun-boats and twenty merchant vessels. Among others that the "Fortunee" took during her cruises in the West Indies were the French privateer "Le vautour" and the French armed schooner "Le grand Juge Bertolio." He was afterward employed on channel service and in the Mediterranean, and in October, 1811, captured the famous French privateer "Le Vice-Admiral Martin." He was made a rear-admiral, 22 July, 1830, and vice-admiral, 23 Nov., 1841. In 1834 he removed to Canada, bought an estate near Woodstock, and was instrumental in erecting churches and school-houses.

VAN TWILLER, Wouter, or Walter, governor of New Netherlands, b. in Nieukirk, Holland, about 1580; d. in Amsterdam, Holland, after 1646. He was a clerk in the warehouse of the Dutch West India company, and, having married a niece of Killian Van Rensselaer, was employed by the latter to ship cattle to his colony on Hudson river. Van Twiller made two voyages to this country in that service, and was somewhat acquainted with the geography of New York and the condition of its affairs, so that through Van Rensselaer's influence he was chosen in 1633 by the West India company governor of New Netherlands, sailing for Manhattan in the ship "Soutberg." He was inexperienced in the art of government, slow in speech, incompetent to decide important affairs, and obstinate in minor matters. His chief business seems to have been to maintain the commercial operations of the West India company, but no sooner had he arrived than he was involved in quarrels with the English. In 1632 the Dutch purchased from the Indians lands near what is now Saybrook, Conn., erecting thereon the arms of the states-general, and on 8 July, 1633, the West India company bought the ground on which the city of Hartford now stands, erecting a fort which they called the House of Good Hope, and defending it with two cannon. In October, 1633, the Massachusetts colony laid claim to all the river and country of Connecticut, under the grant of the king of England. Van Twiller wrote a "courteous and respectful letter" to Gov. John Winthrop, requesting that the matter be settled by the home authorities, meanwhile urging that until these proper persons could determine what should be done, the Plymouth colony refrain from settling there. But a few days later one William Holmes, with a resolute crew and a company of Indians who had been the original proprietors of the soil, sailed up the river, and, though threatened by fire from the Dutch cannon, reached the present site of Windsor and erected there the first house that was built in Connecticut. Van Twiller served a process on Holmes as soon as he heard this news, and a few weeks afterward besieged the trading-house with seventy soldiers, but was forced to withdraw and leave the English in peaceable possession. The next year he concluded an advantageous treaty of peace with the Raritan Indians. Meanwhile he spent large sums of money in internal improvements, built a handsome house for his own use and several for the officers of the colony, laid out a cemetery, and changed the name of the town from Manhattan to New Amsterdam. He also bought large tracts of land, including Governor's island and Blackwell's island, stocked them with cattle, and became one of the richest land-owners in the colony. In 1635 a party of colonists from Point Comfort, Va., under command of George Holmes, sailed to the Delaware, with the intention of settling there, but was forced to surrender to the Dutch fort, and sent as prisoners to New Amsterdam. Van Twiller re-shipped them "pack and sack for Point Comfort." He was again unsuccessful the same year with the Massachusetts colony. John Winthrop the younger tore down the arms of the state-general at Saybrook and took possession of the settlement, naming it for Lord Say and Lord Brook, and, although Van Twiller sent a sloop to dislodge them, Winthrop would not suffer them to land. Notwithstanding his losses in Connecticut, the fur-trade increased during the last years of Van Twiller's administration, and the Dutch opened a profitable commerce with New England. His private extravagances, however, induced the vice-director, Lubbertus Van Dincklager, to complain of him to the home authorities, and David De Vries having derided them for the "folly of promoting a fool from a clerkship to a governorship simply to act farces," Van Twiller was removed, and in September, 1637, was succeeded by William Kieft. He returned to Holland, and in 1644 became a guardian to Johannes, the eldest son of the patroon Van Rensselaer and was involved in controversies with the West India company, who described him as an "ungrateful man, who had sucked his wealth from the breasts of the company which he now abuses."

VANUXEM, Lardner, geologist, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 23 July, 1792; d. in Bristol, Pa., 25 Jan., 1848. He was graduated at the École des mines, Paris, in 1819, and soon after his return to the United States was called to fill the chair of chemistry and mineralogy in South Carolina college. In 1826 he retired from the college and devoted his attention exclusively to geology as a profession. During that year he published in the newspapers and in Robert Mills's "Statistics of South Carolina" reports on the geology of the state, and then visited Mexico to examine mining property. In 1827-'8 he studied the geological features of the states of New York, Ohio, Kentucky, Tennessee, and Virginia, under the auspices of the state of New York, and made his report to its legislature. On the establishment of the geological survey of New York in 1836, Prof. Vanuxem was assigned to the charge of the 3d geological district, and continued in the active work of the survey until 1841. The results are given in "Geology of New York, 3d District" (Albany, 1842). At the close of the survey he spent some time in Albany in arranging the state geological cabinet, out of which has grown the New York state museum. Prof. Vanuxem's private collection of mineral and geological specimens was considered at the time of his death as "the largest, best arranged, and most valuable private collection in the country." He was a member of the Philadelphia academy of natural sciences, and of other scientific associations. It was the habit of those connected with the New York survey to meet at Albany at the end of each field season for the purpose of comparing observations and of becoming acquainted with each other. In the autumn of 1838 Prof. Vanuxem suggested that an invitation be given to the geologists of Pennsylvania and Virginia for the purpose of devising and adopting a geological nomenclature that might be acceptable to all those that were then engaged on the state surveys, and thus become the nomenclature of American geology. This meeting was finally held in 1840, and then the Association of American geologists was organized, which is now represented by the American association for the advancement of science, probably the largest scientific body in the world. In addition to the report that has been mentioned, and numerous papers on scientific subjects in the "American Journal of Science," he published "An Essay on the Ultimate Principles of Chemistry, Natural Philosophy, and Physiology" (Philadelphia, 1827).

VAN VALKENBURG, Robert Bruce, congressman, b. in Steuben county, N. Y., 4 Sept., 1821; d. at Suwanee Springs, Fla., 2 Aug., 1888. He received an academic education, adopted the profession of law, and served three terms in the New York assembly. When the civil war opened he was placed in command of the state recruiting depot at Elmira, N. Y., and organized seventeen regiments for the field. He served in congress in 1861-'5, having been chosen as a Republican, and took the field in 1862 as colonel of the 107th regiment of New York volunteers, which he commanded at Antietam. In the 38th congress he was chairman of the committees on the militia, and expenditures in the state department. He was appointed by President Johnson in 1865 acting commissioner of Indian affairs, during the absence of the commissioner, and in 1866-'9 was U. S. minister to Japan. He became a resident of Florida when he returned from that mission, and was chosen associate justice of the state supreme court, which place he held at his death. Judge Van Valkenburg was an able politician and jurist.

VAN VECHTEN, Abraham, lawyer, b. in Catskill, N. Y., 5 Dec., 1762; d. in Albany, N. Y., 6 Jan., 1837. He was educated at Columbia, studied law under John Lansing, and began practice in Johnstown, Montgomery co., N. Y., but soon removed to Albany. He was known as the "father of the New York bar," being the first lawyer admitted to practice after the adoption of the state constitution. Mr. Van Vechten was city recorder in 1797-1808, state senator in 1798-1805, member of the assembly in 1805-'15, attorney-general in 1810 and 1813-'15, and a member of the Constitutional convention in 1821. In 1797-1823 he was a regent of the University of the state of New York. He declined a seat on the supreme bench of the state that was tendered him by Gov. John Jay. He was a learned, eloquent, and successful lawyer, and as a legislator was the author of many laws that have given internal improvements and educational advantages to New York state.—His nephew, Jacob, clergyman, b. in Catskill, N. Y., in 1788; d. in Auburn, N. Y., 15 Sept., 1871, was graduated at Union college in 1809, at the Associate Reformed seminary in 1813, and at New Brunswick theological seminary in 1814. In 1815-'49 he was pastor of the Reformed Dutch church in Schenectady, N. Y. He then retired from the ministry, passing the remainder of his life in intellectual and literary pursuits. He published "Memoirs of Dr. John M. Mason" (2 vols., New York, 1856), and "An Effective Ministry," a sermon (1868).

VAN VLECK, Jacob, Moravian bishop, b. in New York city, 24 March, 1751; d. in Bethlehem, Pa., 3 July, 1831. In 1772 he went to Germany in order to complete his education in the Moravian theological seminary of that country, and he returned after an absence of seven years. He labored among the young men of the church at Bethlehem, and subsequently was appointed secretary of the provincial or governing board. In 1789 he went back to Germany as a delegate to the general synod. On returning in the following year he accepted the principalship of the girls' boarding-school at Bethlehem, which post he resigned when he was appointed senior pastor of the church at the same place. Subsequently he served as pastor at Nazareth, Pa., as principal of the boys' boarding-school, and as pastor of the church at Lititz, Pa. On 7 May, 1815, he was consecrated to the episcopacy at Bethlehem, having been appointed president of the executive board of the southern province. In this office he continued until 1822, when failing health constrained him to retire. He enjoyed universal confidence, and his influence among the young was very great.—His son, William Henry, Moravian bishop, b. in Bethlehem, Pa., 14 Nov., 1790; d. there, 19 Jan., 1853, was one of the three graduates of the first Moravian theological seminary in America. He served with success in the Moravian churches of Philadelphia and New York city, and also as principal of the boys' boarding-school at Nazareth, Pa. He was consecrated to the episcopacy, 20 Nov., 1836, at Bethlehem, and appointed president of the executive board of the southern province and pastor of the church at Salem. In 1848 he attended the general synod that convened at Herrnhut, Saxony, and in the following year resigned the presidency of his district and retired to Bethlehem. Bishop Van Vleck was a graceful and captivating preacher, a wise and gentle ruler, and a man of saintly character. He exercised a great influence.—William Henry's son, Henry Jacob, Moravian bishop, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 29 Jan., 1822, for twenty-five years labored as a teacher in the schools of the church, and in 1864 entered the Moravian ministry. He was consecrated bishop, 18 Sept., 1881, at Bethlehem, Pa., and resides at Gnadenhuetten, Ohio.

VAN VLECK, John Monroe, educator, b. in Stone Ridge, N. Y., 4 March, 1833. He was graduated in 1850 at Wesleyan university, where he entered in the junior year, after studying at the University of the city of New York. In 1850 he taught mathematics in the Providence conference seminary, and in the same year he became an assistant in the nautical almanac office in Cambridge, Mass., where he then remained for three years. He was elected adjunct professor of mathematics in 1853 in Wesleyan university, and since 1858 has held the chair of mathematics and astronomy there. In 1872-'3 and 1887-'9 he was acting president. The degree of LL. D. was conferred on him by Northwestern university in 1876. He was a member of the expedition that was sent out under the auspices of the nautical almanac office to observe the total solar eclipse at Mount Pleasant, Iowa, in 1869. Prof. Van Vleck is a member of the international Astronomische Gesellschaft and a fellow of the American association for the advancement of science. His publications include "Tables giving the Positions of the Moon for 1855-'6," and for 1878-'91, and similar "Tables giving the Positions of Saturn for 1857 to 1877," contributed to the "American Nautical Almanac."

Capt. Van Vliet was in charge of the construction of Fort Laramie, Fort Kearny, and other frontier posts in 1847-'51, was actively employed in fitting out the Utah expedition under Albert Sidney Johnston, and with Gen. William S. Harney at the battle of Blue Water, 3 Sept., 1855, against the Sioux. He was chief quartermaster of the Army of the Potomac with rank of brigadier-general from August, 1861, till July, 1862, and rendered important service in fitting out troops for the field, and accompanied Gen. Y., and an ardent sympathizer with the patriot cause during the Revolution. On 23 Sept., 1780, with John Paulding and David Williams, he intercepted Maj. John André on his return from the American lines. (See PAULDING, JOHN.) For this service he received the thanks of congress, a pension of $200 per annum for life, and a silver medal bearing on one side the word "Fidelity" and on the other the legend "Vincit Amor Patriæ." On 11 June, 1829, the citizens of Westchester county erected a monument to his memory. He was an active member of Greenburg church, and served it as chorister until his death.

VAN ZANDT, Marie, singer, b. in Texas, 8 Oct., 1861. Her mother, Mrs. Jennie Van Zandt, a daughter of Antonio Blitz, was herself a singer of note, and appeared in opera under the direction of Max Maretzek. Marie went with her mother in 1873 to London, where she studied at a convent school. While in that city she met with much encouragement from Adelina Patti, whose style she is said to have copied to a great extent. After studying also a short time with Francesco Lamperti in Milan, she made her début in Turin, in 1879, as Zerlina, and appeared also in "La Sonnambula." She was engaged for Her Majesty's opera company in London in 1880, and in 1881 made her début at the Opéra Comique, Paris, remaining there for four seasons. She is a singer of much promise, and the possessor of a fine voice of great compass.

Montevideo, 20 March, 1848. He studied in the college of his native city, and was graduated in law in 1827 at the university. He was then employed under the secretary of the interior, and took part in the revolution of 1828 under Lavalle, who made him chief clerk of the ministry. In August, 1829, at the fall of Lavalle and the accession of Rosas, whom Varela had opposed, the latter went to Montevideo, where he published some poems and a drama in the magazines. In 1835 he was admitted to the bar of the supreme court of Uruguay, and in April, 1838, he was exiled by order of President Oribe, who accused him of complicity in the revolutionary attempt of Rivera; but he returned in October, after the installation of Rivera as president. In 1840-'2 he sojourned in Brazil on account of his health, and returned in December of the latter year, when the siege of Montevideo had begun. In 1843 he was sent as commissioner of the Montevideo government to England to negotiate the withdrawal of the English blockading forces, and on his return he abandoned his literary studies and entered politics, founding the journal "El Comercio de la Plata," which soon became a powerful instrument of opposition to Rosas and Oribe, and excited the patriotism of the besieged city. It was generally reported that he was assassinated by instigation of Rosas while returning one evening from the press-rooms of his paper to his home. He wrote "Rosas y las Provincias" (Montevideo, 1844), which was translated into French under the title "Affaires de Buenos Ayres" (Paris, 1844); "La Confederación Argentina" (1845); "Proyectos de Monarquía en América" (1846); and "Biblioteca del Comercio de la Plata," a geographical, historical, and political magazine, of which four volumes had appeared at his death. His portrait is engraved on the notes of the provincial bank of Buenos Ayres.—His son, Hector Florencio, journalist, b. in Montevideo in 1832, after the assassination of his father removed his mother and brothers for security to Rio Janeiro, where he labored as a commercial clerk to sustain his family, employing his leisure in acquiring other European languages, and soon became an accomplished linguist. When Urquiza declared war against the dictator Rosas in 1851, Varela returned to Montevideo and founded the "Tribuna," which, under his management and that of his brother, Mariano, soon became one of the most popular newspapers of South America. He became the chief champion of the opposition to Urquiza and of the independence of Buenos Ayres, and took an active though indirect part in the operations that forced Urquiza to raise the siege of Buenos Ayres in July, 1853. He visited Europe in 1854, and was appointed consul-general of Uruguay in Paris, but was refused the exequatur by the French government, on account of his severe criticism of the coup d'état of 2 Dec., 1851, in the columns of "La Tribuna." On his return, and after the accession of Venancio Flores, he was elected to the legislature of Montevideo, and formed part of that general's cabinet. After Flores's resignation, Varela left the cabinet, and when the former was assassinated, 19 Feb., 1863, the latter returned to Buenos Ayres. During the cholera epidemic that desolated that city in 1871 he was one of the first to call a meeting, on 10 March, for the purpose of establishing a health and charitable committee, of which he was appointed vice-president, and when the president, Dr. Roque Perez, succumbed under his arduous duties, Varela assumed the lead and made heroic efforts for the relief of the afflicted. One afternoon, when the grave-diggers fled in the presence of 700 bodies to be buried, he personally, with members of his committee, undertook the task, and did not retire until every coffin was covered. Toward the end of 1871 he made a tour through Chili and other Spanish-American republics to obtain subscriptions for the foundation in Europe of a large journal destined to defend the interests of the Latin-American people, to make their civilization and literature known in Europe, and to acquaint his country with the progress of science in the Old World. He was assisted by the authorities and private persons, and, going to Paris, founded there the journal "El Americano," which soon became widely known and was the means of attracting the interest of European statesmen and merchants toward South America. In 1873 he was appointed minister resident of Guatemala at Paris, and in the next year he began the publication of a series of noteworthy political essays, which were afterward collected in book-form. In 1874 he founded in Turin another journal, "La Italia y El Plata," having the same object as "El Americano." He is a fluent orator and writer, although his speeches as well as his works suffer from verbosity. He is the author of "Revolución de Lima; reseña de los acontecimientos de Julio," with introduction by Emilio Castelar (Paris, 1872); "Pérou devant les pays d'Europe" (1873); "La république de Venezuela et son président Blanco" (1874); "Elisa Lynch"; "Á Alvarez Calderón"; and "Emilio Castelar" (1874).—Another son, Mariano, b. in Montevideo in 1834, assisted his brother on "La Tribuna," and after the latter's departure for Europe continued the journal. In 1869 he was secretary of foreign relations under Sarmiento's administration, and in 1871 was sent as minister plenipotentiary of the Argentine Republic to London, where he negotiated a loan of $30,000,000.—Another son, Juan Cruz, b. in Montevideo in 1843, although occupied in mercantile pursuits, has given much time to literature and travel. He is a contributor to many periodicals, a notable antiquarian, and author of two dramas in verse, "La Pecadora arrepentida" (Buenos Ayres, 1873), and "Facundo," unpublished.—Another son, Luis Vicente, author, b. in Montevideo, 27 May, 1845, studied law, was editor of "El Autonomista" and assistant on "La Tribuna," and is the author of "Estudios sobre la constitución de Buenos Ayres" (Buenos Ayres, 1868); "El Ciego," a drama (1871); "Concordancias y Fundamentos del Código Civil Argentino" (14 vols., 1873-'6); and "Organización del Registro del Estado Civil" (1874).—Florencio's brother, Juan Cruz, journalist, b. in Buenos Ayres in 1794; d. in Montevideo, 15 Jan., 1839, studied in Cordova and Tucuman, and was graduated in the latter city in theology and law in 1816. When in that year the congress of the United Provinces of La Plata met at Tucuman, Varela was elected one of the deputies for Buenos Ayres, and thenceforth abandoned the church for politics. He took an active part in the direction of the papers "El Mensajero Argentino," "El Tiempo," "El Centinela," and "El Porteño," held several public offices, and from 1824 till 1827 was secretary of the National congress. He suffered persecutions for his political opinions after the fall of the government of Rivadavia, and, taking part in the revolution of December, 1828, emigrated to Uruguay, whence he was banished by Oribe, together with other political enemies of Rosas, and returned only after the former's fall. He is the author of the dramas "Dido" (Buenos Ayres, 1823) and "Arjia" (Montevideo, 1834), and left a collection of unpublished patriotic poems, of which the poem celebrating the victory of Ituzaingo, 20 Feb., 1827, is the most famous.—Another brother of Florencio, Rufino, b. in Buenos Ayres in 1801; d. in Quebrachito, 28 Nov., 1840, was banished from Buenos Ayres together with his brothers, and in 1840 followed Gen. Juan Lavalle in his invasion of the Argentine, and fell in the battle of Quebrachito.—Rufino's son, Pedro, b. in Montevideo in 1834, took an active part in the politics of his country, and, after the death of Gen. Venancio Flores, was considered the leader of his party. He was deputy and senator, and as president of the latter body took charge of the executive, 14 Jan., 1875, at Dr. Ellauri's fall. He was then elected constitutional president, but his government was overthrown, 10 March, 1876, and Col. Lorenzo Latorre was his successor.

VARELA Y MORALES, Félix (vah-ray'-lah), Cuban author, b. in Havana in 1788; d. in St. Augustine, Fla., in 1853. He studied in his native city, was graduated in theology in 1810, and became a priest in 1811. He was appointed professor of philosophy in San Carlos seminary, Havana, and afterward of political economy, dividing his time between the duties of the ministry and his labors as a teacher. He discarded completely the old scholastic philosophy and manner of teaching, and introduced the reforms that have changed the science of education in the 19th century. In 1821 he was elected representative for the western province of Cuba to the Spanish cortes, where he demanded political autonomy for Cuba. In 1823, with the end of the liberal régime and the return of absolute government, the cortes was forcibly dissolved; sixty-five of its members were condemned to death, and Varela, to save his life, took refuge with others at Gibraltar. Thence he sailed for New York in December, 1823, where he fixed his residence after visiting the principal cities of the Union. He devoted his time to literary, scientific, and educational pursuits and to the duties of his ministry as a Roman Catholic priest. In 1845 he was appointed vicar-general for New York, and edited a religious magazine with Dr. Constantine Pise. His health obliged him to go to St. Augustine, Fla., in 1849, where he resided from 1852 until his death. Varela's works include "Institutiones Philosophiæ Eclecticæ" (2 vols., Havana, 1812-'13); "Ética" (2 vols., 1814); "Miscelánea filosófica" (1818); "Lecciones de Filosofía" (1819-'20); "Observaciones sobre la Constitución de la Monarquía Española" (1821); "Manual de Práctica Parlamentaria" (New York, 1826); "Máximas Morales y Sociales" (1830); "Cartas á Elpidio sobre la Impiedad, el Fanatismo" (1835); and numerous philosophical and religious pamphlets. Most of these works, especially "Lecciones de Filosofía," have gone through many editions in Cuba, Spain, and the United States. His biography has been written several times, and an exhaustive "Life of Varela" has appeared in Spanish, by Jose Ignacio Rodriguez (New York, 1876).

VARELA Y ULLOA, José (vah-ray'-lah-ee-ool'-ah), Spanish naval officer, b. in Santiago de Galicia, 14 Aug., 1748; d. in Havana, Cuba, 23 July, 1794. He entered the navy in 1759, and afterward became well known in learned circles throughout Europe for his scientific acquirements. In 1776 he was employed in assisting to measure geometrically the peak of Tenerife and in determining the true position of islands and ports on the American and African coasts, among others the island of Santa Catharina in Brazil and the harbors on the Rio de la Plata. After discharging various important commissions, he was selected by the Spanish government to fix the boundaries of the Spanish and Portuguese possessions in America. He gave proof of his abilities as a statesman and philosopher by his exhaustive reports on the productions of the Spanish-American colonies, their situation, relation to neighboring countries, and the advantages that the Spanish government could derive from them. On his return to Spain he was promoted to the rank of rear-admiral. In 1794 he sailed for South America in command of a squadron, and having put in at Havana, on 16 April, was attacked there by the illness of which he died.

VARGAS, José María, Venezuelan president, b. in La Guaira, 2 March, 1786; d. in New York city, 13 July, 1854. He studied in the University of Caracas, where he was graduated in 1806 in philosophy and in 1808 in medicine, and in 1809 he translated Rousseau's "Contrat social," which he circulated privately among his friends for fear of the authorities. Early in 1810 he began the practice of his profession in Cumana, which province sent him as representative to congress, and he arrived in La Guaira just before the earthquake of 26 March, 1812, which destroyed nearly the whole city and killed 4,000 persons. He was the only surviving physician, and his self-sacrifice in saving lives and attending the wounded was acknowledged by the municipality and the national executive. After the capitulation of Miranda in the same year, Vargas was thrown by order of Monteverde into the dungeons of La Guaira; but in 1813 he received permission to emigrate. He continued his studies in the University of Edinburgh, was received as a member of the Royal college of surgeons of London, and travelled for some time through England and France. Afterward he practised his profession for several years in Porto Rico; but he returned in 1825 to Caracas, where in 1826, by order of Bolivar, he reorganized the university and in 1827 was elected its rector. He founded the chairs of anatomy, chemistry, and surgery, and, besides teaching these branches for some time in the university, gave private instruction to the best students at night in his home. In 1830 he was elected by Caracas to the constituent congress of Venezuela and opposed strenuously and with eloquence the proscription of Bolivar and the annexation of the province of Casanare to Venezuela. He was elected a member of the government council, and in 1834 to the presidency of the republic, which he was forced by public clamor to accept after repeated declinations. On 9 Feb., 1835, he took charge of the executive, and during his term he gave his salary as president to hospitals, schools, and other beneficent objects. When a mutiny of the military party, which hated the first civilian president, began in Caracas, 8 July, 1835, Vargas with the vice-president was exiled to St. Thomas; but before leaving he had time to convoke the council and issue a decree appointing Gen. Paez, who was then living in retirement, commander-in-chief for the re-establishment of order. The latter subdued the revolution in a fortnight and recalled Vargas, who administered the executive with strict impartiality; but, weary of political strife, he repeatedly handed in his resignation, which was at last reluctantly accepted by congress, 24 April, 1836. He returned, notwithstanding his shattered health, to his functions in the university and as director of public instruction, from 1838 till 1846 was a member of the senate and almost continuously its president, and in 1847 was appointed to the government council, but resigned in 1849. His anxiety, caused by the uninterrupted internal strife in his country, injured his health, and in 1853 he went to New York, where he died. He left his anatomical collections and physical cabinet, part of his library of 8,000 volumes, and two houses, to the university, the rest of the library to the National library, and his mineral and botanical collections to the National museum of Caracas.

VARGAS-MACHUCA, Bernardo, Spanish soldier, b. in Simancas about 1550; d. in Mexico about 1620. He took part in the wars of Flanders, rose to the rank of captain, and was sent to Mexico, where, according to his own statement, he became commander-in-chief, although his name is not mentioned in the official documents of the time. He is noteworthy as the author of "Milicia Indiana, y Descripción Hidrográfica y Geográfica de las Indias" (Mexico, 1599); "Compendio y Doctrina nueva de la Gineta, secretos y advertencias de ella, señales y enfrenamientos de Caballos, su curación y beneficio" (Madrid, 1619); and "Defensa de las Conquistas de las Indias," of which the original manuscript is in a private library.

VARGAS Y PONCE, Juan José, Spanish geographer, b. in Cadiz in 1755; d. in Madrid in 1821. He entered the navy, was ordered in 1783 to assist Vicente Tofiño in the publication of the great atlas of the coast of Spain, and wrote a remarkable introduction to that work. Vargas was attached afterward to the colonial department, prepared the instructions for the scientific expeditions that were sent to America between 1789 and 1820, and was elected in the latter year a member of the constituent cortes. His works include "Descripción de las islas Pytiusas y Baleares" (Madrid, 1787), and "An Account of the Last Expedition to the Strait of Magellan made by the Frigate 'La Santa María de la Cabeza'" (Spanish edition, 1788; English translation, London, 1788). Among his manuscripts, in the National library at Madrid, are "Descripción estadística de la provincia de Guipuzcoa," "Descripción estadística de la isla de Cuba," and "Historia de la isla de Santo Domingo."

VARICK, Richard, soldier, b. in Hackensack, N. J., 25 March, 1753; d. in Jersey City, N. J., 30 July, 1831. The family name was originally Van Varick. He studied law and was practising in

New York city, when, at the opening of the Revolution, he became a captain in Alexander McDougall's regiment. He afterward became military secretary to General Philip Schuyler, and on the latter's recommendation was appointed by congress deputy muster-master-general, 25 Sept., 1776, to which post the rank of lieutenant-colonel was attached on 10 April, 1777. He remained with the northern army till the muster department was abolished after the capture of Burgoyne, and was present at the battles of Stillwater and Saratoga. He was inspector-general at West Point after 1780, and first aide-de-camp to Gen. Benedict Arnold, whom he greatly admired as a soldier. It is said that when Arnold's defection was made known, Col. Varick was almost insane for several days.

With Col. Franks, the second aide, he was examined by a court of inquiry, which exonerated both from suspicion of the least complicity in the treason. Shortly afterward he became a member of Washington's military family, acting as his recording secretary till near the close of the war, and taking charge of his confidential papers. From the evacuation of New York by the British in 1783 till 1789 he was recorder of that city. In the latter year he became attorney-general of the state, and from 1791 till 1801 he was mayor of New York. In 1786 he and Samuel Jones were appointed revisers of the state laws, and they published the result of their labors in a volume (1789). On the organization of the state militia he was made colonel of one of the regiments. Col. Varick was speaker of the assembly in 1787, for many years president of the Merchants' bank, and a founder and liberal benefactor of the American Bible society, of which he was president from the resignation of John Jay till his death. He was more than six feet high, and of imposing presence, and has a fine monument in his native place.

VARICK, Theodore Romeyn, physician, b. in Dutchess county, N. Y., 24 June, 1825; d. in Jersey City, N. J., 23 Nov., 1887. He was graduated at the medical department of New York university in 1846, and, after practising for two years in New York, removed in 1848 to Jersey City, where he resided until his death. He made many valuable additions to professional knowledge, and was widely known as a surgeon. He was the first to prove the usefulness of cocaine in capital amputations, and he introduced into the United States Trendelenberg's method of amputating at the hip-joint. Being dissatisfied with the results of the Lister method of dressing open wounds, he perfected a system for the employment of hot water in surgery, and thereby secured the largest percentage of successful operations known, but three deaths resulting from fifty-four capital amputations. He also was the first to use hot water to control oozing in laparotomy. Dr. Varick was an incorporator of the District medical society of Hudson county, president of the New Jersey state medical society, surgeon-general of New Jersey, president of the New York medical society, director of Morris Plains hospital for the insane, director of St. Francis's hospital, surgeon of Jersey City hospital, and a member of various medical societies. Among the published records of his cases are monographs on "Urticaria produced by Hydrocyanic Acid," "Complete Luxation of the Radius and Ulna to the Radial Side," "Subperiosteal Resection of the Clavicle," "Distal Compression in Inguinal Aneurism," "The Causes of Death after Operations and Grave Injuries," "The Use of Hot Water in Surgery," "The Protective Treatment of Open Wounds," and "Railroad Injuries of the Extremities of the Human Body."

VARLET, Domingue Marie, French missionary, b. in France in 1678; d. in Utrecht, Holland, in 1742. He was ordained a priest in 1706, and about 1712 was appointed superior of the priests in the valley of the Mississippi by the directors of the Seminary of foreign missions of Paris. After his arrival in Canada he was named vicar-general, especially for Fort La Mobile and Fort Louis, by Bishop Saint Vallier, of Quebec, with jurisdiction over all priests along Mississippi river except Jesuits. He spent six years on this mission, visiting the country from Cahokia to the Gulf. He returned to Europe in 1718, and was appointed bishop of Ascalon and coadjutor to the bishop of Babylon. When he was on his way to the East, intelligence was brought to the pope that he was an adherent of the doctrines of Jansenius. He was at once ordered to return to Rome; but, instead of doing so, he went to Utrecht and was one of the principal agents in founding the Jansenist church of that city. He consecrated four archbishops of the Jansenist church in succession, and was several times excommunicated by the pope.

VARNHAGEN, Francisco Adolpho de, Brazilian historian, b. in San João de Ypanema in 1816. He acquired his primary education in Rio Janeiro and went to Portugal to study in the University of Coimbra. When the ex-emperor of Brazil, Pedro I., was trying to re-establish the government of his daughter, Maria da Gloria, in 1834, Varnhagen enlisted in the constitutional army, and afterward re-entered college and completed his career as a military engineer in 1840, when he devoted himself to poetry and literature. He was appointed secretary of legation in Madrid, with the commission to revise the documents in the government archives concerning the boundaries of the empire of Brazil. In 1859 he returned to South America and was appointed minister-resident to the republic of Paraguay; but, on account of the despotic government of the dictator Lopez, he resigned his post and was commissioned to travel through Venezuela, New Granada, Ecuador, and the Antilles, and report on the agricultural progress of those countries. He executed this commission satisfactorily, presenting reports on coffee, sugar, and tobacco. Soon afterward, as minister of Brazil to Chili and Peru, he protested against the hostile attitude of the Spanish government toward the republics of the Pacific. While in Lima he began to investigate documents about Amerigo Vespucci, among which there is a letter from Peter Martyr to Columbus, in which he says that the Bay of Honduras had been visited before by others, thereby confirming Oviedo's assertion in his "Historia de las Indias." He was sent to Vienna in 1868 as minister-resident, promoted plenipotentiary in 1871, and created in 1874 Viscount of Porto Seguro and member of the imperial council, continuing in Vienna till 1878, when he returned to Brazil. He writes equally well in French, German, and Italian as in his own language, and is the author of "Noticias do Brazil," printed by the Royal academy of science of Lisbon (1852); "Trovae Cantares" (Lisbon, 1853); "Historia geral do Brazil," to the revolution against Portugal (2 vols., 1854-'8); "Os Indios bravos e o Sr. Lisboa" (Lima, 1867); "Le premier voyage de Amerigo Vespucci, définitivement expliqué dans ses détails" (Vienna, 1869); "Das wahre Guanahani des Columbus" (1869); "Sull' importanza d'un manoscritto inedito della Biblioteca imperiale di Vienna per verificare, quale fu la prima isola scoperta del Colombo, ed anche altri punti della Storia della America" (1869); "Nouvelles Recherches sur les derniers voyages du navigateur Florentin, et le reste des documents et éclaircissements sur lui, avec les textes dans les langues originelles," with a facsimile of Ptolemy's chart of 1513 (1871); and "L'origine Touranienne des Américains Tupis-Caribes, et des anciens Egyptiens, indiquée principalement par la philologie comparée; traces d'une ancienne migration en Amérique, invasion du Brésil par les Tupis, etc." (1876).

VARNUM, James Mitchell, soldier, b. in Dracut, Mass., 17 Dec., 1748; d. in Marietta, Ohio, 10 Jan., 1789. His great-grandfather came to Massachusetts about 1634. James was graduated at Brown in 1769, admitted to the bar in 1771, and settled in East Greenwich, R. I., where he practised his profession. In 1774 he became colonel of the Kentish guards, and at the beginning of the Revolutionary war he was commissioned as colonel of the 1st Rhode Island infantry, 8 May, 1775, and was present with his regiment at the shelling of Roxbury, Mass., the siege of Boston, the action at Harlem Heights, and the battle of White Plains. He was specially recommended for retention in the army on its rearrangement for the war, was appointed brigadier-general of Rhode Island troops, 12 Dec., 1776, and to the same rank in the Continental army, 12 Feb., 1777, and took part with his brigade in numerous engagements, including that at

J. Varnum

Red Bank, where he commanded all the American troops on the Jersey side of the Delaware. He rendered valuable services in the defence of the forts on the Delaware, was at Valley Forge in the winter of 1778, and afterward took an active part at the battle of Rhode Island. In 1778 he advocated the raising of a battalion of negroes in Rhode Island, and at his instance the legislature passed an act offering freedom to all slaves that should enlist in the army. He resigned his commission and was honorably discharged, 5 March, 1779, and resumed the practice of his profession at East Greenwich, where he speedily attained the first rank as a lawyer, took part in most of the chief cases in Rhode Island, and was recognized as a polished and eloquent orator. He was major-general of the Rhode Island militia from 1779 till 1788, and in that capacity was in the service of the United States in July and August, 1780, under the Comte de Rochambeau. He was a member of the Continental congress from Rhode Island in 1780-'2 and 1786-'7, and was there recognized by his colleagues as "a man of uncommon talents and most brilliant eloquence." In October, 1787, he was appointed by congress one of the judges of the Northwest territory, and removed to Marietta, Ohio, in June, 1788. He was an original member of the Society of the Cincinnati, and second president of the Rhode Island society of that order. —His brother, Joseph Bradley, senator, b. in Dracut, Mass., 29 Jan., 1750; d. there, 21 Sept., 1821, at the age of eighteen was commissioned captain by the committee of the colony of Massachusetts bay, and in 1787 colonel by the commonwealth of Massachusetts. He was made brigadier-general in 1802, and in 1805 major-general of the state militia, holding the latter office at his death in 1821. From 1780 till 1795 he was a member of the house of representatives and senate of Massachusetts, and in 1787 and 1795 he served as a member of the governor's council. From 1795 till 1811 he was a member of the National house of representatives, during which time he was chosen speaker two terms, from 1807 till 1811, being the immediate predecessor of Henry Clay. From 1811 till 1817 he was U. S. senator from Massachusetts, being elected in opposition to Timothy Pickering, and he was president pro tempore of the senate and acting vice-president of the United States from 6 Dec., 1813, till 17 April, 1814. He was a member of the State convention to ratify the constitution of the United States in 1787, and that of 1820 to revise the constitution of Massachusetts, acting as the presiding officer in the absence of President John Adams and Chief-Justice Parker. In 1813 he was a candidate for governor of Massachusetts against Caleb Strong, the incumbent of that office, but was defeated. Gen. Varnum was among the earliest patriots of the Revolution, having raised and commanded as captain a company of minute-men from his native town, which participated in engagements in Rhode Island and New York. For his assistance in putting down Shays's rebellion in 1787 he received a personal letter of thanks from Gen. Benjamin Lincoln, commanding the state forces. Henry Wilson, in his "History of Slavery," quotes him in the debate on the bill for the government of the Mississippi territory before the house in March, 1798, as having been very strong and outspoken in his opposition to negro servitude. In politics, unlike his brother, Gen. James M. Varnum, who was a Federalist, he was a Democrat, and a strong and consistent supporter of the administration of Thomas Jefferson. After his retirement in 1817 from congress he was again chosen to represent his district in the legislature, and when he died he was the senior member of the senate of Massachusetts. Among the portraits of the speakers of the National house of representatives at the capitol in Washington there is a fine oil-painting of Gen. Varnum by Charles L. Elliott, a gift from the state of Massachusetts.—A grandson of Joseph B., Joseph Bradley, lawyer, b. in Washington, D. C., 9 June, 1818; d. in Astoria, N. Y., 31 Dec., 1874, was graduated at Yale in 1838, studied law at Yale and with Roger B. Taney in Baltimore, Md., and after admission to the bar practised in that city for several years. He then removed to New York city and acquired a large practice. He was a member of the New York legislature from 1849 till 1851, being chosen speaker of the assembly for the latter year. In 1852 he was the Whig candidate for congress in his district. He was a member of the assembly again in 1857. In 1871 he took an active part in the agitation against corruption in the government of New York city. He was a contributor to magazines and newspapers, and published in book-form "The Seat of Government of the United States" (New York, 1848) and "The Washington Sketch-Book."

VARONA, Enrique José (vah-ro'-nah), Cuban author, b. in Puerto Principe, Cuba, in 1849. He received his education in his native city and began his literary career in 1864 as a contributor to reviews. In 1874 he fixed his residence in Havana, dividing his time between teaching and journalism. In 1885 he was elected representative for Puerto Principe in the Spanish cortes. In 1885 he founded the "Revista Cubana," a literary, scientific, and philosophical review, which is considered one of the best in the Spanish language. His works include "Odas Anacreónticas" (Puerto Principe, 1868); "Poesías" (Havana, 1878); "Paisajes Cubanos" (1819); "Conferencias filosóficas; Lógica" (1880); "Conferencias filosóficas; Psicología" (1881); "Estudios Literarios y filosóficos" (1883); and "Seis Conferencias" (Barcelona, 1887). His "Lógica" has been translated into French.

VARRICK, James, A. M. E. Zion bishop, b. near Newburg, N. Y., about 1760; d. in 1836. He with eight other members of the Methodist church obtained permission from Bishop Francis Asbury to hold separate meetings for his race. They met in a shop in New York city for three years, and in 1800 the society was incorporated under the name of the African Methodist Episcopal Zion church, their first church being completed the same year. This was the origin of Zion church in this country, of which James Varrick was one of the earliest trustees. In 1820 he was elected one of the first two elders of the church, in the following year chairman of the New York conference district, and in 1822 he was made the first superintendent or bishop, his term of service expiring in 1828.

VASCONCELLOS, Andres de (vas-cone-thayl'-los), Portuguese navigator, b. in Yelves about the end of the 15th century; d. in Portugal in the first half of the 16th century. He was an expert mariner, and sailed in 1538 in the expedition of Hernando de Soto as captain of the "Buena Fortuna." After the landing of Soto at Tampa, Vasconcellos explored the coast as far as the bay of Appalachee, where he landed the rest of his stores, and when Soto went into winter-quarters in 1539, Vasconcellos sailed around the coast of Florida, taking astronomical observations, and landing often to explore the country. On his return to Appalachee, he found the adelantado gone, sailed for Cuba, and thence for Europe, where he wrote an account of his voyage, with accurate details about the formation of the coast and astronomical observations on the position and distance of many points, giving also an interesting description of the fruits, birds, and quadrupeds of the country. His work "Relação da viagem do almirante Dom Hernando de Soto, descripção da provincia da Florida" is preserved in the original manuscript in the library of the Duke de Sesa. An anonymous translation was published in French under the title "Histoire de la Floride par le sieur André de Vasconcellos" (Paris, 1685), and there is a Spanish translation entitled "Historia de la Florida del Hidalgo de Yelves" (Seville, 1545).

VASCONCELLOS, Simon, Portuguese historian, b. in Coimbra in 1599; d. in the province of São Paulo, Brazil, in 1670. He early became a Jesuit, was attached for about forty years to the Brazilian missions, founded several convents in the country, and became assistant visitor of the order. He wrote three valuable works, "Cronica de la Compañia de Jesu en el Brazil" (Lisbon, 1663); "Vida de João Almeydo" (1665); and "Vida de Jose Anchieta" (1666); and left several interesting manuscripts, which are preserved in the Brazilian state archives.

VASEY, George, botanist, b. near Scarborough, Yorkshire, England, 28 Feb., 1822. He came to this country when a child, and was graduated at Berkshire medical college, Pittsfield, Mass., in 1848. Settling in the practice of his profession in Illinois, he continued it for twenty years. In April, 1872, he was appointed botanist to the department of agriculture in Washington. His published works, issued under government auspices, include "A Descriptive Catalogue of the Native Forest Trees of the United States" (Washington, 1876); "The Grasses of the United States, a Synopsis of the Tribes, with Descriptions of the Genera" (1883); "The Agricultural Grasses of the United States" (1884); "A Descriptive Catalogue of the Grasses of the United States" (1885); "Report of an Investigation of the Grasses of the Arid Districts" (2 parts, 1886-'7); and "Grasses of the South" (1887).

VASQUEZ, Francisco (vas'-kayth), Central American historian, b. in Guatemala about 1600;

d. there about 1660. He entered the Franciscan order and was attached to the missions in Chiapa, where he labored with great success for about twenty-five years, founded several missions, became chronicler of his order, and established the Franciscan province of Nicaragua. He left a valuable manuscript, "Crónica de la provincia del Santísimo Nombre de Jesus, del orden de San Francisco de Guatemala, y de las misiones en la provincia de Chiapa" (2 vols., Guatemala, 1714 and 1716), in which he recounts the entrance of the Spaniards into Guatemala, narrates the stages of the conquest, and gives valuable information about the foundation of Chiapa, and concerning the missionaries that wrote in the aboriginal languages of Guatemala and Chiapa.

VASQUEZ, Francisco Pablo, Mexican R. C. bishop, b. in Atlitico in 1769; d. in Cholula in 1847. He was educated in the Palafoxiano seminary of Puebla, where he studied philosophy, and in 1788 was graduated at the University of Mexico, where he obtained in 1789 the chair of philosophy. He was given the degree of doctor in theology in 1795, appointed to the parish of San Geronimo Coatepec, and made secretary of the diocese of Puebla. In 1818 he was elected canon of the cathedral, and in 1825 the government appointed him minister to the pope, to obtain the recognition of the republic and arrange a convention. He sailed for London, and afterward went to Paris, and in December, 1828, received new instructions in Florence. His negotiations with Pius VIII., and afterward with Gregory XVI., ended in a satisfactory treaty between the apostolic see and the government of the republic. He was consecrated bishop of Puebla in Rome by Cardinal Odescalchi in March, 1831, and returned to Mexico. He founded the correctional asylum for women, improved the hospital, and favored all the charitable institutions of Puebla. He translated Clavigero's "Storia Antica del Messico" and Voltaire's "Lettres de quelques juifs Allemands et Polonais" into Spanish (Mexico, 1842).

VASSAR, Matthew, philanthropist, b. in the parish of Tuddenham, Norfolk, England, 29 April, 1792; d. in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., 23 June, 1868. His father, James Vassar, of French ancestry, who was a dissenter of the Baptist communion, emigrated with his wife and children and an unmarried brother, Thomas, to this country. He reached New York in 1796, and, after spending a few months in exploring the country, settled in the spring of 1797 on a farm in the neighborhood of Poughkeepsie. Here the Vassar family, having brought the art with them from England, began the brewing of ale first for their own consumption and then to meet the demands of their neighbors. These demands grew so rapidly that in 1801 James Vassar removed to Poughkeepsie and there conducted the brewing business on an extensive scale. His son, Matthew, finally succeeded to this business, and in it acquired the large fortune that he ultimately devoted mainly to the higher education of women. In 1845, after many years of diligent and prosperous labor, he visited Europe and spent nearly twelve months in travelling over Great Britain, Ireland, and the continent. Having no children, he was already meditating as to the manner in which he should dispose of his fortune so as best to promote the welfare of society. Circumstances finally determined him to erect and endow a college for young women which should be to their sex what Harvard and Yale were to young men. In the execution of this purpose Mr. Vassar was a pioneer in a field that now abounds in imitators. In January, 1861, he obtained from the legislature an act to incorporate Vassar college, and in February following, at a meeting of the board of trustees which he selected, he transferred to their custody the sum of $400,000. At his death this was increased by the bequests of his will to more than $800,000. In the earlier years of his career Mr. Vassar gave much to various charities. A handsome house of worship for the Baptist church of Poughkeepsie, to which he was warmly attached, was built mainly by his contributions. His death occurred suddenly on commencement-day while he was engaged in reading his annual address to the trustees.—His nephew, Matthew, philanthropist, son of John Guy Vassar, b. in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., 11 May, 1809; d. there, 10 Aug., 1881. At the age of twenty-two he accepted a partnership in his uncle's brewing business, and laid the foundation of a large fortune. Though his early education was limited, he became a well-informed man of sound judgment, positive convictions, and resolute energy, and exerted a commanding influence in the community in which he lived. He was active in various local institutions and charities, but rendered especially valuable service in his care of the college that his uncle had founded. He was one of its original trustees, and its treasurer until the time of his death, devoting, without salary, to the duties of this office and the general interests of the college several hours of each day for sixteen years. He endowed two professorships that bear his name in Vassar college, contributing for this purpose $100,000, and also bequeathed to the college $50,000 as a beneficiary fund. In conjunction with his brother, John Guy, he built and equipped the Vassar brothers' laboratory connected with the college at a cost of $20,000. In the city of Poughkeepsie he and his brother erected and endowed the Vassar brothers' home for aged men, the Vassar brothers' scientific and literary institute, and the Vassar brothers' hospital, of which the last named was completed after his death. His various benefactions amounted to about $500,000. By his exertions a branch of the New York society for the prevention of cruelty to animals was established in Poughkeepsie, and he became its president. He also gave much to the Baptist church of Poughkeepsie, of which he was a life-long member.—The second Matthew's brother, John Guy, philanthropist, b. in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., 15 June, 1811; d. there, 27 Oct., 1888, was early associated with his uncle in the brewing business, and shared its prosperity. Infirm health prevented his steady application to business, and he spent thirty years abroad, during which he travelled over a large part of the globe. He gave an account of these travels in a published volume entitled "Twenty Years Around the World" (1861). He is one of the original trustees of Vassar college, being selected for that position by its founder. Besides his joint benefactions with his brother, which are recorded above, he has made a conditional gift of $20,000 to the college that bears the family name. His later years have been earnestly devoted to the completion and equipment of the Vassar brothers' hospital. — The first Matthew's cousin, John Ellison, lay preacher, b. near Poughkeepsie, N. Y., 13 Jan., 1813; d. in Poughkeepsie, 6 Dec., 1878, was the son of Thomas Vassar. In early life he was employed in the brewery of Matthew Vassar, but, having become a religious man of very earnest convictions, he left the service of his cousin and devoted his entire life to self-sacrificing labors for the good of others. He was employed in 1850 by the American tract society as a colporteur, his first missionary work being in Illinois and other western states. Subsequently New York and New England were his field of service. During the civil war he was at the front, engaged in religious labors of all kinds among the soldiers. Just before the battle of Gettysburg he was captured by Gen. James E. B. Stuart's cavalry, who were glad to let him go to escape his importunate exhortations and prayers. At the conclusion of the war he visited, in the service of the Tract society, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Florida. Few men of his day travelled more extensively or were more widely known than "Uncle John Vassar," as he was everywhere called. His extraordinary mental gifts, in connection with his zeal, made him a lay preacher that was rarely equalled. An account of his life has been published by the Rev. Thomas E. Vassar (New York, 1879). — John Ellison's nephew, Thomas Edwin, clergyman, b. in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., 3 Dec., 1834, is son of William Vassar. His plans for entering college were frustrated by family misfortunes, and he was ordained to the Baptist ministry in 1857, without the advantages of a formal education. He has been successively settled as pastor at Amenia, N. Y., Lynn, Mass., Flemington, N. J., and Newark, N. J., and is now in Kansas City, Mo. He was for one year chaplain of the 150th New York regiment, and was at several battles, including Gettysburg. He is the author of a memoir of his cousin, John Ellison Vassar, entitled "Uncle John Vassar" (New York, 1879), of which about 20,000 copies have been sold in America and England. He has received the degree of D. D.

Matthew Vassar

VATRY, Marc Antoine Bourdon (vah-tree), Baron de, French statesman, b. in Saint-Maur, near Paris, 21 Nov., 1761; d. in Paris, 22 April, 1828. He was secretary to Count De Grasse in 1780-'2, was at Yorktown, and wrote for the admiralty an account of the naval operations in the Gulf of Mexico and on the coast of North America. After the battle of Dominica, 12 April, 1782, in which he was wounded and where Count De Grasse was made a prisoner, he became secretary of Marquis Louis Philippe de Vaudreuil, who succeeded De Grasse in the command of the French forces. He was charged with the embarkation at Boston of Rochambeau's army for Santo Domingo, and when peace was concluded in 1783 he was appointed chief of the colonial bureau in the navy department. He was employed later at Antwerp, was secretary of the navy in 1798-1800, and was then named minister to the United States. By a subsequent decree he was appointed commissary-general of the Low Countries, and a few months later transferred to Havre as maritime prefect. He opposed the expedition of Gen. Lélere to Santo Domingo, of which he foresaw the consequences, and it is said that Bonaparte answered his objections and those of the engineer Fairfait with the significant words: "I want to get rid of the 60,000 republican soldiers of Moreau's army." During his administration as prefect of Avignon and afterward of Genoa he built several monuments, constructed bridges and dams, and opened high-roads. He became under-secretary of the navy and colonies in 1814, and retired to private life after the second restoration of Louis XVIII. in 1815. His works include "Exposé des opérations de l'armée navale du Comte de Grasse de 1780 à 1782" (Paris, 1785).

VATTEMARE, Alexandre, founder of the system of international exchanges, b. in Paris, 8 Nov., 1796; d. there, 7 April, 1864. He became a surgeon, and in 1814 was sent to conduct Prussian prisoners of war to Berlin. Afterward, being without resources, he became a professional ventriloquist, and under the name of Monsieur Alexandre was well known throughout Europe and appeared as such in this country. Subsequently he gave up this occupation to urge the adoption of his system of commercial exchanges. At first this aimed simply at a systematic exchange of duplicates between libraries, especially of government publications, but he afterward extended it to include art-objects, maps, specimens of natural history, and other similar articles. He came to this country in 1839 and again in 1847, and was granted money by congress and by the legislatures of several states to further his scheme, which met with more success here than in Europe. His manners were captivating, and in his addresses he indulged in the most extravagant flattery of the United States, promising that by his exertions "the veil of ignorance which shuts out your country from view will fall and she will stand in the eyes of Europe in her true dignity and glory." He also held out the prospect that "a rattlesnake or a lizard may procure a copy of the Venus de Medicis." He was the means of adding 300,000 volumes to the libraries of this country; but he lacked judgment and system, and his scheme was ultimately a failure. His plan of establishing a government bureau in Paris in connection with it was not regarded with favor, and he died a disappointed man. — His son, HIPPOLYTE, who has contributed to current literature in France, notably a series of biographical sketches of American soldiers in the "Revue contemporaine," has unsuccessfully endeavored to revive his father's project.

VAUBLANC, Vincent Marie Viénot (vo-blóng), Count de, West Indian statesman, b. in Fort Dauphin, Hayti, 2 March, 1756; d. in Paris, France, 21 Aug., 1845. He received his education at the military school of La Flèche in France in 1770-'4, and entered the army as lieutenant in the "La Sarre" regiment. From 1776 till 1782 he served in Santo Domingo, but he resigned in the latter year, was returned to the legislative assembly in 1791, elected its president on 14 Nov., and in 1792 defended at the bar of the assembly Count de Rochambeau, and secured his acquittal by recalling the services that he had performed in the United States. He strongly favored the motion for the enfranchisement of the slaves in the French colonies in America, and defending at the tribune the conclusions of the commission, secured on 9 April, 1792, the passage of the law to that effect. In 1796, as a member of the council of five hundred, he assailed the colonial administration, and secured the recall of Félicité Sonthonax from Santo Domingo. Being outlawed after the coup d'état of 4 Sept., 1797, he went to Italy, and, after his return to France in 1799, became a member of the corps législatif in 1800, and its president in 1804. In 1805 he was appointed prefect of the department of Moselle, and in 1813 he was made a count of the empire. Under Louis XVIII. he was councillor of state, and secretary of the interior in the Richelieu cabinet from 24 Sept., 1815, till 8 May, 1816. In 1820 he was returned as a deputy by the department of Calvados, and from 1820 till 1830 he was delegate of the colony of Guadeloupe to the king. He urged the establishment of a maritime entrepôt in the Antilles, and also advocated several changes in the judiciary and administration of the colonies. After the accession of Louis Philippe to the throne of France in 1830, he retired to private life. His works include "Du commerce maritime considéré sous le rapport des colonies" (1828); "Mémoires et souvenirs" (2 vols., 1839); and "De la navigation des colonies" (1843).

VAUDREUIL, Philippe de Rigaud, Marquis de, governor of Canada, b. in the castle of Vaudreuil, near Castelnaudary, France, in 1640; d. in Quebec, 11 Oct., 1725. He was a brigadier-general in the French army, and distinguished himself at the siege of Valenciennes. He was sent to Canada as commander of the forces, and was then known as Chevalier de Vaudreuil. With 300 men he went to the relief of Montreal during the massacre of Lachine, and served under Frontenac in his expedition against the Iroquois. He was engaged in 1690 in the defence of Quebec against the attack of Admiral Phipps, and in 1693 surprised and defeated La Chaudière Noire, the most astute and terrible of the Iroquois chiefs. In 1702 he obtained a seignior, and was appointed governor of Montreal, and in 1703 he became governor of Canada as successor to M. de Callières. In 1710 he engaged in the defence of Quebec, and at the same time made preparations for the relief of Montreal. After Louis XV. became king, Vaudreuil effected many reforms in the colony, and his measures, civil or military, were usually successful.—His eldest son, Louis Philippe de Rigaud, Marquis de, French naval officer, b. in Quebec, Canada, in 1691; d. in Rochefort, France, 27 Nov., 1763, entering the Canadian militia at the age of sixteen, rose rapidly in the service, and held the rank of major at the death of his father. He then returned to France, joined the navy as lieutenant, and was again employed in Canada for several years. In 1738 he was post-captain and commanded the navy in Canada. During the war for the succession of Austria he fought at Cape Breton, and for his valor at the battle off Cape Finisterre, 25 Oct., 1747, was promoted chef d'escadre. Louis XV. caused Carl Van Loo to paint a picture that represented Vaudreuil disengaging the flagship when it was surrounded by superior forces, and a copy was presented to the officer, while the original is still preserved in the museum at Versailles. He was promoted lieutenant-general in 1753, fought with credit in the seven years' war, defended Marie-Galante in the West Indies against the English, and was governor of Santo Domingo in 1761-'2.—Another son, Pierre François, Marquis de Vaudreuil-Cavagnal, governor of Canada, b. in Quebec in 1698; d. in Paris, France 20 Oct., 1765, founded the branch of Vaudreuil-Cavagnal, and was first known as Chevalier de Cavagnal. He entered the military service, and attained the rank of major in the marine corps. In 1733 he was appointed governor of Three Rivers, and in 1742 of Louisiana, in which capacities he gained great popularity. In 1755 he was appointed governor of Canada. His relations with Montcalm, commander of the troops in Canada, were unfriendly, and this lack of harmony between the highest civil and military authorities in the colony doubtless tended to hasten the end of French power in North America. In September, 1759, the British defeated Montcalm and captured Quebec, and in the spring of 1760 Vaudreuil capitulated to Gen. Amherst at Montreal. Gen. Lévis, who was in command of the troops at Montreal at the time of the surrender, opposed the capitulation; but opposition was useless. Such, however, was not the view that was taken of the capitulation and of some other of Vaudreuil's official actions by the home authorities, and on his return to France he was imprisoned in the Bastille on charges preferred by friends of Montcalm. He was afterward tried before the Châtelet de Paris, the result being that the allegations were shown to be baseless, and he was absolved from all blame in his administration of the affairs of Canada. He was consequently released from imprisonment, but with the loss of nearly all his money and property.—Another son, Pierre François de Rigaud, Chevalier de Vaudreuil, b. in Quebec in 1704; d. in Versailles, France, in 1772, was a brave and capable officer. He took Fort Massachusetts from the British, gained a victory over Col. Parker on Lake St. Sacrement, sunk twenty bateaux, and took five officers and 160 men prisoners. He visited France, prevailed on the government to despatch Montcalm, Lévis, Bourlamaque, and Bougainville to Canada, and assembled at St. John the army that subsequently besieged the forts at Oswego and Ontario, and made the last attempt to detach the Iroquois from the British in 1757. He was successively lieutenant-governor of Quebec, and governor of Three Rivers and Montreal.—Louis Philippe's son, Louis Philippe de Rigaud, Marquis de Vaudreuil, naval officer, b. in Quebec, 28 Oct., 1724; d. in Paris, France, 14 Dec., 1802, entered the navy as midshipman in 1740, and rose rapidly in the service, being promoted ensign in 1747 and captain in 1754. On 19 May, 1759, he fought a brilliant engagement with the English, and was made Knight of St. Louis. He was promoted post captain, administered the government of the island La Désirade, in the West Indies, in 1765-'8, was made brigadier of the naval forces in 1773, and chef d'escadre early in 1777. He commanded a division under Count d'Orvilliers at the battle of Ouessant, 27 July, 1778, and in December, 1778, took charge at Brest of a squadron of two ships of the line, two frigates, and three corvettes. After storming Fort St. Louis, in Senegal, and securing rich prizes on the African coast, he conveyed troops to Martinique and Santo Domingo, and, joining Count d'Estaing's army, participated in the capture of Grenada and in the attack on St. Lucia. He assisted also in the siege of Savannah in 1779, and assumed command of the fleet when the admiral led the French columns to the assault. Returning to Brest toward the close of the year, he escorted a convoy of troops to Santo Domingo in February, 1780, escaping by skilful manœuvring the superior fleet of Admiral Kempenfelt, and brought safely several prizes to Fort Roval, Martinique. Joining Count de Guichen's fleet, he commanded the first division at the engagements with the English in the channel of Dominica on 17 April and 15 and 19 May, 1780, which resulted in a victory for the French. In July following he was given the grand cross of St. Louis and made governor of Santo Domingo, but he soon resigned, as he preferred active service at sea, and took command of a division in Count de Grasse's fleet, assisting in the engagement with Admiral Graves in Chesapeake bay and in the siege of Yorktown. At the battle in the channel of the Saintes islands, 12 April, 1782, he escorted the convoy that was destined to attack Jamaica, but was unable to take part in the action. Count de Grasse attributing his capture to Vaudreuil, the latter was court-martialed at Lorient in March, 1784: but the finding of the court, 21 May, 1784, was that "Vaudreuil's conduct during all the circumstances of the battle deserved nothing but praise." He was promoted lieutenant-general, 14 Aug., 1782, and in December following carried Rochambeau's army from Boston and Providence to Santo Domingo. He was elected to the states-general in 1789 by the nobility of Castelnau-dary, served as a member on the naval committee of the assembly, and during the night of 5 to 6 Oct., 1789, forcing an entrance in the palace of Versailles with a few officers, protected the royal family from outrage and kept the mob at bay till the arrival of succor. In 1791 he emigrated to London, but he returned to Paris in 1800, and was granted by Napoleon Bonaparte a pension on the retired list of the navy.—Philippe's grandson, Jean François de Rigaud de Paule, Count de, better known as COUNT DE PAULE-VAUDREUIL, French soldier, b. in Port au Prince, Santo Domingo, 2 March, 1740; d. in Paris, 10 Jan., 1817, was the son of Jean Paul François, governor of Santo Domingo and other French possessions in the West Indies for several years. The son entered the navy and served during the seven years' war, in 1756-'63, as aide-de-camp to Marshal Prince de Soubise, attaining the rank of lieutenant-general. He was a great favorite at court, and was made grand falconer by Louis XVI. He emigrated in 1789 to Turin with the Count d'Artois, accompanying the latter everywhere till the restoration of 1814, when he was created a peer of France and appointed governor of the royal palace of the Louvre.—Another grandson, Jean Louis de Rigaud, Count de, French soldier, b. in Cape François in 1762; d. in Paris, 20 April, 1816, entered the army in 1777 as lieutenant, went to America with Rochambeau, served as aide-de-camp to Chevalier de Chastellux, and was at Yorktown in October, 1781. He was promoted colonel in 1785, emigrated to Germany in 1789, served in the army of Condé, and after the restoration of Louis XVIII. became master of the king's wardrobe.

VAUGHAN, Benjamin, political economist, b. in Jamaica, West Indies, during a temporary residence of his parents on the island, 19 April, 1751; d. in Hallowell, Me., 8 Dec., 1835. He was the eldest son of Samuel Vaughan, of London, a West India merchant and planter. His mother was Sarah Hallowell, daughter of Benjamin Hallowell, a merchant of Boston, Mass. He was educated by Dr. Priestley, and at the University of Cambridge. As early as 1778 he wrote on political subjects. He studied medicine at Edinburgh, taking his degree in May, 1781, and on 30 June married Sarah, daughter of William Manning, of London, a West India merchant and planter, grandfather of Cardinal Manning. He became the partner of Mr. Manning, and remained with the house in active business until 1794. Through his American connections and his scientific pursuits he early became intimate with Benjamin Franklin. His relations with Franklin, his connection with Henry Laurens (whose son married Miss Manning), and his friendship with Lord Shelburne brought him into active participation in the conduct of the negotiations for peace between England and the United States in 1782. But he never assumed any official part in these negotiations. There is some evidence that communications from Paris, concerning the possibilities of peace, passed from Franklin to Shelburne, through Laurens and Vaughan, as early as March, 1782, before Lord North's resignation. Late in March, after the formation of the Rockingham ministry, Lord Shelburne (then secretary for the colonies) requested Vaughan to persuade Laurens to go to Holland with his brother, William Vaughan, to ascertain from John Adams what means were necessary for peace. By sending messengers in three directions at once, Vaughan succeeded in finding Laurens, who was persuaded to undertake the mission. Fox, secretary for foreign affairs, desired to get these negotiations into his own hands, being jealous of Shelburne, and attempted to obtain the same service from Laurens, but had been forestalled by Vaughan. At the same time, being consulted by Lord Shelburne as to the best person to send to Paris to open formal negotiations with Franklin, Vaughan suggested Richard Oswald, who was at once sent to Paris, crossing the channel in the same packet with Laurens. Oswald was afterward formally commissioned negotiator for England, and returned to France; but owing to jealousies between him and Grenville, sent by Fox, Franklin became very guarded in his intercourse, and, before Lord Shelburne became prime minister, Vaughan seems to have gone to Paris at his request to attempt to allay Franklin's suspicions. After Lord Rockingham's death, during the formation of the Shelburne cabinet, Lord Shelburne offered Vaughan an official appointment, which he declined; but he consented to go again to Paris in July to see Franklin, to assure him of Lord Shelburne's genuine desire to conclude a peace, and to remove any obstacles arising from Fox's attack in the commons on Shelburne's sincerity. Being successful in this, he remained in Paris, at Franklin's request, and by Lord Shelburne's express desire, in order to receive certain communications which Franklin desired to make to Shelburne concerning reconciliation. This, however, the course of the negotiation rendered unnecessary, and they were never formally written out. Oswald was ignorant that Vaughan was in Paris at Shelburne's request, and, becoming jealous, he wrote Shelburne, accusing Vaughan of meddling. Diplomatic requirements prevented Shelburne from permitting Oswald to know of his independent communications through Vaughan, and from clearly explaining to him Vaughan's true position. Oswald therefore remained in ignorance (apparently through life) that during the whole transaction Vaughan was actively engaged in his work of removing obstacles to the peace on both sides, at the express desire of both parties to the negotiation. Hence the correspondence of Oswald and Shelburne gives, on both sides, an erroneous impression as to Vaughan. Vaughan became well acquainted with Jay, on the latter's arrival in Paris, 23 June, and much communication between Franklin and Jay in Paris, and Shelburne in England, passed through Vaughan. On Vaughan's return to London in August, he was again requested by Shelburne to return to Paris and continue his efforts. While there, Vaughan learned of Rayneval's secret mission to England, and wrote to Shelburne concerning it, 9 Sept. Two days later he wrote Shelburne a long letter, urging delay with Rayneval, and immediate and independent action with the colonies, and showing the importance of separating America from France, and the danger to peace of refusing to grant Jay's demand for a new commission to Oswald which should recognize the independence of the United States at once, instead of reserving independence to be one of the terms of the treaty itself. Following his letter to England a few hours later, at the urgent request of Jay, he had an interview with Shelburne, and, being asked "whether a new commission was absolutely necessary," renewed his assurance that it was. The new commission was made out, and Vaughan was desired by Shelburne to return to France immediately. He set out at once, taking with him in his chaise from London the royal messenger with the new commission, which recognized in its wording the independence of the United States of America. Vaughan remained in Paris during October and part of November, becoming acquainted with Adams, the fourth commissioner, who arrived in Paris on 25 Oct., and being the medium of much informal communication between the negotiators on both sides, especially concerning the refugees. In November he again returned to London, but was desired by Shelburne to go back to Paris. At this time Shelburne appears to have been dissatisfied with his course; and the king, to whom Vaughan's letters were submitted along with the official despatches, also expressed dissatisfaction at his stay. But the result of his work seems to have justified his course, for Franklin expressly declared that, had it not been for Vaughan's letters and conversations, he would not have signed the clause in the treaty concerning the refugees—a subject which, more than any other, threatened to wreck the whole negotiation. Shelburne must have become satisfied of this, for he again requested him to remain in Paris. Vaughan spent over seven months in these visits at Paris and in his journeys, but refused to receive any pay or even the reimbursement of his expenses.

Benjⁿ. Vaughan

From 1783 to 1794 Vaughan lived in London and in the country, with long visits to Paris, dividing his time between active business and political and scientific studies. His letters show Jeremy Bentham, Sheridan, Sir Samuel Romilly, Grey, Wilberforce, M. de Narbonne, the bishop of Autun, and many others to have been among his guests, while his general correspondence embraced an even wider circle. His intimate relations with Franklin continued unbroken during life. He had long before edited the first publication of Franklin's writings in London, and through his influence in these later years Franklin was induced to publish his memoirs. During this time Vaughan published papers under the signature of the "Calm

Observer," reprinted in book-form (London, 1793), and translated into French and German. He was returned to parliament in 1792, and remained in the house nearly two years. He was opposed to any attempt to disturb the existing form of government in his own country; but as the French revolution developed, the popular tide in England set strongly against those men who had shown sympathy with its earlier stages, and more rigorous laws were demanded against those suspected of sympathizing with what were called revolutionary ideas. Vaughan, from his place in parliament, was well known to Pitt as one of the active opponents of the administration. Under these circumstances he decided to leave England for the continent until times had again become settled, and accordingly in 1794 he went to France, and afterward to Switzerland. While in France he was several times suspected of being an English spy. In Switzerland he devoted himself to political correspondence and literary pursuits. He was assured by Pitt that he could at any time return to England with safety, but he had become so much interested in republican principles that he determined to live in the United States. He accordingly went direct to Boston, and lived for a short time at Little Cambridge (now Brighton), whence he removed to Maine, and settled on lands descended to him from his mother, Sarah Hallowell, on Kennebec river, in what is now the town of Hallowell. Here he spent the remainder of his life, improving his estate, advocating conservative political views, working in his library, writing literary and political articles, and carrying on an extensive correspondence. Here, for the first time, he practised his profession, visiting only among the poor, and usually supplying medicines as well as advice without charge. Besides the articles written in England on political and scientific subjects, he also published, under the title of "Klyogg, or the Rural Socrates," the result of his researches in Switzerland, concerning the life of James Gouyer, the agricultural philosopher (Hallowell, Me., 1806). At Hallowell he published anonymously various political articles, and also prepared two historical papers at President Adams's request—one concerning the northeast boundary, the other giving the writer's surmises of the manner in which Turgot's memoirs came into the possession of Lord Shelburne several years before their publication. All that he wrote was either published anonymously, or over a fictitious signature, or was not written for publication, and his literary labors have remained generally unknown. He was an indefatigable worker, and spent much of his time during his later life among his books, which, when he came to Hallowell, were fewer by only two thousand than the library of Harvard college at that time. He received the honorary degree of LL. D. from Harvard in 1807, and from Bowdoin in 1812.—His brother, Charles, merchant, b. in England, 30 June, 1759; d. in Hallowell, Me., 15 May, 1839, after spending some years in Jamaica, came to the United States in 1786, and settled in Hallowell. He had charge of large tracts of land owned by his father and by his maternal grandfather, Benjamin Hallowell, and devoted himself to encouraging the settlement of the Kennebec region. In furtherance of this object he visited England in the autumn of 1790, and spent several months in establishing business relations with merchants in London and other ports. Returning in June, 1791, he married, in Boston, Frances Western Apthorp, established himself there as a merchant, and had for several years an extensive trade with ports of England and of the East and West Indies, exporting chiefly the products of the Kennebec region. He was one of the trustees of Hallowell academy, incorporated in 1791, and one of the founders of the Boston library society, incorporated in 1794. He built, in Hallowell, houses, mills, stores, a distillery, a brewery, and a printing-office, and established a seaport at Jones's Eddy, near the mouth of the Kennebec, where he constructed a costly wet dock for ship-timber. In Boston he was associated with Charles Bulfinch (his brother-in-law) and William Scollay, in the important Franklin street improvement in 1793, where they drained and graded a boggy pasture, and built a block of sixteen houses, known as the "Crescent," which was the first brick block erected in Boston. A semi-oval space was inclosed in the middle of the street, which Mr. Vaughan, conveying in 1794 a part of his interest in the block, provided should forever remain unoccupied by buildings. Meeting with serious reverses in 1798, he surrendered his property to his creditors, and in 1799 returned to Hallowell, engaged actively in agricultural pursuits, being also employed as agent for large non-resident owners of land in various parts of Maine, and devoted his energies to promoting the prosperity of the region. His importations of horned cattle, sheep, and swine, of the most approved breeds, as well as of choice varieties of wheat and other seeds, had a marked influence in the development of the agricultural and stock-breeding interests of Maine.

VAUGHAN, Daniel, scientist, b. in Ireland about 1821; d. in Cincinnati, Ohio, in April, 1879. He received an excellent education, and possessed great mathematical ability. When about sixteen years of age he came to this country and taught in Bourbon county, Ky., meanwhile studying the higher branches of science by himself, but he subsequently settled in Cincinnati, where he devoted himself mainly to astronomy and the larger aspects of natural phenomena. He mastered the German, French, Italian, and Spanish languages, and also ancient and modern Greek. He contributed nearly fifty papers to the proceedings of learned societies and to scientific periodicals at home and abroad. The last work of his life was a series of astronomical articles that were published in the "Popular Science Monthly." He issued in book-form "Popular Physical Astronomy, or an Exposition of Remarkable Celestial Phenomena" (Cincinnati, 1858).

VAUGHAN, Sir John, British soldier, b. in 1738; d. in Martinique, W. I., 30 June, 1795. He was the second son of Wilmot, 3d Viscount Lisburne, and entered the army in 1746 as cornet in the 10th dragoons. He was captain in the 17th foot in 1756, and afterward, as lieutenant-colonel, led a division of grenadiers with great credit at the capture of Martinique. On 11 May, 1775, he was made colonel of the 46th regiment, which had been ordered to this country, and he served here on the staff with the ranks of brigadier- and major-general, and from 1777, with the latter commission in full, in the British regular army. He led the grenadiers in the battle of Long Island, and at the landing at New York he was wounded in the thigh and for a time disabled from active service. He commanded the right column of attack at Fort Clinton and Fort Montgomery, where his horse was killed under him, and was particularly mentioned in orders by Sir Henry Clinton, who gave the latter work the name of Fort Vaughan in his honor. With Sir James Wallace he sailed up Hudson river in October, 1777, on a marauding expedition on which he destroyed the town of Kingston. In May, 1779, he captured Stony Point and Verplanck; but after the campaign of that year he returned to England, where, in December, he was appointed commander-in-chief of the Leeward islands. On 3 Feb., 1781, with Admiral Rodney, he took St. Eustatius, and in 1782 he was made lieutenant-general. Gen. Vaughan had been made governor of Fort William in Scotland, but shortly afterward obtained the more lucrative post of Berwick, which he represented in four successive parliaments. In 1793 he received the order of the Bath. His death was sudden, and not without suspicion of poison.

VAUGHAN, John, physician, b. in Uchland, Chester co., Pa., 25 June, 1775; d. in Wilmington, Del., 25 March, 1807. His father, John, was a Baptist minister. The son was educated at Old Chester, studied medicine in Philadelphia under Dr. William Currie, and at the University of Pennsylvania in 1793-'4, and in 1795-'9 practised in Christiana Bridge, Del., after which time he resided in Wilmington. He attained note in his profession, and numbered among his intimate friends and familiar correspondents Thomas Jefferson, Aaron Burr, John Dickerson, Caesar A. Rodney, and Dr. Benjamin Rush. He was a member of many scientific bodies, and in 1799-1800 delivered a course of lectures on chemistry and natural philosophy at Wilmington. After 1806 he officiated occasionally as a Baptist preacher. Besides numerous articles in periodicals, Dr. Vaughan published an edition of Dr. Smith's "Letters," a "Chemical Syllabus," and "Observations on Animal Electricity in Explanation of the Metallic Operation of Dr. Perkins," a defence of Dr. Elisha Perkins's "metallic tractors," of which he was a zealous advocate.

VAUGHAN, John Apthorp, clergyman, b. in Little Cambridge (now Brighton), Mass., 13 Oct., 1795; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 5 June, 1865. His father, Charles, came from England to this country, and removed to Hallowell, Me., where the son received his first education. After graduation at Bowdoin in 1815, he went to London, and was for a time employed in the banking-house of his uncle, William Vaughan. Subsequently he took charge of a plantation that belonged to the Vaughan family in Jamaica, W. I., but returned to Hallowell and opened there a school for girls, also studying divinity. In 1833 he was ordained deacon, and held charge of Trinity church in Saco, Me., and, after receiving priest's orders in 1834, he became rector of St. Peter's church, Salem, Mass. From 1836 till 1842 he was secretary of the Protestant Episcopal board of foreign missions. Owing to impaired health he resigned this post, went to Georgia, and in 1844 settled in Philadelphia, where he was superintendent of the Institution for the blind in 1845-'8. In 1848 he established in that city a school for girls, which he abandoned in 1854. From 1861 until 1865 he was professor of pastoral theology in the Philadelphia divinity-school, to which he presented a library of 1,200 volumes. Kenyon gave him the degree of D. D. in 1839. He published pamphlets, including one "On the General Missions of the Church" (1842).

VAUGHAN, Sir William, poet, b. in Wales in 1577; d. in Newfoundland about 1640. He was a physician, and in 1605 received the degree of LL. D. from Oxford. After purchasing land in Newfoundland, he removed there about 1625, and established a plantation which he called Cambriol. To invite settlers from England he wrote his "Golden Fleece" (London, 1626). This is dedicated to King Charles I. and is written under the pen-name of Orpheus, Jr. It is a curious production in prose and verse, and has been described as a "composition of the Puritan way of thinking ingrafted on the old classic machinery of Apollo and his court." He also published "The New-lander's Cure," in which he gives some account of his Newfoundland settlement (1630), and "The Church Militant," a labored historical poem (1640).

VAUGHAN, William, soldier, b. in Portsmouth, N. H., 12 Sept., 1703; d. in London, England, 11 Dec., 1746. His father, George (1676-1724), was graduated at Harvard in 1696 and was lieutenant-governor of New Hampshire in 1715-17. The son was graduated at Harvard in 1722, became concerned in the fisheries, and settled in Damariscotta. He is one of the claimants for the honor of first suggesting the successful expedition against Louisburg. It is said that he made the suggestion to Gov. Benning Wentworth, of New Hampshire, who referred him to Gov. William Shirley, of Massachusetts. He took part as lieutenant-colonel in the expedition under Sir William Pepperell, and at the head of a detachment, chiefly of New Hampshire troops, he marched by night to the northeastern part of the harbor, where he burned the warehouses and destroyed a large quantity of wine and brandy. The French were forced by the smoke to desert the grand battery, of which Vaughan took possession next morning, and which he held till the fall of the city. He considered himself slighted in the distribution of awards, and at the time of his death was asserting his rights in England. His claim of priority in the suggestion of the expedition is upheld in the anonymous tract, "The Importance and Advantage of Cape Breton" (London, 1746), the authorship of which is often assigned to William Bollan, but which some believe to have been inspired by Vaughan. Other authors also say that common report gave him priority. See also "Col. William Vaughan of Martinicus and Damariscotta" in the "Collections of the Maine Historical Society," by William Gould.

VAUGIRAUD, Pierre René Marie (vo-zhe-ro), Comte de, French naval officer, b. in Sables-d'Olonne in 1741; d. in France, 14 March, 1819. He entered the navy at the age of fourteen, and in 1781 was major-general in the fleet of the Count de Grasse, and contributed to the early successes of that commander in the West Indies. While the fleet was off Cape Haytien, a fire was discovered on board the "Intrépide," which was stationed in the centre, close to the town. The sailors, panic-stricken, mutinied and abandoned the vessel, and Vaugiraud asked leave of the Count de Grasse to aid the commander of the "Intrépide" in saving the fleet or to perish with him. He then made his way to the vessel, which was already in flames, forced the mutineers to return, and ordered the necessary measures. The fire was approaching the powder-magazine, when the "Intrépide" was moved some distance from the fleet and town. Vaugiraud and its commander then ordered the crew to take to the boats, and were the last to leave the ship, which blew up five minutes after their departure. Vaugiraud afterward sailed to Chesapeake bay, and, returning with De Grasse to the Antilles, took part in the battle of 12 April, 1782, against Lord Rodney, receiving from the king an autograph letter of thanks and a pension of 12,000 livres. He was in command of a vessel at Martinique in 1789, when an insurrection began in the island. He seconded the efforts of the governor, and both for a time arrested the progress of the revolution. He left France in 1791, and returned with the Bourbons in 1814. He was made vice-admiral and governor of Martinique, and soon afterward governor-general of the Antilles. When he arrived he found that the people had learned of the return of Napoleon, and were everywhere hoisting the tri-color flag. He took energetic measures to preserve Martinique and Guadeloupe to Louis XVIII., and, when he saw that this was impossible without assistance, he formed a convention with the English, in virtue of which he gave them control of the colonies for the time. He governed the colony afterward with firmness, and restored its finances to a sound condition, but he was charged with being harsh and tyrannical, and was recalled in 1818. The king forbade him his presence, and he died broken-hearted. Vaugiraud published "Rapport au roi sur le gouvernement de la Martinique et de la Guadeloupe" (Paris, 1822), which was declared unauthentic by his family.

VAUQUELIN, French naval officer, b. in Caen, France, in 1726; d. in France in 1763. At the age of ten he entered the naval service under his father. In 1745 he gained a victory over an English frigate off Martinique, and in 1754 he was employed in reconnoitring the English ports, and performed this mission with such sagacity that he was given the command of the "Aréthuse," and sent with re-enforcements and military stores to Louisburg, Cape Breton. He was entirely successful, but he determined to do more for the French colony, and, seeing that advantage could be derived from the possession of a bay in front of which English vessels had to pass, he took up a position in it. He was attacked by a superior force, but fought his ship until most of his crew were wounded. Then he retired under the cannon of the fort, repaired his vessel, and, having with difficulty obtained the governor's consent, he escaped through the English fleet and sailed for France to obtain aid for the colony. This feat excited the admiration of the English officers, and especially of Admiral Boscawen, but met with no adequate reward in France, where the highest commands in the army and navy were considered to belong to the nobility solely. However, he was given command of three frigates, and, in spite of the vigilance of the English fleet, sailed up St. Lawrence river, placed his vessels in a position of security, and, with part of the crew, re-enforced the garrison in Quebec. This succor delayed the capitulation for several days, but after the French reverses of 13 Sept. he foresaw that the city must soon surrender, and he resolved to make an effort to save his frigates. Escaping from Quebec with a few followers, he reached his vessels safely, and at once set sail. He had scarcely reached the mouth of the St. Lawrence when he was attacked by a superior force. After a heroic defence, his ship became unmanageable. Determined to sink with his vessel rather than surrender, he allowed his crew to escape, and remained alone on board his ship, which he set on fire, but the English commander, moved by his heroism, saved him. When he returned to France he was promoted to the rank of lieutenant. But he had enemies who were jealous of his elevation, and after an important mission on which he was sent to India, he was arrested and confined to his house. He was released after four months' detention, and was about to appear before the king in order to defend himself, when he was assassinated.

VAUX, Calvert (vawks), landscape architect, b. in London, England, 20 Dec., 1824. He was educated at the Merchant tailors' school, and was a pupil to Lewis N. Cottingham, architect in London. In 1848 he came to this country at the suggestion of Andrew J. Downing, whose architectural partner he became, and with whom he was associated in laying out the grounds that surround the capitol and Smithsonian institution, Washington, D. C., and other work of landscape gardening. On his suggestion, public competition was invited for the plans of Central park, and, in connection with Frederick L. Olmsted, he presented a design which was accepted, and possessed among its original features that of transverse traffic roads. During the completion of the work Mr. Vaux held the office of consulting architect to the department of parks. In 1865 he presented a design for Prospect park, Brooklyn, which was accepted. Subsequently he was associated with Mr. Olmsted in designing the parks in Chicago and Buffalo, and the state reservation at Niagara Falls. They also designed the plans for Riverside and Morningside parks in New York city, and Mr. Vaux is now landscape architect of the department of public parks, with charge of the improvements of city parks. Meanwhile he has been exceedingly fertile as an architect, designing country residences in Newport and elsewhere, also dwellings and public buildings in New York city. The Belvedere in Central park, which is shown in the accompanying illustration, was designed by him. He has published "Villas and Cottages" (New York, 1860).

VAUX, Roberts, jurist, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 25 Jan., 1786; d. there, 7 Jan., 1836. He received his education at private schools of Philadelphia, was admitted to the bar in 1808, and rose rapidly to prominence in his profession. In 1835 he became judge of the court of common pleas of Philadelphia. He was one of the originators of the public-school system of Pennsylvania, and for fourteen years held the first presidency of the board of public schools of Philadelphia. He was also one of the founders of the Deaf and dumb asylum, the Blind school and asylum, the Philadelphia savings fund, the Historical society, and other benevolent societies of Pennsylvania. Early in life he became interested in prison matters, and as a penologist he acquired his greatest distinction. He was one of the commissioners to adapt the law of Pennsylvania to the separate system of imprisonment, and also to build the eastern state penitentiary, and labored zealously in the cause of prison-reform. He was a member of scientific societies in Europe, and of the Philosophical society of Pennsylvania. He refused several public posts that were offered him by President Jackson, among which was the mission to St. Petersburg. He published "Eulogium on Benjamin Ridgway Smith" (Philadelphia, 1809); "Memoirs of the Lives of Benjamin Lay and Ralph Sandiford" (1815); "Memoirs of the Life of Anthony Benezet" (1817; with alterations, York, 1817; French translation, Paris, 1821); and "Notices of the Original and Successive Efforts to improve the Discipline of the Prison at Philadelphia" (1826).—His son, Richard, lawyer, b. in Philadelphia, 19 Dec., 1816, was educated by private tutors, studied law with William M. Meredith, and was admitted to the Philadelphia bar in 1836. Shortly thereafter he became the bearer of despatches to the U. S. minister to the court of St. James, by whom he was appointed secretary of legation on his arrival. He held this post for one year until he was relieved by Benjamin Rush. Declining a similar post at St. Petersburg, he went to Brussels to aid in reorganizing the American embassy there, made a tour of the continent, returned to London, and accepted the post of private secretary to the U. S. minister, Andrew Stevenson. Returning to Philadelphia in 1839, he was nominated as candidate for the lower house of the Pennsylvania legislature. In March, 1840, he was a delegate to the convention that nominated Martin Van Buren for president of the United States. In 1842 he was appointed recorder of deeds of Philadelphia, holding this post, though it was bare of emolument, for seven years. His "Recorder's Decisions" (Philadelphia, 1845) made him known, and is now an authority. It is noteworthy that no decision by him during this incumbency was ever reversed by a higher court. In 1842 he was the Democratic candidate for mayor, and, though failing of election, greatly reduced the Whig majority. In 1843 the supreme court appointed him inspector of the state prison, and shortly thereafter he was elected comptroller of public schools, to succeed his father, and thus filled three important posts at the same time. He resumed the practice of law after resigning the office of recorder. In 1854 he was again defeated in the mayoralty contest, but was successful at the next election, and as mayor effected a complete reorganization of the city government. He is one of the chief penologists in the United States, and, like his father, has achieved his highest renown in this branch. He has been a most voluminous writer on the subject. Besides about fifteen publications on general penal matters, he has written forty-five volumes of "Reports of the Penitentiary" (1842 et seq.). He was largely instrumental in the framing and passage of the act of 1885, which is now the charter of the city of Philadelphia, having laid the first plan for this reform charter in 1857, in his message to the city councils.

VAUX, William Sanson, mineralogist, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 19 May, 1811; d. there, 5 May, 1882. He was a great-nephew of George Vaux, of London, a noted medical practitioner, who died in the early part of the century. When a boy he acquired a strong taste for mineralogy, and he pursued the study of that science and later that of archaeology with enthusiasm throughout his life. He acquired extensive mineralogical and archaeological collections, which he bequeathed to the Philadelphia academy of natural sciences, with a handsome endowment for their preservation. These collections are arranged in the academy in a separate department, and are known as "the William S. Vaux collection." Mr. Vaux was president of the Zoological society of Philadelphia, and from 1864 until his death, with the exception of 1874-'5, was vice-president of the Philadelphia academy of natural sciences. He was one of eight founders of the Numismatic and antiquarian society, its senior vice-president, and from 1871 till his death treasurer of the American association for the advancement of science, of which society he had been a member since its foundation.

VAWTER, John, pioneer, b. in Orange (now Madison) county, Va., 8 Jan., 1782; d. in Morgantown, Ind., 17 Aug., 1862. He was licensed as a Baptist minister in 1804, and in 1807, with his father, removed to the sparsely inhabited territory of Indiana, and settled in Madison, of which he was the first magistrate. He was soon afterward elected sheriff of Jefferson and Clarke counties, and in 1810 was appointed U. S. marshal for the state. He served as a frontier ranger during the Indian campaign of 1811-'13, was elected colonel of militia of Jennings county in 1817, and founded Vernon, the county-seat. He was pastor of the Baptist church in Vernon in 1821-'48, a member of the legislature in 1831-'5, and in 1836 of the senate, where he was instrumental in securing the adoption of a policy of internal improvement by the state. He removed to Morgan county in 1848, founded Morgantown, and presented a brick church to the Baptist congregation of that place.

VEATCH, James Clifford (veech), soldier, b. near Elizabethtown, Harrison co., Ind., 19 Dec., 1819. He was educated in common schools and under private tutors, was admitted to the bar, practised for many years, and was auditor of Spencer county, Ind., from 1841 till 1855. He was in the legislature in 1861-'2, became colonel of the 25th regiment of Indiana volunteers, 9 Aug., 1861, brigadier-general of volunteers, 28 April, 1862, and brevet major-general in August, 1865, at which time he retired from the army. He was engaged at Fort Donelson, Shiloh, the sieges of Corinth and Vicksburg, the Atlanta campaign, the siege and capture of Mobile, and many other actions during the civil war. He became adjutant-general of Indiana in 1869, and was collector of internal revenue from April, 1870, till August, 1883.

VEDDER, Elihu, artist, b. in New York city, 26 Feb., 1836. He had his first instruction in art in his native city, and later studied with Tompkins H. Matteson in Sherbourne, N. Y., and François Édouard Picot in Paris. In 1856 he went to Italy, and subsequently he opened a studio in New York. He was there elected an associate of the National academy in 1863, and an associate two years later. Subsequently he removed to Rome, Italy, where he still resides. His works, while naturalistic and vigorous in treatment, are ideal in motive, and bear witness to the fertility of imagination and versatility of the artist. In many of his pictures he aims, as one critic has said, "to give to the unreal and impossible an air of plausibility and real existence." One of the best known of his paintings is the "Lair of the Sea-Serpent," now in the Boston museum of fine arts, where are also "The Roc's Egg" (two paintings), "Fisherman and Djinn," "Dominican Friars," and "An Italian Woman." His other works include "The Monk upon the Gloomy Path"; "The Crucifixion"; "The Lost Mind"; "Death of Abel" (1869); "A Scene on the Mediterranean" (1874); "Greek Actor's Daughter," exhibited at Philadelphia in 1876; "Old Madonna," "Cunean Sibyl," now belonging to Wellesley college, Mass., and "Young Marsyas," the three exhibited at the Paris exposition of 1878; "A Questioner of the Sphinx"; "Sleeping Girl"; "A Venetian Model"; "A Pastoral," exhibited in Boston in 1878; "Nausicaä and her Companions"; "Waves off Pier Head" (1882); and "Le Mistral" (1884). His ideal works have given rise to much criticism and discussion as to their conception and intent. He has also executed an "accompaniment of drawings" for Edward Fitzgerald's translation of the "Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyám" (Boston, 1884).

VEGA, Feliciano de (vay'-gah), Peruvian R. C. bishop, b. in Lima in 1580; d. in Mazatlan, Mexico, in 1640. He was noted for his knowledge of canon and civil law, held the office of judge in Peru, and is said to have rendered more than 4,000 decisions, not one of which was rescinded on appeal to the higher courts. He was appointed bishop of Popayan in 1628, of La Paz in 1638, and archbishop of Mexico in 1639, but fell sick on his arrival at Acapulco in 1640, and was transported to Mazatlan, where he died of yellow fever. He published several works on canon and civil law, among them "De adquirenda hæreditate" (Lima, 1605) and "Relectiones Canonice in Secundum Decretalium librum" (1633).

VEGA, Ventura de la, Argentine poet, b. in Buenos Ayres, 14 July, 1807; d. in Madrid, Spain, in 1865. His father, president of the royal treasury court, remained after the declaration of independence in Buenos Ayres, where his wife possessed large property, but he died in 1812, and young Vega went to Spain in 1818 for his education. His paternal uncle sent him to study Latin in the Jesuit college of San Isidro, and he afterward entered the College of San Mateo. He founded the political society of Numantinos, which the government dissolved, notwithstanding the youth of its members, and imprisoned seven of the leaders from January till June, 1825, when they were sentenced to three months' seclusion in different convents. After his release Vega finished his studies with Alberto Lista, and in 1826 published some of his poetry. For his support he began in 1827 to translate French plays, which led him afterward to become a playwright. In January, 1836, he was appointed chief clerk of the ministry of the interior, and he soon afterward became secretary of Queen Maria Christina. In 1838 he was the teacher of the young queen and her sister, and in 1856 he was appointed director of the Royal conservatory. He is considered one of the best modern Spanish poets. Although he spent the greater part of his life in Spain, he is claimed by the Argentine Republic as a citizen, and it is proposed to erect a statue of him in Buenos Ayres. He wrote "El Cantar de los Cantares" (Madrid, 1826); "Cantata epitalámica" (1827); "Al Río Pusa" (1830); "La Agitación," an ode (1834); "El 18 de Junio" (1837); "La Defensa de Sevilla," an ode (1838); "El Hombre de Mundo," a comedy (1840); and the tragedies "La muerte de César" (1842) and "Don Fernando de Antequera" (1845).

VEIGL, Franz Xavier, missionary, b. in Gratz, Austria, 1 Dec., 1723; d. in Klagenfurt, in the same country, 19 April, 1798. He entered the Society of Jesus at Vienna in 1738, and for several years was professor in the Jesuit college there. He was sent to the American missions in 1753, and labored among the South American Indians until 1777, when he returned to Europe, and was appointed professor at Judenburg. He wrote "Reisen einiger Missionärien der Gesellschaft Jesu in Amerika" (Nuremberg, 1785) and "Franz Xav. Veigl's vormaligen Missionars der Gesellschaft Jesu, gründliche Nachrichten über die Verfassung der Landschaft Maynas in Süd-Amerika bis zum Jahr 1768" (1798; in Latin, 1792). No. 773 and No. 774 of Stöcklein's "Welt-Bote" (Gratz, 1727 et seq.) contain his "Summa epistolarum duarum ad cognatos suos in itinere scriptarum 1753 et 1755 quibus id ipsum et quæ in eo observavit describit" and "Epistola ad eosdem ex Quito 1 Septembris 1755 qua horribilem terræ in civitate hac, et statum missionum ad flumen Maragnon describit."

VEINTIMILLA, Ignacio de (vay-een-te-meel'-yah), South American dictator, b. in Cuenca, Ecuador, about 1830. He entered the military service, rose to the rank of general, and as commander of Guayaquil led in September, 1876, a revolution against President Borrero. He defeated the government troops at Galte on 14 Dec., and on the 25th of that month entered the capital, and was proclaimed president by the Liberal party. In 1877 he defeated a rising of the Clerical party, but, as he retained many Conservative members in his cabinet, he was soon suspected by the Liberals of a leaning toward the clergy. The convention of Ambato, "packed" in Veintimilla's interest, declared him in 1878 dictator for an unlimited period, and he issued a decree abolishing religious liberty and suppressing four opposition newspapers, one of whose editors he cast into a dungeon. His rule was arbitrary, his chief aim seeming to be to aggrandize and enrich himself and his personal followers. When the end of his constitutional term approached in 1882 he instigated several mock pronunciamientos, and for their suppression proclaimed himself supreme chief. But soon his terrorism became so unbearable that there were genuine revolutions under Gen. Alfaro and Gen. Salazar. The government stronghold of Esmeraldas was captured in January, 1883, by the latter, and the garrison of Quito by Col. Reynaldo Flores, forcing the dictator to take refuge in his last stronghold, Guayaquil. He was there hemmed in by the combined forces of the different revolutionary leaders, re-enforced in May by the arrival of Antonio Flores, and, after a protracted struggle, the city was occupied on 9 July by the insurgents, and Veintimilla fled to the steamer "Santa Lucia," which conveyed him to Peru. On 21 July he reached Lima, where he has since resided.

VELASCO, José Miguel de (vay-las'-co), Bolivian soldier, b. in Santa Cruz de la Sierra about 1790; d. there in 1859. In early life he entered the military service and espoused the cause of independence, and after the battle of Ayacucho he was promoted colonel by Bolivar. After the mutiny of Chuquisaca in April, 1828, and by the treaty of Piquiza, Santa Cruz was elected provisional president and Velasco vice-president, the latter taking charge of the executive on account of the former's absence. In December, Gen. Blanco was elected constitutional president, but he was deposed and murdered by a revolt on 31 Dec., and Velasco took charge again, delivering the executive in 1829 to Santa Cruz on his arrival. He took part in the campaigns against Peru and the battles of Yanacocha and Socabaya, but when Santa Cruz marched against the Chilians in 1838, Velasco led a revolution against him in the south, and after the former's fall the latter was proclaimed president in 1839. His administration was a continuous struggle against the revolutions of Santa Cruz's followers, and in 1841 he was captured by the latter and banished, but soon afterward he returned and pronounced for José Ballivian, who was elected president. On the resignation of Ballivian in December, 1847, Velasco was proclaimed president, but, instead of re-establishing the constitution of 1839, according to his promise, he governed at his own discretion, discontent and revolutions following. Manuel Isidoro Belzu defeated him on 5 Dec., 1848, at Jamporaez, and was proclaimed president. Velasco then retired to his native city, where he died when he was preparing a new revolution against the government of Dr. Linares. He was a well-meaning man of undoubted bravery, but of little talent and feeble character, permitting his followers to commit many arbitrary acts in his name.

VELASCO, Juan de, South American historian, b. in Riobamba, Ecuador, in 1727; d. in Verona, Italy, in 1819. He was educated at Quito and Lima, entered the Jesuit order, and occupied for many years the chair of theology in the University of San Marcos in Lima. After the expulsion of the Jesuits from the Spanish dominions, Velasco went to Italy, where he settled in Faenza, and devoted his time to poetry. He afterward went to Verona for the publication of his works, but died before concluding arrangements. His history, although defective on account of the author's excessive credulity, is valuable for the facts that it gives about the reign of the Shyris, before the first invasion by the incas of Peru. The work was often consulted by writers on American history, but was not generally known in Europe until its translation into French by Henri Ternaux-Compans, and shortly afterward it was published in the original language in Quito, with notes by Agustin Yerovi, who had obtained a copy of the manuscript. Velasco's works are "Colección de Poesías, hecha por un ocioso en la ciudad de Faenza," in five manuscript volumes; a large map of the kingdom of Quito, remarkably correct for that epoch, the publication of which is shortly to be undertaken by the government of Ecuador; and "Historia del Reyno de Quito" (3 vols., Quito, 1841-'4; French translation, Paris, 1840).

VELASCO, Luis de, Count of Santiago, viceroy of Mexico, b. in Toledo, Spain, about 1500; d. in the city of Mexico, 31 July, 1564. He was descended from the noble family of the constables of Castile, and had acquired such fame as a just and impartial magistrate, that Charles V., when he ordered Antonio de Mendoza to Peru, resolved to send Velasco to Mexico as his successor. On 5 Dec., 1550, he arrived in Vera Cruz, and, after conferring with Mendoza at Cholula, began his administration by emancipating 150,000 Indians, who until then had been no better than slaves. When he was remonstrated with about this measure, which his counselors said would ruin the mines, he answered that the liberty of the Indians was more valuable than the mines of the whole world. In 1553 the University of Mexico was founded, and he also instituted a hospital for the natives. When the Chichimec Indians revolted in 1555, Velasco founded the towns of San Miguel el Grande and San Felipe de Ixtlahuaca, and sent Capt. Francisco Ibarra to the north, who founded the towns of Durango and Nombre de Dios. He sent in 1558-'9 expeditions under Guido de Labezares and Tristan de Luna y Arellano to explore and conquer Florida, but without favorable results, and in 1564 he was preparing an expedition under Miguel L. de Legazpi for the conquest of the Philippine islands, when he was overtaken by death. He was greatly mourned by the people of Mexico, who called him "father of New Spain."—His son, Luis, Marquis de Salinas, b. in Madrid, Spain, in 1535; d. in Seville in 1614, came to Mexico with his father in 1550, occupied several posts in the municipality of the capital, and was mayor of Zempoala. About 1586 he returned to Spain and was appointed ambassador in Florence, but continued to consider Mexico his country, and when the differences between the viceroy (the Marquis de Villa-Manrique) and the audiencia of Guadalajara occurred, Philip II. thought Velasco the most appropriate person to re-establish order. He sailed for Mexico in 1589, with orders to land in Panuco, where he arrived in December, as it was feared that the deposed viceroy's partisans in Vera Cruz might oppose him. He took charge of the government, 5 Feb., 1590, and one of his first measures was to open factories of woollen cloth. In 1591 he received a deputation of the bellicose Chichimecs, with whom he adjusted a treaty, and, to secure their subjugation, he established around Zacatecas four colonies of Tlaxcaltec Indians, the constant allies of the Spaniards. In 1593 he laid out the public walk or alameda, and in 1595 he was preparing an expedition under Juan Oñate for the fabulous kingdom of Quivira, or New Mexico, when he was promoted to the viceroyalty of Peru, and, on the arrival of his successor, Count de Monterey, left Mexico in November, 1595. He arrived in Lima on 24 July, 1596, and took charge of the government, which he administered for eight years with ability. At last, weary of the cares of office, he repeatedly solicited his relief, and delivering up the government on 8 Nov., 1604, he retired to his commanderies of Teutitlan and Azcapotzalco in Mexico, to live with his family. But in June, 1607, he received the royal order to assume again the government of Mexico, to succeed the Marquis de Montesclaros, who had been promoted to Peru. Notwithstanding his age and desire for retirement, he obeyed, and on 20 July took charge of the executive. In the same year continued rains threatened to inundate the capital again, by the rising of the lakes, and the viceroy determined to execute the plan of Enrique Martinez (q. v.), of draining the valley by a cut through the hills of Nochistongo. The work was begun 28 Nov. of the same year, and on 7 May, 1608, the first section of the canal was completed. He sent an embassy to Japan in 1611, and, being promoted president of the council of the Indies in the same year, left Mexico on 17 June for Spain, where he died. He is esteemed one of the principal benefactors of Mexico.—The younger Luis's nephew, Pedro de, clergyman, b. in Mexico in 1581; d. there, 26 Aug., 1649, became a Jesuit in 1596, and labored among the Indians for fourteen years. He was then professor of sacred scripture, held several high offices in the order, was procurator for Mexico at Rome and Madrid, and was made provincial of Mexico in 1646. During his term occurred the troubles between Bishop Palafox and the Jesuits of Puebla, 1647. He wrote "Varias cartas y representaciones sobre los ruidosos asuntos de los Jesuitas con el Sr. Palafox"; "Apología por las Doctrinas y Curatos de los Religiosos"; and "Arte de una de las lenguas de Cinaloa."

VELASCO, Luis Vicente, Spanish naval officer, b. in Villa de Noja, Santander, about 1710; d. in Havana, Cuba, 31 July, 1762. He had obtained the rank of post-captain and commanded the ship-of-the-line "La Reina" at Havana when the British expedition under the Duke of Albemarle was threatening the island of Cuba in 1762. Velasco was appointed by the council of war commander of Morro Castle, and when the British army landed, on 7 June, on the beach of Cojimar, he prepared to defend the outposts, but, by the abandonment of the works of Cabañas by order of the council of war, he was soon reduced to the walls of the castle, and could not prevent the establishment of siege batteries at Cabañas. The bombardment began on 1 July, but Velasco defended the castle obstinately, and his batteries caused great loss to the besiegers. On 16 July he was dangerously wounded and carried to Havana, but on the 24th, hearing that the besieging works were advancing, he insisted on returning to his post. On the 30th a mine opened a breach in the walls, and the enemy captured the outer battery of San Nicolas, but in the attempt to storm the castle they met with a heroic resistance, the defenders being led by Velasco, although he had not fully recovered. Not until the latter fell and more than 1,000 Spaniards had perished did the British capture the castle. Velasco died the next day, and Lord Albemarle suspended hostilities and sent his remains with a guard of honor to Havana.

VELÁZQUEZ, Diego de, Spanish officer, b. in Cuellar about 1460; d. in Santiago, Cuba, in 1532. He was of noble birth, had served in the wars against the Moors, and came to this country in Columbus's second voyage in 1493, where he took part in the conquest of Hispaniola, and was left by the adelantado Bartolome Columbus in charge of the government during his expedition to the interior in 1497. Nicolas de Ovando, who became governor in 1502, also favored Velazquez, and the latter took an active part in the subjugation of the provinces of Jaragua and Higüey. He founded the towns of Jaquimo (Jacmel), Maguana, and Azua, was appointed substitute by Ovando, and soon was one of the principal settlers of the colony. When Diego Columbus, the new governor of Hispaniola, resolved in 1511 to conquer the island of Cuba, he selected Velazquez as commander of the expedition, which consisted of four vessels with 300 men, and the latter landed toward the end of the year in the port of Palmas, bringing in his retinue Bartolome de las Casas and Hernan Cortes. He found but little resistance except from the cacique Hatuey (q. v.), a fugitive from Hispaniola, who was soon captured and burned at the stake. In February, 1513, he founded the first town at Baracoa, and with the re-enforcement that was brought by Panfilo de Narvaez he conquered Camaguey and soon subjugated the whole island, founding, in November, 1513, the town of Bayamo, and in the following year Trinidad, Santo Espiritu, Puerto Principe, and Santiago de Cuba, where he established his government on account of its proximity to Hispaniola. Soon the fame of the riches of the island attracted numerous adventurers, and Velazquez began to distribute land and Indians among his followers. On 25 July, 1515, he founded on the banks of Mayabeque river the town of San Cristobal, which in 1519 was removed to the present site of Havana. In the same year he sent the treasurer, Miguel Pasamonte, to Spain with a map of the island (which still exists in the archives of the Indies), and to solicit further privileges. To occupy the surplus of adventurers, he approved an expedition under Francisco Hernandez de Cordova to capture slaves in the Bahamas in 1517, who, impelled by contrary winds, accidentally discovered Yucatan. The favorable reports about that country encouraged Velazquez to send an expedition for its conquest, and on 1 May, 1518, a fleet under Juan de Grijalva left Santiago de Cuba and visited the Mexican coast from Cape Catoche to Panuco river. The news of the rich country, which Grijalva despatched to Cuba by Pedro de Alvarado, incited Velazquez to form a new expedition for its conquest, the command of which he gave, after much hesitation, to Hernan Cortes. Afterward, mistrusting his lieutenant's intentions, he sought to prevent his sailing, but his emissaries arrived too late in Havana. When he heard that Cortes had sent commissioners to Spain to obtain the title to the newly discovered country, he sent a powerful expedition under Panfilo de Narvaez in March, 1520, to capture Cortes and take charge of the government in the name of Velazquez. After the unfortunate result of Narvaez's expedition, Velazquez intended to march himself, but his age and the small-pox, then desolating the island, prevented him from executing his design, and disappointment at Cortes's success contributed to the sickness of which he died.

VELÁZQUEZ CÁRDENAS DE LEÓN, Joaquín (vay-lath'-keth), Mexican astronomer, b. in Santiago Aubedocla, near Tizicapan, 21 July, 1732; d. in Mexico, 6 March, 1786. He lost his father in childhood and was taken charge of by his uncle, the parish priest of Jaltocan, who educated him, and caused him to be instructed in Mexican history and mythology. He thus became familiar with several Indian languages, and with the hieroglyphic writing of the Aztecs. He was afterward placed in the Tridentine college of the city of Mexico; but this institution was so poorly equipped with teachers, books, and instruments that he was almost self-educated in mathematics and the classics. Having met by chance with the works of Sir Isaac Newton and Francis Bacon, he became attracted by the discoveries of the one and the philosophic methods of the other. He had been graduated in law, and what he gained by his labors in this profession he spent in the purchase of instruments in England. After being appointed a professor in the university, he was sent on a mission to California, where he made a great number of astronomical observations. He was the first to notice that all the maps of that country had been for several centuries strangely in error with regard to its longitude, and made it extend several degrees too far to the west. He built an observatory of mimosa logs at Santa Ana, with the assistance of the Abbé Chappe, a French astronomer, and predicted that the eclipse of the moon of 18 June, 1769, would be visible in California. Unaided, he made a very correct observation of the transit of Venus on 5 June, 1769. In 1774 he was charged with the execution of the topographical and geodetic survey of the valley of Mexico, and his labors, with this aim, have formed the basis of all those that have been undertaken since. After his return from California he placed before the government a project for the foundation of the School of mines. The greatest service that he rendered to his country was the establishment of this institution, of which he was director-general till his death. He wrote "Sobre el beneficio de las Minas del sur de California y demás de la N. España" and "Conocimientos interesantes sobre la Historia Natural de las cercanías de Mexico," manuscripts which were formerly in the library of the cathedral, and are now in the National library.

VELÁZQUEZ DE LA CADENA, Mariano, Mexican grammarian, b. in the city of Mexico, 28 June, 1778; d. in New York city, 19 Feb., 1860. He was sent at the age of seven years to Madrid, and there admitted into the Royal seminary of nobles, where he was graduated in philosophy and law in 1799. Although lacking the legal age, he was admitted in 1800, by special royal order, as notary of the council of the Indies, and appointed curator of the estates of minors and intestate estates for the viceroyalty of Mexico. During his administration he became intimately connected with Baron von Humboldt, and in 1802 he was recalled to fill the post of private secretary to King Charles IV. As such he was sent in 1804 to represent the king at the coronation of Napoleon, and during the following year made a tour through western and central Europe. After the imprisonment of the king by Napoleon in 1809, Velazquez resigned his office, and was making arrangements for returning to Mexico, when news of the revolutionary movement of Hidalgo arrived. Unwilling to identify himself with either of the contending parties, Velazquez resolved to retire to the United States, and settled in New York, where he became a teacher of Spanish, and founded a collegiate institute, in which a great number of young men from the Latin-American countries were educated. From 1830 till his death he was professor of the Castilian language and literature in Columbia college. He was a member of learned societies in Europe and the United States. He was the author of Spanish school-books and a large "Pronouncing Dictionary of the Spanish and English Languages" (New York, 1852).

VÉLEZ-HERRERA, Ramón (vay'-leth), Cuban author, b. in Havana in 1808; d. there in 1887. He was left an orphan when in childhood, but was educated by his uncle, Desiderio Herrera, a learned man, author of various scientific works, and finished his studies in San Carlos seminary, Havana. In 1829 he was graduated in law, but he left this study to devote himself to literature. The first collection of his poems was published in one volume (Havana, 1833), a second in 1837, and a third in 1838. He also published "Elvira de Oquendo," a pastoral in verse (1840); "Los dos novios," a comedy (1843); "Flores de Otoño," a collection of poems (1849); "Romances Cubanos" (1856); "Napoleón en Berlin," a tragedy (1860); and "Flores de invierno," poems (1882).

VELLOSINO, Jayme Andrada (vail-lo-se'-no), Brazilian physician, b. in Pernambuco in 1639; d. in Leyden, Holland, in 1712. His father, an officer in the service of Maurice of Nassau, sent him to Holland after the surrender of Brazil to the Portuguese in 1654. Young Vellosino, after his graduation in medicine at Leyden, entered the service of the Indian company, and held high offices in Guiana. He was an expert in Indian dialects, and formed a valuable herbarium of the South American flora. His works include, besides several memoirs on Indian languages, "Flora Brasiliana, etc." (2 vols., Leyden, 1706).

VELLOSO, José Mariano da Conceição (vail-lo'-so), Brazilian scientist, b. in Rio das Mortes in 1742; d. in Rio Janeiro in 1811. After studying in his native province, he was sent to Rio Janeiro, where he finished his education in the convent of São Boaventura in 1761, and entered the order the next year. He then began the study of philosophy in the convent of Santo Antonio, and in 1766 was graduated as Ph. D., and received sacred orders. In 1768 he was sent as preacher to São Paulo, in which city he was appointed in 1771 professor of geometry, and obtained the chairs of rhetoric in 1779 and natural history in 1786. Soon the viceroy, Luiz de Vasconcellos, called him to Rio Janeiro and commissioned him, with Francisco Solano, to make a botanical exploration of the province. After many years of work he finished in 1790 his celebrated work on the flora of the province of Rio Janeiro, which contained alone 1,640 plants of new and formerly unclassified species. The viceroy ordered him to present his work personally at court in Lisbon, where the manuscript was lost in the archives, but it was discovered in 1824 in the royal library by Antonio de Arrabida, and the Emperor Pedro I. obtained a copy, which was published by his orders. Velloso was honored in Lisbon with the friendship of the prince regent, and by him appointed director of the topography of the "Arco do Cego," which in 1798 was incorporated in the royal printing-office. Velloso continued as one of the directors, was a corresponding member of the Royal academy of science and many other scientific societies, and provincial of his order, but, desiring to return to his country, he was in 1809 nominated superior of the convent of Santo Antonio in Rio Janeiro, where he died two years after. A plant of the Euphorbiæ family has been named in his honor Vellozia jabanesia princeps. He wrote "O Fazendeiro do Brazil," a work on agriculture (11 vols., Lisbon, 1794); "Ornothologia Brasileira, ou enumeração de muitas aves uteis" (1804); "Estudo sobre a cochonilha" (1807); "Sobre o Lavrador pratico, contendo a historia da canna de assucar" (Rio Janeiro, 1810); and a great natural history, "Flora Fluminense, ou descripção das plantas que nascem espontaneas no Rio de Janeiro" (11 vols., 1825).

VENABLE, Abraham B., senator, b. in Prince Edward county, Va., in 1760; d. in Richmond, Va., 26 Dec., 1811. His ancestors were among the earliest settlers of Virginia, receiving from Charles II. a grant of lands at the Manikin town on James river. His grandfather was a surgeon in the first regiment of troops that was sent to Jamestown, under the command of Sir John Harvie. Abraham was graduated at Princeton in 1780, settled as a planter in his native county, and in 1791-'9 was a member of congress. In 1803-'4 he was U. S. senator, but he resigned at the latter date, returned to private life, and exerted a controlling influence in public affairs. He was the intimate friend and party adviser of Thomas Jefferson, by whom he was appointed president of the Bank of Virginia, which enterprise was under that statesman's control. Mr. Venable perished at the burning of the Richmond theatre.—His nephew, Abraham Woodson, congressman, b. in Prince Edward county, Va., 17 Oct., 1799; d. in Oxford, N. C., 24 Feb., 1876, was graduated at Hampden Sidney in 1816, and at Princeton in 1819, in the mean time studying medicine. He was admitted to the bar in 1821, removed to North Carolina in 1828, and established a large practice. He was a presidential elector on the Jackson ticket in 1832, and on the Van Buren-Johnson ticket in 1836, was chosen to congress in 1846, and served by re-election till 1853, but was defeated in the next canvass. During his service in that body he gained reputation as an able debater and an opponent of the free-soil or anti-slavery policy and that of nullification. He was a presidential elector on the Breckinridge and Lane ticket in 1860, and in 1861-'4 a member of the Confederate congress.—Abraham's nephew, Charles Scott, educator, b. in Prince Edward county, Va., 19 April, 1827, was graduated at Hampden Sidney in 1842 and at the University of Virginia in 1848, and studied at Berlin in 1852 and at Bonn in 1854. He was professor of mathematics at Hampden Sidney in 1848-'56, of physics and chemistry in the University of Georgia in 1856, and of mathematics and astronomy in the University of South Carolina in 1858-'61. He became captain of engineers in the Confederate army in the last-named year, and in 1862-'5 was lieutenant-colonel and aide-de-camp to Gen. Robert E. Lee, participating in all the important battles in which the Army of Northern Virginia took part. He became professor of mathematics in the University of Virginia in 1865, and still holds that chair. In 1870-'3 he was chairman of the faculty, and in 1887 was again chosen to that office. In 1860 he was one of the five commissioners appointed to visit Labrador to observe the solar eclipse. The University of Virginia gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1868. He has published a series of mathematical text-books (New York, 1869-'75).—His son, Frank Preston, chemist, b. at Longwood, Prince Edward co., Va., 17 Nov., 1856, was educated at the University of Virginia, and then studied chemistry at the universities of Bonn and Göttingen, receiving the degree of Ph. D. from the latter in 1881. He has held the chair of chemistry at the University of North Carolina since 1880, and, in addition to various scientific papers, has published "A Short Course in Qualitative Chemical Analysis" (Raleigh, N. C., 1883).

VENABLE, William Henry, author, b. in Warren county, Ohio, 29 April, 1836. He began to teach at seventeen years of age, and during his vacations attended teachers' institutes in Oxford, Ohio, being one of the first teachers in the state upon whom the Ohio board of examiners conferred a life certificate. He was graduated at the Normal school at Lebanon, Ohio, in 1862, became professor of natural science in Chickering classical and scientific institute, Cincinnati, Ohio, in the same year, was its principal and proprietor in 1881, organized and was first president of the Cincinnati society of political education, and in 1882 founded and conducted in that city the Afternoon school of popular science and history. He retired from teaching in 1886, has since devoted himself to literary work and to lecturing, and is an editor of the "Ohio Archaeological and Historical Quarterly." He is actively connected with many educational associations, and is a member of several learned bodies. The University of Ohio gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1886. He has published "June on the Miami, and other Poems" (Cincinnati, 1871); "A School History of the United States" (1872); "The School Stage," a collection of juvenile acting plays, original and adapted (1873); "The Teacher's Dream," a poem (New York, 1880); "Melodies of the Heart, and other Poems" (Cincinnati, 1884); "Footprints of the Pioneers in the Ohio Valley" (1888); "Biography of William D. Gallagher" (1888); and "Historical Sketch of Western Periodical Literature" (1888). He has also published several pamphlets, addresses, etc., and edited "The Dramatic Actor," a collection of plays (1874); and "Dramatic Scenes from the Best Authors" (1874).

VENANT, Jean Barré de (vay-nong) (sometimes written SAINT-VENANT), French agriculturist, b. in Niort in 1737; d. there in February, 1810. He came in his youth to Santo Domingo, founded there a model farm, and was appointed president of the colonial board of agriculture and trade, which post he retained for about twenty years, contributing in many ways toward developing the resources of the colony. He founded at Cape Français the Academy of the Philadelphes, which under his auspices published many valuable manuscripts concerning the early history, discovery, and natural history of the island, sent out several scientific expeditions, and greatly fostered national education. After his return to Europe in 1788, Venant wrote, at the solicitation of the Paris société d'agriculture, memoirs on the culture of cotton, coffee, indigo, tobacco, and sugar-cane, and urged the introduction of such occupations in southern France. His works include "Des colonies modernes sous la zone torride, et particulièrement de celle de Saint-Domingue" (Paris, 1802).

VENEGAS, Francisco Javier de, viceroy of Mexico, b. in Ecija, Spain, about 1760; d. in Madrid about 1820. He entered military life, and in 1805 retired on half-pay as lieutenant-colonel. When Spain was invaded by the French troops in 1808, he returned to active service, participated in the victory of Baylen in July of that year, and under the protection of the minister Saavedra obtained rapid promotions. He held the rank of major-general, and had been sent as viceroy to New Granada, when the Spanish council of regency in 1810 resolved to appoint him viceroy of Mexico, as his energetic character seemed adapted to quell the popular commotion that had begun in that country. He received news of his promotion in Carthagena shortly before his departure for Bogota and arrived in Vera Cruz, 25 Aug., 1810. On the road to the capital he heard of a threatened outbreak in Queretaro, and two days after his arrival in Mexico the revolution of Miguel Hidalgo took place in Dolores, 16 Sept., 1810. With great activity Venegas gathered forces to oppose the advancing host of the insurgents, and after the defeat of Gen. Trujillo at Monte de las Cruces, 29 Oct., he sent two brigades against the retiring Hidalgo, who was defeated at Aculco on 7 Nov. He was greatly assisted by the energy of Gen. Felix Maria Calleja, who on 17 Jan., 1811, totally defeated the insurgents at Calderon, and in the same year took Zitacuaro from Ignacio Lopez Rayon. Continued success made Calleja believe himself superior to Venegas; from that time he began a secret opposition to the viceroy, and the latter, to keep him from the capital, sent him against Morelos's forces in Cuautla. But when the latter town was abandoned by Morelos after a seventy days' defence, on 2 May, 1812, and Calleja with his tired forces did not pursue the enemy, Venegas censured him severely, and the former resigned. In the same year Venegas took the oath on the new constitution, and repressed a seditious movement in the capital with the utmost cruelty, ordering the execution of several accused persons for whom the prosecutor had only demanded imprisonment. In other instances he had acted against the decrees of the Spanish cortes, and this, together with the intrigues of Calleja's friends, caused the regency to order his recall in February, 1813. He delivered the executive to Calleja on 4 March, and left Mexico on the 13th of that month, with the reputation of an honest and energetic but haughty and cruel ruler. In Spain he submitted to the French government, and was rewarded with the titles of Marquis de la Reunion and member of the supreme council of war. After the restoration of Ferdinand VII. he retired to private life.

VENEGAS, Miguel (vay-nay'-gas), Mexican author, b. in Puebla, 4 Oct., 1680; d. near the city of Mexico in 1764. He entered the Society of Jesus at Tepozotlan on 30 Aug., 1700, was a professor of Latin and rhetoric in 1708, and of moral theology in 1714, and was subsequently a missionary among the Indians of Mexico and California. He rendered important services to his order in the administration of the latter country, and collected a large number of documents on its history, geography, and on the lives of its missionaries. At length he was forced by feeble health to live in retirement, and spent the remainder of his life on the estate of Chicomocelo in literary occupations and the practice of religious exercises. He wrote many works, among them: "Hymnus in laudem B. Mariæ Virginis de Guadalupe," in Latin and in Spanish (Mexico, 1765); "Manual de Párrocos para administrar los Sacramentos á Indios y Españoles" (1768); "Templo místico de la Gracia, delineado en la admirable vida y virtudes heroicas del Ven. P. Juan Bautista Zappa, misionero de la Nueva España" (Barcelona, 1754); and "Vida admirable del P. Juan Maria Salvatierra, Conquistador de Californias" (Mexico, 1755). The work on which his reputation rests is "Noticia de la California y su Conquista temporal y espiritual hasta el tiempo presente" (3 vols., Madrid, 1757). It is full of details on the manners of the Indian tribes and the lives of the missionaries. He availed himself of the manuscripts of his predecessors and contemporaries, and the interest the work excited is shown by the fact that it was translated into the principal modern languages. The English translation bears the title "Natural and Civil History of California" (2 vols., London, 1759). The French and Dutch translations were made from the English, and do not give the author's name. His life was written by Salvador Granada (Mexico, 1765).

VENNOR, Henry George, Canadian meteorologist, b. in Montreal, 30 Dec., 1840; d. there, 8 July, 1884. He was graduated at McGill university in 1860, taking the zoological and geological courses under Sir William Dawson, studied civil engineering, and took a course of chemistry in Montreal medical college. For five years after leaving the university he was in business, but found time to make a large collection of the birds and fossils of Montreal island, and also made a study of the weather. In 1865 he became assistant to Sir William Logan, of the geological survey of Canada, with whom he spent a season in examining Manitoulin island in Lake Huron. There he contributed letters to the Montreal "Witness," made a collection of the birds of Lake Huron, and prepared a list of all that bred on the island. He was placed on the permanent staff of the geological survey in 1866, was elected a fellow of the Royal geological society of England in 1870, and continued his geological surveys till 1881, when he left the service of the government and opened a mining agency in Montreal. While employed on the survey he traced the rivers Lièvre, Reuge, and Gatineau to their sources, and succeeded in directing public attention to valuable phosphate-mines. He first attracted notice as a meteorologist in the autumn of 1876, when he predicted a "green" Christmas and a rainy New-Year's day, which prediction was verified. At the same time he began the publication of "Vennor's Almanac," which he continued till his death, and which, it was claimed, attained a larger circulation than that of any similar publication in the world. He made a study of the course of storms for many years, and attained his results chiefly by comparing atmospheric conditions at the time with similar ones in the past. He published "Our Birds of Prey" (Montreal, 1875). The remainder of his writings appear in the "Reports" of the geological survey, the "Canadian Naturalist," and the "British American Magazine." In 1882-'3 he supplemented his almanac with "Vennor's Weather Bulletin."

VENTADOUR, Henry de Lévis-La Voute, Duke de, third viceroy of Canada, b. in the castle of Moustier Ventadour, near Tulle, Corrèze, about 1595; d. in Paris in 1651. He was the second Duke of Ventadour, and, after serving for several years in the army, retired and took holy orders. In 1625 he bought for 20,000 livres from his uncle, Henry, Duke de Montmorency, the viceroyalty of Canada. According to the historian, "it was no worldly motive that prompted this young nobleman to assume the burden of fostering the infancy of New France. For trade and colonization he cared nothing; the conversion of infidels was his sole care. The Jesuits had the keeping of his conscience, and in his eye they were the most fitting instrument for his purpose." The Recollet friars that had arrived in Canada a few years before had already established five missions. To please De Ventadour they applied for the assistance of the Jesuits, and the duke sent to Canada, in 1625, Charles Lalemant, Énemond Massé, and Jean de Brébeuf. They were followed in 1626 by Noirot de la Noue and twenty other laborers. Émery de Caen had then the monopoly of trade and commerce in Canada, but, as he was a Huguenot, Ventadour endeavored to limit his privilege, and went so far as to prohibit Émery's followers from prayer and singing. Ventadour sent one ship to Canada in 1626 to explore his new dominion, but denied the colonists any support, under the pretence that they were Protestants, and when Richelieu in 1627 compelled Ventadour to sell his viceroyalty to the newly organized company of the Hundred associates, the fifty inhabitants of Quebec were nearly starving. Pointe Lévis had been named after the third viceroy of Canada. Ventadour continued to the end of his life to interest himself in the conversion of infidels, and he sent succor several times to the missions that had been established by the Jesuits in New France.

VERA-CRUZ, Alonso de la, Spanish monk, b. in Caspeñas, Guadalajara, in 1504; d. in Mexico, 6 July, 1584. He studied at the universities of Alcalá and Salamanca, and was from 1533 till 1537 tutor of the children of the Duke del Infantado. In 1537 he accompanied Father Francisco de la Cruz to New Spain, and in 1538 entered the Augustinian order at Vera Cruz. He was provincial of the order in 1550, and founded in 1551 the University of Mexico, being its first professor of Holy Scripture. When Vasco de Quiroga, bishop of Michoacan, went to the council of Trent, he left Vera-Cruz in charge of his diocese and asked him for a full report of the missions in New Spain to lay before the council. This report was long discussed in that body, as it severely criticised the Spanish administration and begged the king to prevent cruelty toward the Indians. Vera-Cruz was in consequence ordered to appear at court in 1561, but he justified himself and became visitor of the order in New Castile. He refused in 1565 the bishoprics of Tlaxcala and Michoacan, and, being permitted to return to New Spain in 1573, brought with him seventeen friars, and established successful missions among the Tarascos. He was thoroughly acquainted with the native languages, and left, besides many published works, several valuable manuscripts, which are mentioned by José Mariano Beristain in his "Biblioteca Hispano-Americana Septentrional."

VERANDRYE, Pierre Gautier de Varennes de la, Canadian explorer, b. in Three Rivers, Lower Canada, 17 Nov., 1685; d. in Quebec, 6 Dec., 1749. His father, René Gautier de Varennes, a native of France and lieutenant in the regiment of Carignan, was governor of Three Rivers. The son entered the French army, fought in the war with Great Britain, received several wounds in the battle of Malplaquet, and was left for dead on the field. After his recovery he returned to Canada, and in 1712 married the daughter of the seigneur of Ile Dupas. Like many others, Verandrye cherished the hope of discovering a northwest passage to Cathay, and on his imparting his belief to Father Gonor, the latter persuaded De Beauharnois, then governor of Canada, to give Verandrye fifty men and a missionary to carry out his intended explorations. In 1731 he crossed Lac de la Pluie 160 miles west of Lake Superior, built Fort St. Peter near the present Fort Francis, and in 1732 erected Fort St. Charles on the western shore of the Lake of the Woods. In 1733 he passed down Winnipeg river into the lake of that name, and is supposed to have erected a fort south of Assiniboine river near its junction with Red river, from which the present Fort Rouge is named. He and his sons shortly afterward built Fort de la Reine upon the site that is now occupied by Portage la Prairie, and subsequently continued their explorations westward until they had discovered the Rocky mountains. In 1736 one of his sons, the Jesuit Père Anneau, and twenty others were massacred by Sioux on an island of the Lake des Bois. In 1749 Verandrye ascended Saskatchewan river to the forks, where he erected Fort Dauphin, and afterward returned to Quebec, hoping to obtain a further pecuniary grant, but died as he was about to resume his journey. While on his tour of exploration he found among massive pillars a small stone that bore on two sides graven characters of an unknown language. The stone was afterward sent to Paris, and there the resemblance the characters were thought to bear to Tartaric was regarded as supporting the hypothesis of an Asiatic emigration into America. The king of France conferred the cross of St. Louis upon Verandrye, and at the time of his death he was about to resume, by the king's desire, his attempt to reach the Pacific ocean. Alexander Taché, the first Roman Catholic archbishop of St. Boniface, Manitoba, who was a relative of Verandrye, laid in 1885 the foundation of a monument to commemorate him at St. Boniface.

VERBECK, Guido Fridolin, missionary, b. in Zeist, near Utrecht, Holland, 23 Jan., 1830. He was graduated at the Moravian academy in Zeist in 1848, at Auburn theological seminary in 1859, and was licensed by the presbytery of Cayuga the same year. He went to Japan in May, 1859, as a missionary of the Reformed church, was connected with the government of that country in its education and translation departments in 1869-'78, and early in 1869 was invited to Tokio to help in forming a national university. He was one of a staff of writers employed in the production of "An Outline History of Japanese Education" for the United States centennial exhibition in 1876, and was engaged in the production of other important publications in Japan. Dr. Verbeck was one of a select committee that brought out the translation of the Bible into the Japanese language in 1887, after many missionaries had labored upon difficult parts of the work for fifteen years. He is president of the University of Tokio, and received the Japanese order of the "Rising Sun" in 1877, and the degree of D. D. from Rutgers in 1875.

VER BRYCK, Cornelius, artist, b. in Yough Paugh, N. J., 1 Jan., 1813; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 31 May, 1844. He studied in 1835 under Samuel F. B. Morse, and in 1837 went to Mobile. In 1839 he visited London, England, whence he soon returned. He was elected an associate of the National academy in 1838, and an academician in 1841. He exhibited at the academy during 1837-'42 various landscapes, figure-pieces, and portraits, and in 1839 "Charles I. in the Studio of Vandyck." His health gave way soon after his art studies began, and in 1843 he went again to Europe, with the hope that a voyage might restore him, but soon returned, and his early death terminated a promising career. The New York historical society owns his "The Old Dutch Bible." Among his portraits is one of William Cullen Bryant (1842).

VERCHERES, Mary Madeleine de, b. in Canada in 1678; d. after 1700. She was born in the fort on her father's seigniory on the St. Lawrence, about twenty miles below Montreal. In the autumn of 1692 she was on the river-bank, some distance from the fort, when suddenly she heard several shots fired, and discovered that the Indians were killing and carrying off the settlers who were working in the fields. She describes the scene in the narrative afterward written at the request of the governor of Canada. A servant shouted to her to run, and, on turning round, she saw about fifty Iroquois rushing at her. Pursued by the savages, and crying "To arms!" she entered the fort just in time to shut the gate in their faces. Besides women and children, there were only two soldiers, an old man, and her two little brothers in the fort. Seeing that the soldiers were demoralized, she seized a rifle, put on a military cap, and ordered all to take their places and by heavy firing alarm the country. She placed her two brothers—the one twelve years old, the other fourteen—on the bastions, saying: "Let us fight till death; we fight for our country and religion." The third bastion was defended by the old man, while she took charge of the fourth, after placing the women and children in charge of the two soldiers in a redoubt. The Iroquois made several attacks, but were repelled, and eventually retreated with loss. The siege lasted two days, during which she neither ate nor slept. After another eight days the fort was relieved by an officer and forty men from Montreal. She afterward married De Lanaudière, Sieur de la Perade.

VERDEN, Karl von (vair'-den), German missionary, b. in Schweidnitz, Silesia, about 1620; d. in Buenos Ayres in 1697. He became a Jesuit, was attached to the South American missions, and labored for about twenty years among the Indians of Tucuman. Afterward he was librarian of the convent of Buenos Ayres. His works include "Geografía y Misiones del Río de la Plata" (Madrid, 1710); "Informe de las Misiones del Tucumán" (1711); and "Información sobre las Misiones y Establecimientos de la Compañía de Jesús en la America meridional" (2 vols., 1715).

VERDI, Tullio Suzzara, physician, b. in Mantua, Italy, 10 Feb., 1829. He is of a noble family, was educated in the College of art, literature, and sciences of Mantua, and in 1847 entered the Sardinian army. After its defeat at Novara in 1849 he was exiled from Italy by the Austrians, came to the United States, and in 1852 became professor of modern languages in Brown university. He was graduated at Hahnemann medical college at Philadelphia in 1856, and in 1857 removed to Washington, D. C. In 1871 he was appointed a member of the board of health of the District of Columbia, of which in 1876 he was elected president, and he was appointed in 1879 a member of the national board of health. Dr. Verdi became president of the medical staff of the National homœopathic hospital in June, 1887. He was appointed in 1873 special sanitary commissioner to the principal cities of Europe from the District of Columbia. He was physician to William H. Seward while the latter was secretary of state, and the assassin that nearly killed Seward gained admission to the secretary by the pretence that he was the bearer of a professional message from Dr. Verdi. He has published "Maternity, a Popular Treatise for Young Wives and Mothers" (New York, 1869); "Mothers and Daughters: Practical Studies for the Conservation of the Health of Girls" (1877); and "The Infant Philosopher" (1886).

VERDUGO, Vicente (vair-doo'-go), Peruvian historian, b. in Cuzco about 1690; d. in Rome, Italy, in 1775. He became a Jesuit, and was superior of their houses at Cuzco and Lima, canon of Cuzco, and professor of history at Quito. After mastering the Quichua language and several other Indian dialects, he collected an important library of ancient documents concerning the early history of South America and its conquest. Toward 1750 he was sent to Rome and became librarian of the Roman college. His works include "Historia de las guerras civiles en Peru en el tiempo del Inca Atahualpa" (Rome, 1754); "Crónica verídica de la conquista de la provincia de Cuzco" (2 vols., 1756); and "Información de lo obrado en la provincia del Cuzco," a manuscript, which is preserved in the Roman college.

VERE, Maximilian, Freiherr von SCHELE DE, scholar, b. near Wexio, Sweden, 1 Nov., 1820. He was educated in Germany, and entered the military and afterward the diplomatic service of Prussia. He came to the United States in 1842, and in 1844 accepted the chair of modern languages in the University of Virginia. At the beginning of the civil war he entered the Confederate service as a captain, and was afterward appointed commissioner to Germany, to explain and further there the cause of the Confederacy. He lived for some time in Europe, mainly in Italy, devoting himself to literary and social studies, but returned to this country after the war and resumed his professorship. Prof. De Vere is a member of various historical and scientific societies, and was one of the founders of the American philological society. Besides contributions on historical, literary, and scientific subjects, to English, American, and German periodicals, he has published "Outlines of Comparative Philology" (New York, 1853); "Grammar of the Spanish Language" (1854); "Stray Leaves from the Book of Nature" (1856); "Studies in English," "First French Reader," and "Grammar in French" (1867); "The Great Empress," a novel (Philadelphia, 1869); "Wonders of the Deep" (New York, 1869); "Introduction to the Study of French" (1870); "Romance of American History" (1872); "Americanisms, or the English of the New World" (1873); and "Modern Magic" (1874). He has translated into English Spielhagen's "Problematic Characters" (New York, 1869); "Through Night to Light" (1869); and "The Hohensteins" (1870); and has edited an edition de luxe of Saintine's "Myths of the Rhine," illustrated by Doré, and several volumes of the "Illustrated Library of Wonders." He has recently begun a revised and annotated edition of some of the masterpieces of French literature.

VERGARA Y ZAMORAL, Diego Hernandez de, Spanish missionary, b. in Jaen, Andalusia, Spain, in 1526; d. in Mexico in 1593. He was of noble birth, early entered the military service and fought in Italy till 1549, when he became a Jesuit to escape punishment for having killed a fellow-officer in a duel. In the following year he was sent to Santo Domingo, where he studied theology and was ordained priest. He labored afterward in Cuba, in the Tierra Firme, and in Mexico, where he became prior of a convent, librarian and procurator of his order, and was twice sent to Rome to report to the holy see on the American missions. He left two valuable manuscripts, which are preserved in the Vatican library at Rome. They are entitled "Litteræ annuæ, ad præpositum generalem Societatis Jesu, quæ statum in provincia Antillensi exponunt," and "Epistolæ tres de quadraginta Jesuitis interfectis in Novâ Hispanâ," which recounts the adventures of the first Jesuits that were sent to Mexico.

VERGENNES, Charles Gravier, Count de, French statesman, b. in Dijon, 28 Dec., 1717; d. in Versailles, 13 Feb., 1787. He was the second son of a president of the parliament of Dijon, and, after receiving his education at the Jesuit college, entered the diplomatic service, and accompanied a relative to Lisbon in 1740. In the following year he participated at Frankfort in the negotiations that brought about the election to the empire of the elector of Bavaria, Charles VII., but he returned to Lisbon in 1745, and in 1750 was appointed minister at the court of the elector of Treves. He assisted in the congress at Hanover in 1752, and in 1753 prevented at Mannheim the conclusion of a treaty between Maria Theresa and the Emperor Charles VII. He was ambassador to Constantinople in 1754-'68, and in 1771-'74 at the court of Sweden, assisting at Stockholm in the revolution in favor of Gustavus III. Louis XVI. appointed him secretary of foreign relations, 8 June, 1774. Out of friendship for Benjamin Franklin, he gave secret aid to the colonists through the agency of Caron de Beaumarchais, and exerted his influence to induce the king to sign a treaty of commerce and alliance with the United States. His task was the less easy as he had to overcome the scruples of the king, the opposition of the queen and of the prime minister, Count de Maurepas, and especially the objections of the secretary of the treasury, Necker, who predicted bankruptcy and a revolution for its consequence. Vergennes, supported by the young nobility and the philosophers, furnished Caron de Beaumarchais with funds, arms and ammunition, and supplies for the colonists, sent to Philadelphia Gérard de Rayneval as ambassador, and wrote the articles of the treaty of alliance that was signed, 6 Feb., 1778. He composed also the famous manifesto to the foreign powers in which Louis XVI. justified his action in recognizing the so-called rebels of America, and negotiated also the articles of the treaties of peace that were signed at Paris, 3 Sept., 1783, between Great Britain on the one hand and France and Spain on the other. Besides these treaties, Vergennes negotiated those of Soleure with the confederation of Switzerland, 28 May, 1777; of Teschen with Emperor Joseph II., 13 May, 1779, which settled the question of succession to Bavaria; of 10 Nov., 1785, with Germany, which saved Holland from an invasion; and the treaty of commerce with England, 25 Sept., 1786. He addressed to Louis XVI. a "Mémoire historique et politique sur la Louisiane," which was published after his death (Paris, 1802).

VERHUEN, Jacobus (vair-oo-en), Dutch historian, b. in Leyden in 1709; d. there in 1777. He was educated in the university of his native city, entered the Jesuit order when he was twenty-five years old, and was sent to Mexico, where, after learning the Indian dialects, he labored for about twenty-five years in the northern missions. When the Jesuits were expelled from the Spanish dominions he returned to his native city, where he died. He wrote in Dutch a valuable narrative, which is preserved in manuscript in the library of Leyden. A French translation was published under the title "Notice sur les missions établies par la Compagnie de Jésus dans la province du Mexique, suivie d'un essai historique et géographique sur la Californie, et de plusieurs documents originaux" (2 vols., Amsterdam, 1782).

VERMILYE, Thomas Edward, clergyman, b. in New York city, 27 Feb., 1803. He studied at Yale and at Princeton theological seminary, but was not graduated. He was licensed to preach by the presbytery of New York in 1826, was pastor of a Presbyterian church in New York city, then of the Congregational church at West Springfield, Mass., in 1829-'34, and of the Reformed Dutch church at Albany, N. Y., in 1834-'9. Since 1839 he has had charge of one of the Collegiate Reformed churches in New York city.—His son, Ashbel Green, clergyman, b. in Princeton, N. J., in 1822, was graduated at the University of New York in 1840 and at New Brunswick theological seminary in 1841. He was ordained by the presbytery of Albany in 1845, and was pastor at Little Falls, N. Y., in 1845-'50, at Newburyport, Mass., in 1850-'63, at Utica, N. Y., in 1863-'71, and at Schenectady in 1871-'6. Having been appointed chaplain of the Marine chapel, Antwerp, Belgium, he went to that country in March, 1879. Among other sermons he published "Historical Sermon at Centennial of First Presbyterian Church, Newburyport" (1856).—Thomas Edward's brother, Robert George, educator, b. in New York city, 3 March, 1813; d. in Lyme, Conn., 5 July, 1875, was graduated at Columbia in 1831. He was a teacher of classics in the College grammar-school for several years, and, with Dr. Charles Anthon, was appointed adjunct professor of Greek and Latin in Columbia college in 1837. In the mean time, having studied theology, he was licensed by the presbytery of New York in April, 1838, preached in the Duane street church, New York, in 1838-'9, was pastor of a Presbyterian church at German Valley, N. J., in 1843-'6, and of the Congregational church at Clinton, N. Y., in 1846-'57. He was a member of the board of trustees of Hamilton college in 1850-'7, and in the latter year became professor of theology in East Windsor theological institute, which chair he retained till his death. He published a few sermons and addresses, and left in manuscript his courses of theological lectures.

Vergennes

VERMONT, Éloi Lemerancier Beausoleil (vair-mong), Marquis de, West Indian soldier, b. in Basse-Terre, Guadeloupe, in 1762; d. in Paris, France, 21 Sept., 1832. He became ensign in the Santo Domingo regiment in 1778, and served in the war of 1778-'83, being at the capture of Tobago and in the division of the Duke de Saint Simon at Yorktown in 1781. He was promoted colonel, commanded the French forces in Guadeloupe from 1788 till 1793, and repressed with the utmost severity the revolutionary troubles in the island. Being besieged in Pointe à Pitre by the insurgents, he sustained their attacks for several months, but when he fell short of ammunition the city was taken. Vermont and his principal officers were to be shot on the next day, when a British squadron appeared off the coast and the admiral demanded their surrender. After much discussion this was agreed to by the chief of the rebels, Gen. Pélagaud; but, as the feeling of the negroes ran extremely high against Vermont, extraordinary precautions were taken to prevent his murder. He was disguised and placed on board a boat entirely covered with black cloth, which was towed through the French fleet. Armed boats lined the way, and the sentries repeated the cry, "By order of the republic, let the covered boat pass." This dramatic episode has been selected as a subject by both English and French painters and poets. Vermont was transported to England, where he rejoined the royal family. He returned to Guadeloupe in 1812, was promoted major-general and commander-in-chief of the island in 1815, lieutenant-general in 1826, and appointed governor of Guadeloupe in 1827, but declined. He died unmarried, and his enormous fortune was divided among his numerous heirs, thus scattering one of the largest estates in South and Central America.

VERNON, Edward, British naval officer, b. in Westminster, England, 12 Nov., 1684; d. at his seat of Nacton, Suffolk, 29 Oct., 1757. His father, James Vernon, had been secretary of state under William and Mary from 1697 till 1700. Edward was educated at Westminster school and at Oxford, and obtained a commission in the navy in 1702. He was engaged in the expedition under Admiral Hopson which destroyed the French and Spanish fleets off Vigo, 12 Oct., 1702; in the capture of Gibraltar, 23 July, 1704; and in the sea-fight off Malaga on 13 Aug. of the same year. He became a rear-admiral in 1708, and was in active service till 1727, when he was elected to parliament for Penryn. In the succeeding parliament, lasting from 1734 till 1741, he represented Portsmouth. He distinguished himself in the ranks of the opposition, and, declaring in parliament, in 1739, that Puerto Bello, on the Spanish main, could be taken with six ships, the ministry took him at his word and gave him the command of six men-of-war, with the rank of vice-admiral of the blue. He appeared before Puerto Bello with his small fleet, 22 Nov., 1739, which he captured after an assault of one day, with a loss of only seven men. This success secured him unbounded popularity. He next took and destroyed Fort Chagres, on the Isthmus of Darien, and in January, 1741, sailed from Jamaica with twenty-nine ships of the line and eighty smaller vessels, having on board 15,000 sailors and 12,000 soldiers, four battalions of which were from the British colonies north of Carolina. After cruising in search of the French and Spanish fleets, Vernon determined to attack Cartagena, the most strongly fortified port in South America, and, appearing before it on 4 March, was repelled with great loss, which was augmented by a pestilence. He attributed the failure of the expedition to the fact of his not being in sole command, which opinion the public evidently shared, as the disaster did not seem to diminish his popularity in England. He planned an expedition against Panama in 1742, was made an admiral in 1745, and was charged with guarding the coasts of Kent and Sussex against an expected attack by Prince Charles Edward Stuart. His name was stricken from the list of admirals, 11 April, 1746, in consequence of a quarrel with the admiralty. In 1741 he was elected to parliament from Penryn, Rochester, and Ipswich, but chose to stand for the last-named place, for which he was again returned in 1747 and 1754. Tobias George Smollett served in the Cartagena expedition as a surgeon's mate, and gave a graphic description of it in "Roderick Random" and in his "History of England." Lawrence Washington, elder brother of Gen. Washington, who also participated in the expedition, regarded Admiral Vernon with great friendship, and named his estate in Virginia, Mount Vernon in his honor. The word "grog" is said to have been first applied by the sailors of his fleet to the diluted rum with which they were served, in allusion to his program trousers. During the closing years of his life he lived in retirement. He published "New History of Jamaica, from the Earliest Account to the Taking of Porto Bello" (London, 1740); "Original Papers relating to the Expedition to Panama" (1744); and pamphlets on naval subjects (1746). See "The Life of Admiral Vernon by an Impartial Hand" (London, 1758), and "Memorial of Admiral Vernon, from Contemporary Authorities," by William F. Vernon (1861).

VERNON, Jane Marchant Fisher, actress, b. in Brighton, England, in 1796; d. in New York city, 4 June, 1869. Her maiden name was Fisher. She made her début at Drury Lane theatre, London, in 1817, in "Lilliput," and, coming to the United States in 1827, made her first appearance on 11 Sept. at the Old Bowery theatre, New York, as Cicely Homespun in "The Heir at Law." She afterward became attached to the Old Chatham theatre, and in 1830 to the Park, where she remained till 1847, and gained great popularity. She was long connected with Wallack's company, making her last appearance as Mrs. Sutcliffe in "School," 5 April, 1869. She was a favorite, an excellent personator of old women, and possessed a cultivated mind. On 6 Oct., 1827, she married George Vernon, who died, 13 June, 1830.

VEROT, Augustine, R. C. bishop, b. in Le Puys, France, in May, 1804; d. in St. Augustine, Fla., 10 June, 1876. He received his preparatory education at a classical school in Le Puys and in 1820 entered the Seminary of St. Sulpice, Paris.

himself in the ranks of the opposition, and, declaring in parliament, in 1739, that Puerto Bello, on the Spanish main, could be taken with six ships,

He was ordained a priest on 20 Sept., 1828, and shortly afterward became a member of the Sulpician order. He came to the United States in 1830 and was appointed professor in St. Mary's college, Baltimore. In 1853 he was made pastor of Elliott's Mills, where he became noted for his devotion to the interests of the slaves. He was nominated vicar apostolic of East Florida and consecrated bishop of Danabe in partibus on 25 April, 1858. He arrived in St. Augustine on 1 June, and at once proceeded to organize congregations. Bishop Verot was among the first to make known the advantages of Florida as a field for emigration, and, by letters, public addresses, and answers to inquiries, he did much to attract settlers from other states and from Europe. As there were only three priests under his jurisdiction, he sought clerical aid from other quarters and soon had priests enough for his new congregations. He built the Church of St. Louis at Tampa and restored the cathedral of St. Augustine, the chapel of Nuestra Señora de la Leche, and the old Spanish cemetery, also enlarging the Church of St. Mary at Key West, besides founding churches at Mandarin and Orange Spring. He was translated to the see of Savannah in July, 1861, retaining at the same time the vicariate of East Florida. He replaced the Roman Catholic church at Jacksonville, which had been destroyed by fire during the occupation of the city by the U. S. soldiers in the civil war. He founded many missions, and at St. Augustine organized several societies among the colored people. He opened academies for young girls at St. Augustine, Jacksonville, Fernandina, Mandarin, and Palatka, under the care of the Sisters of St. Joseph, and introduced the Sisters of the Holy Names, who established an academy at Key West. In Georgia he made successful efforts to repair the ravages of the civil war. He built the Church of the Holy Trinity in Savannah, and also a church at Albany. He opened an Ursuline convent and school in Macon, a house of the Sisters of Mercy in Columbus, and established an orphan asylum at Savannah. Bishop Verot had a high reputation as a theologian and scholar, and his influence in moulding the decrees of the councils of Baltimore and in the council of the Vatican was far-reaching. A series of letters that he published during and after the civil war in the "Pacifcator" were effective in promoting peace and reconciliation. He was transferred to the bishopric of St. Augustine on his return from Rome in 1870. His new diocese had not recovered from the disasters of the war, and he made several lecture-tours through the north in order to obtain money for the relief of his people. Bishop Verot published a catechism which is accepted as an authority by the Roman Catholics of the United States. His manuscripts on philosophy, theology, and sacred scripture would, if published, form several large volumes.

VERPLANCK, Daniel Crommelin, member of congress, b. in Dutchess county, N. Y., in 1761; d. near Fishkill, N. Y., 29 March, 1834. He received a good education, served in congress from 17 Oct., 1803, till 3 March, 1809, and was first judge of the court of common pleas for Dutchess county, from 11 March, 1828, till 16 Jan., 1830. He took great interest in agriculture. His estate at Fishkill had been in the possession of the family since 1682, and the house, which was erected several years later, is still standing. It is a one-story building of stone and wood, in the Dutch style. This place was the headquarters of Baron Steuben at one time, and in it Col. Lewis Nicola proposed to make Washington a king. (See illustration.)—

His son, Gulian Crommelin, author, b. in New York city, 6 Aug., 1786; d. there, 18 March, 1870, was graduated at Columbia in 1801, being the youngest bachelor of arts that ever received his diploma from that college. He afterward studied law, was admitted to the bar and began practice in New York city. Soon afterward he went to Europe, where he passed several years in travel. On his return he took an active part in state politics, and became a member of the legislature in 1820. In 1821 he was appointed professor of the evidences of revealed religion and moral science in the Protestant Episcopal general theological seminary, New York city, and retained this chair four years. He was a member of congress from 1825 till 1833, was a member of the state senate in 1838-'41, and was for many years president of the board of commissioners of emigration. He was one of the vestrymen of Trinity church, New York city, a governor of the City hospital in 1823-'65, and vice-chancellor of the State university from 1855 till his death. For many years Mr. Verplanck was president of the Century club, and prominent in the annual conventions of the diocese. He published an anniversary discourse on the early European friends of America (New York, 1818); "The Bucktail Bards: containing the State Triumvirate, a Political Tale; and the Epistles of Brevet Major Pindar Puff," being political pamphlets chiefly aimed at De Witt Clinton, mayor of New York city (1819); "Procès Verbal of the Ceremony of Installation" (1820); "Address before the American Academy of Fine Arts" (1824); "Essays on the Nature and Uses of the Various Evidences of Revealed Religion" (1824); "Essay on the Doctrine of Contracts" (1825); "Discourses and Addresses on Subjects of American History, Arts, and Literature" (1833); "Shakespeare's Plays, with his Life, with Critical Introduction and Notes" (3 vols., 1847); and several college orations, the best known of which is "The American Scholar," delivered at Union college in 1836. He prepared also for fifteen years nearly all the annual reports of the commissioners of emigration, and, with William C. Bryant and Robert C. Sands, edited the "Talisman," an annual, which continued three years, beginning with 1827. These volumes, containing some of the choicest productions of their authors, were republished in 1833 with the title of "Miscellanies first published under the Name of the 'Talisman.'"—His cousin, Isaac A., jurist, b. in Coeymans, Albany co., N. Y., 16 Oct., 1812; d. in Buffalo, N. Y., 16 April, 1873, was graduated at Union in 1831, studied law, and began practice in Batavia, N. Y., in 1834. He went to Buffalo in 1847, was elected a judge of the superior court of that city in 1854, and twice re-elected, and by the choice of his associates was made chief. As a member of the convention of 1867-'8 he assisted materially in the revision of the state constitution.

G. Verplanck

VERRAZANO, VERAZZANI, or VERRAZANO, Giovanni de (vay-rah-tsah'-ne), Florentine navigator, b. in Val di Greve, near Florence, in 1470; d. either in Newfoundland or Puerto del Pico in 1527. At the age of twenty-five he entered the French maritime service and was employed in voyages of discovery. It is asserted in the French annals that he visited the northern coast of America as early as 1508, but no account of his discoveries is known to exist. Later he was employed in ravaging the Spanish and Portuguese possessions in the East and West Indies, and soon became famous as a corsair. In 1521 he secured valuable prizes in the West Indies, and he captured in 1522 the treasure-ship in which Hernan Cortes was sending home the rich spoils of Mexico. Toward the end of 1523 he left Dieppe on the frigate "La Dauphine" with a mission from Francis I., king of France, to explore the coast of North America. He sailed from Madeira, 17 Jan., 1524, and arrived in February off the coast of North America. For three months he explored the coast from 30° to 50° north latitude, landed at a point near Cape Fear, and, coasting northward, discovered New York and Narragansett bays. He landed on Newfoundland, of which he took possession in the name of the king, and endeavored to find a passage to the East Indies by the northwest. On his return to Dieppe he wrote, on 8 July, a memoir to Francis I., relating his discoveries, of which he gave a somewhat confused description. Very little is known of the remainder of Verrazano's life. References to the French annals make it possible that he was killed by Indians in Newfoundland during a subsequent voyage of exploration. It is known that he communicated to persons in England a map of his discoveries, and a document found at Rouen in 1876 proves that he executed a power of attorney to his brother, Geronimo (Jerassme de Verasenne), 11 May, 1527, before sailing to the East Indies, by virtue of an agreement with Admiral Philippe Chabot and the famous merchant of Dieppe, Jean Ango. It is claimed that during the voyage he was captured on the southern coast of Spain, and executed at Pico as a privateer.

His exploits, capture, and execution are narrated by Pietro Martire d'Anghiera, Bernal Diaz del Castillo, and others, who call him Juan Florin. In the 18th century, on the authority of Andres Gonzalez Barcia, in his "Ensayo Cronológico, etc." (Madrid, 1723), Juan Florin was identified with Verrazano, but more modern authors contest the identification. Ramusio published in his collection in 1556 an Italian version of Verrazano's letter to King Francis I.; and Antonio de Herrera, in his "Decades," gives extracts from the letter, saying that he had seen the original. The authenticity of the letter was attacked in 1864 by Buckingham Smith, who claimed that Esteban Gomez, pilot of Magellan, was the first to visit the coast of Carolina in 1525. But James Carson Brevoort, in "Verrazzano, the Navigator" (New York, 1874), maintains the authenticity of the letter, which Henry C. Murphy rejects as spurious in his "Voyage of Verrazzano, a Chapter of the Early Maritime Discoveries in America" (New York, 1875). The conclusion is not yet definitive, as George W. Greene discovered in the Strozzi library at Florence a manuscript copy of Verrazano's letter, varying somewhat in text from the Ramusio version, and containing some additional paragraphs. It was published in the transactions of the New York historical society for 1841. Brevoort gave also an account of a planisphere that is preserved in the Strozzi library, dated 1529, signed by Geronimo Verazzano, in which he calls the land "Nuova Gallia, quale discopri, 5 annos fa, Giovanni de Verazzano, Fiorentino." The French archives, recently searched by Ramée for his "Documents inédits sur Jacques Cartier et le Canada," afford proof that Verrazano discovered the northern coast of North America.

VERREAU, Hospice-Anthelme Jean Baptiste, Canadian educator, b. in L'Islet, Quebec, 6 Sept., 1828. He was educated at the Seminary of Quebec, taught there in 1847-'8, was principal of Sainte Thérèse college in 1848-'56, and has been principal of Jacques Cartier normal school, Montreal, since 1856. He was ordained a priest in 1851, in 1873 was commissioned by the provincial government to make investigations in Europe regarding Canadian history, and made extensive notes of his travels and researches, which were published in 1875. He was appointed an officer of public instruction by the French government. He has published "Invasion du Canada" (Montreal, 1873), and prefaces and notices of memoirs of the historical society.

VERREN, Antoine, clergyman, b. in Marseilles, France, 14 Feb., 1801; d. in New York city, 17 March, 1874. He studied philosophy and theology, was graduated in Geneva, Switzerland, ordained a minister in the French Protestant church in August, 1825, and was in parochial charge at Ferney, Switzerland, in 1825-'7. He came to the United States in September, 1827, and was called to the rectorship of L'Église du St. Esprit, New York city, which post he held during his life. He was ordained deacon and priest in September, 1828, by Bishop Hobart, and was professor of French literature in Columbia in 1832-'44. A new church edifice was built on the corner of Franklin and Church streets in 1834; the interior was destroyed by fire in 1839, but was restored in 1840. Services were discontinued in this building in 1862, and a new building was erected in West Twenty-second street, between Fifth and Sixth avenues. He received the degree of D. D. from Hobart college in 1860. Dr. Verren in 1831, by appointment, revised and corrected the "Book of Common Prayer" in French, for the use of congregations in the United States that have services in that language. This book was republished in Paris.

VERRILL, Addison Emory, naturalist, b. in Greenwood, Me., 9 Feb., 1839. He was graduated at the Lawrence scientific school of Harvard in 1862, where he specially studied natural history under Louis Agassiz. In 1864 he was called to the chair of zoölogy in Yale, which he still retains, and he was also professor of entomology and comparative anatomy in the University of Wisconsin in 1867-'70. The instruction on geology in the Sheffield scientific school of Yale is under his care, and since 1867 he has been curator of zoölogy in the Peabody museum. The zoölogical collection has been created by him, and it now ranks as one of the best in this country. Since 1860 he has devoted part of every summer to collecting and studying the marine animals of the Atlantic coast, and since 1871 he has had charge of the dredging of marine invertebrates of the United States under the auspices of the U. S. fish commission, to whose reports he has annually contributed an account of his work. Prof. Verrill is a member of various scientific societies, and in 1872 was elected to the National academy of sciences. The degree of A. M. was conferred on him by Yale in 1867. He has made original investigations on corals, mollusca, annelids, echinoderms, tunicata, and bryozoa, and of the gigantic cephalopods of Newfoundland. His bibliography is quite large and includes papers in the "American Journal of Science" and the proceedings of various societies of which he is a member.

VERSCHOOR, Julius Wilhelm Van (fair-shore), Dutch navigator, b. in Dordrecht about 1575; d. there in 1640. He sailed as rear-admiral of a fleet that was equipped by order of the states-general of Holland and Prince Maurice of Nassau for an expedition against Peru, under command of Admiral Jacob L'Hermite Clerk, which left Amsterdam, 29 April, 1623. They stopped at the Cape Verde islands, where rich prizes were secured, and, on 1 Feb., 1624, made Cape Peñas on Tierra del Fuego. The admiral was already very sick, and after July, 1623, the fleet was virtually commanded by Vice-Admiral Gheen Huygen Schapenham and Verschoor. On 2 Feb. they entered the Strait of Le Maire, and, the fleet being dispersed by winds, Verschoor discovered Nassau bay, between Navarin, Hoste, and Wollaston islands. His mathematician, Johan von Walbeck, made a chart of the southeastern coast of Tierra del Fuego and the Strait of Le Maire, which was at that time the most authentic map of the extremity of South America. In March, 1624, Verschoor was detached with a division for the American coast, while the admiral sailed for Juan Fernandez. Verschoor joined him there, and the fleet attacked Callao on 12 May, burning thirty merchant vessels in the harbor. On 23 May, Verschoor was sent to attack Guayaquil, which he partly burned, but he was repelled there and again at Pisco. After Hermite's death, 2 June, 1624, Schapenham took the command-in-chief, and, in opposition to Verschoor's advice, refused to attack Callao again, which could have been easily carried, and a new expedition against Pisco was decided upon; but the Dutch were driven back on 26 Aug., owing to Schapenham's ill-concerted measures. When the fleet reached the coast of New Spain, Verschoor secured several rich prizes and was ordered to sail for the East Indies, Schapenham returning by way of Cape Horn to the Atlantic. Verschoor arrived on 2 March at Ternate, in the Moluccas, and, the vessels being assigned to other services, he returned to Holland to report to the states-general. His secretary, Hessel Geritz, published "Journal van de Nassauche Vloot" (Amsterdam, 1626). A German version, with additional remarks, was made by Adolf Decker, who had served as captain of marines in the expedition. It is entitled "Journal oder Tag-Register der Nassauschen Flotte" (Strasburg, 1629). De Bry published a later version of it in his "Historiæ Americane" (1634), but the best-known version was published in French in the "Recueil des voyages de la Compagnie des Indes." Des Brosses gave also an account of the expedition in his "Voyages aux terres australes," and Capt. James Burney published an English translation in his "Voyages to the South Sea" (London, 1811).

VERTIN, John, R. C. bishop, b. in Rudolfs-werth, Carniola, 17 July, 1844. He emigrated to the United States in 1863 with his father, and, having resolved to study for the priesthood, entered the theological seminary of St. Francis at Milwaukee, Wis. He was ordained a priest on 31 Aug., 1866, by Bishop Baraga, in Marquette. He was then appointed pastor at Houghton, and in 1871 transferred to Negaunee. He was consecrated bishop of Marquette on 14 Sept., 1879. The diocese has made considerable progress under his administration. It contains 40 priests, 36 churches, 4 chapels, and 68 stations. There are 11 convents, an academy, 10 parochial schools, and 2 orphan asylums. The Catholic population is about 40,000.

VERY, Jones, poet, b. in Salem, Mass., 28 Aug., 1813; d. there, 8 May, 1880. He was graduated at Harvard in 1836. In his youth he made several voyages to Europe with his father, a sea-captain. He was a teacher of Greek at Harvard from 1836 till 1838, was licensed as a preacher by the Cambridge (Unitarian) association, and, though never ordained over a congregation, preached occasionally. He published "Essays and Poems" (Boston, 1839). A complete edition of Mr. Very's essays and poems, with a biographical notice of the author by James Freeman Clarke, was published (Boston, 1886). His poetry is characterized by remarkable purity and delicacy of thought and great ease and simplicity of style.—His brother, WASHINGTON, clergyman, b. in Salem, Mass., in 1815; d. there in 1853, wrote hymns and poems for the press.—His sister, Lydia Louisa Anna, poet, b. in Salem, Mass., 2 Nov., 1823, from 1845 till 1875 taught in the schools of her native city. She shares the poetical gift of her family, and contributed poems to various Boston and Salem newspapers while engaged in teaching. As an artist Miss Very has produced excellent pictorial illustrations for children's stories. She has published "Poems" (Andover, 1856) and children's books.

VESEY, Denmark, conspirator, b. about 1767; d. in Charleston, S. C., 2 July, 1822. He was an African of great physical strength and energy, who had been purchased in St. Thomas, when fourteen years old, by a sea-captain of Charleston, S. C., whom he accompanied in his voyages for twenty years, learning various languages. He purchased his freedom in 1800, and from that time worked as a carpenter in Charleston, exercising a strong influence over the negroes. For four years he taught the slaves that it would be right to strike a blow for their liberty, comparing their situation to that of the Israelites in bondage, and repeating the arguments against slavery that were made in congress by speakers on the Missouri compromise bill. In conjunction with a negro named Peter Poyas, he organized a plot for a general insurrection of slaves in and about Charleston, which was disclosed by a negro whom one of the conspirators approached on 25 May, 1822. Several thousand slaves from neighboring islands, organized in military formations and provided with pikes and daggers, were to arrive in canoes, as many were accustomed to do on Sunday, and with one stroke take possession of the city, the forts, and the shipping in the harbor. Nearly all the slaves of Charleston and its vicinity, many from remoter plantations, and a large number of whites, were in the plot. The leaders that were first arrested maintained such secrecy and composure that they were discharged from custody, and proceeded to develop their plans. An attempt was made to carry them out on 16 June, but the insurrection was promptly suppressed. At length, on the evidence of informers, the chief conspirators were arrested and arraigned for trial on 19 June. The two courts were organized under a colonial law, and consisted each of two lawyers and five freeholders, among whom were William Drayton, Robert Y. Hayne, Joel R. Poinsett, and Nathaniel Hayward. Denmark Vesey showed much dialectic skill in cross-examining witnesses by counsel and in his final plea. He and five of the ring-leaders were hanged first, and twenty-nine others on later dates, all save one keeping up to the end their calm demeanor and absolute reticence, even under torture. On the day of Vesey's execution a second effort was made to rouse the blacks, but two brigades of troops, on guard day and night, were sufficient to deter them from action. The slaves were ready, however, to embrace the first opportunity, and re-enforcements of United States troops were sent in August to guard against a renewal of the insurrection.

VESEY, William, clergyman, b. in Braintree, Mass., in 1674; d. in New York city, 18 July, 1746. He entered Harvard, and was graduated in 1693, after which he began the study of theology in Boston. He officiated as lay reader in Hempstead, Queens co., N. Y., during 1695-'6, and was invited by Gov. Fletcher and the magistrates, vestrymen, and wardens to become rector of the new congregation in New York, known as Trinity church, and "to have the care of souls in the city of New York" so soon as he took orders. The vestry engaged to pay his expenses, and he embarked for England early in 1697. He was ordained in August of the same year, and returned immediately to this country. He was inducted into the new church as soon as it was finished, 13 March, 1698. Gov. Fletcher made a grant to the church of a tract of land for a term of years, known as "The King's Farm," subject to rent, which, however, was not exacted. Fletcher's successor, the Earl of Bello-mont, by requiring the rent, stirred up a violent controversy with Rector Vesey; but Lord Cornbury, who succeeded as governor in 1701, restored the farm to the church. About 1712 the bishop of London, Dr. Compton, appointed Mr. Vesey his commissary, which proved to be a laborious and troublesome office, and led to several protracted and unpleasant controversies. He discharged his various duties with zeal and earnestness, and as the Venerable society for the propagation of the gospel furnished him with assistant ministers, school-masters, and teachers, he was able to give an impetus to the Church of England in New York city, which placed it in the foremost rank, and secured to its successor, the Protestant Episcopal church, the strong position that it holds to the present day. His last report as commissary to the Venerable society in 1746 showed the result of long and faithful labors, and spoke of "twenty-two churches flourishing and increasing in his jurisdiction." Mr. Vesey was an able preacher, but he left nothing in print. His portrait is among the collections of parish rectors in the vestry-room of Trinity chapel, New York city. Vesey street, in the same city, was named in his honor.

VEST, George Graham, senator, b. in Frankfort, Ky., 6 Dec., 1830. He was graduated at Centre college in 1848, and in the law department of Transylvania university in March, 1853. Beginning practice in central Missouri, he was chosen a presidential elector on the Democratic ticket in 1860, and in the same year was elected to the Missouri house of representatives. In the legislative debates of the session of 1861 he was an ardent supporter of southern views. He relinquished his seat in order to take his place in 1863 as a representative from Missouri in the Confederate senate, of which he was a member for two years. After the downfall of the Confederacy he resumed the practice of law in Sedalia, Mo., whence he removed in 1877 to Kansas City, Mo. He was elected to the U. S. senate, taking his seat on 18 March, 1879, became prominent by his powers as a debater and orator, and was re-elected for the term ending 3 March, 1891.

VETCH, James, British engineer, b. in Haddington, Scotland, 13 May, 1789; d. in London, England, 7 Dec., 1869. He was educated at Woolwich military academy, served as an officer of engineers in the peninsular war, and after conducting the ordnance survey in the Shetland, Orkney, and Hebrides islands for three years, went to Mexico in 1824, and for the next eleven years managed the silver-mines of Real del Monte and Bolaños. While a resident of Mexico he constructed roads and other public works, and began to survey and map the country. After his return to Great Britain he was employed in important drainage works and harbor improvements, and held high offices under the government connected with his profession.

VETCH, Samuel, colonial governor, b. in Edinburgh, Scotland, 9 Dec., 1668; d. in London, England, 30 April, 1732. He was the son of William Vetch, a minister in Edinburgh, was educated there and at the College of Utrecht, Holland, and accompanied William, Prince of Orange, to England, 5 Nov., 1688. He afterward served with credit in Flanders in the war against France, returned to England at the peace of Ryswick in 1697, and in 1698 was appointed one of the seven councillors of the "colony of Caledonia" at Darien and proceeded thither.

(See PATERSON, WILLIAM.) He accompanied Paterson as far as New York when the latter was on his way to England to report to the directors of the Darien scheme, and afterward went to Albany, engaged in trade with the Indians, and on 20 Dec., 1700, married Margaret, daughter of Robert Livingston. In 1705 he was sent as a commissioner from Gov. Joseph Dudley, of Massachusetts, to Quebec with proposals for a treaty between Canada and New England; but, having failed, he went to England in 1708, and with the full authorization of the colony of New York proposed to Queen Anne the seizure of Canada. The queen regarded the proposal with favor and forwarded by Col. Vetch her instructions to the colonial governors to aid in rendering the project effective. On landing at Boston he laid his instructions before the governor and council of Massachusetts, and also forwarded similar documents to the governors of Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania. In consequence of the non-arrival of the fleet that was promised by the queen, the expedition against Canada was abandoned. Returning to Boston, he called a meeting of prominent citizens, at which it was decided to fit out an expedition for the capture of Port Royal (now Annapolis), Nova Scotia, and at the same time a requisition was made for men-of-war to assist in the enterprise. The expedition was commanded by Sir Francis Nicholson, Col. Vetch being adjutant-general, and after the capitulation of Port Royal, 2 Oct., 1710, the latter remained as governor of the conquered colony. Gov. Vetch next sent a delegation to the French governor-general at Quebec, the Marquis de Vaudreuil, to announce that Acadia had fallen into the hands of the British and to offer an exchange of prisoners that had been captured at Annapolis for British subjects that were then in Montreal and Quebec. Nothing came of this; but Vetch and his small garrison, who had held precarious possession of the conquered province, were finally relieved from the fear of reprisals on the part of the French and Iroquois by the treaty of Utrecht, 11 April, 1713. Shortly afterward he was removed from the governorship of Nova Scotia in consequence of his great zeal for George I., soon after whose accession he was restored to his post; but he was soon removed again. The cause of his second removal is unknown, though it is surmised that his harsh treatment of the plotting priests and the people of the province was the chief reason. After his departure from Annapolis he went to Boston, annoyed the war and state departments with his claims for back-pay, and petitioned the king to be allowed £3,000 a year till he had been provided with a post in America as had been promised. Receiving neither the post nor the money, he returned finally to England, where he was residing in 1719. He was a man of great natural ability and formed for command, but prejudiced in politics and religion. A manuscript journal covering the Port Royal period is in the possession of Mrs. James Speyers, of New York, as is also the portrait by Sir Peter Lely, which has been engraved for the first time for this work. See "An Historical and Statistical Account of Nova Scotia," by Thomas C. Haliburton (Halifax, 1829); "Journal of the Voyage of the Sloop Mary" (1701; new ed., with introduction and notes by Edmund B. O'Callaghan, New York, 1866); "History and General Description of New France," by Pierre François Xavier de Charlevoix, translated with notes by John G. Shea (New York, 1866-'72); and "An Acadian Governor," by James Grant Wilson, in "International Review" (November, 1881).

VETHAKE, Henry, educator, b. in Essequibo county (now united with Demerara), British Guiana, in 1792; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 16 Dec., 1866. He was brought to the United States by his parents at the age of four years, was graduated at Columbia in 1808, and afterward studied law. In 1813 he became instructor in mathematics and geography at Columbia, and later in the same year professor of mathematics and natural philosophy in Queen's college (now Rutgers). He went to Princeton in 1817 as professor of the same sciences, and for the first year of chemistry also, resigning in 1821 in order to take the chair of mathematics and natural philosophy in Dickinson college, where he remained till 1829. He taught the same subjects in the University of the city of New York from 1832 till 1835, and then filled for a year the office of president of Washington college, Lexington, Va., taking the chair of intellectual and moral philosophy. He was professor of mathematics from 1836 till 1855, and subsequently till 1859 of intellectual and moral philosophy in the University of Pennsylvania, being chosen vice-provost in 1846, and provost in 1854. From 1859 till his death he occupied the chair of the higher mathematics in the Philadelphia polytechnic college. He received the degree of LL. D. from Columbia in 1836. He published "Principles of Political Economy" (Philadelphia, 1838; 2d ed., 1844), besides contributions to periodicals. He edited, with additions, John R. McCulloch's "Dictionary of Commerce" (Philadelphia, 1843), and a supplemental volume of the "Encyclopædia Americana," which was in great part written by himself (1847).

VETROMILE, Eugene, Italian missionary, b. in Gallipoli, Italy, 22 Feb., 1819; d. there, 21 Aug., 1880. He came to the United States in 1840 and entered Georgetown college, Georgetown, D. C., where he finished his studies and obtained his first knowledge of the Abnaki language. He was then ordained a priest, and assigned to missionary duty at Port Tobacco, Md. He was afterward professor in a college at Washington, and in 1858 was given charge of the mission of Old Town, Me. His labors among the Penobscot Indians for more than a quarter of a century affected his health, and he returned to Italy shortly before his death. He published "Travels in Europe, Egypt, Palestine, and Syria," and "The Abnaki and their History." His knowledge of the Indian dialects made him widely known. Rev. Edward Ballard, of Brunswick, Me., says, in the "Collections of the Maine Historical Society," that Vetromile was the only person who could "read a verse of John Eliot's Indian Bible with a true understanding of the words of that translation." His chief Indian works are "Aln'amby Uli Awikhigan," a volume that comprises devotions and instructions in various Abnaki dialects; "Ahiami-hewintuhangun," a collection of hymns set to music; "Vetromile Wewessi Ubibian," an Indian Bible; and an "Abnaki Dictionary" in three folio volumes, which occupied him twenty-one years.

VEUILLOT, Désiré (vuh-yo), French explorer, b. in Cahors in 1653; d. in London, England, in 1732. He was employed till 1684 as inspector-general of the establishment of the West Indian company in the Antilles, Louisiana, and Alabama, and made an exploration of Mississippi river in 1683, penetrating as far as the Missouri, and returning by way of Arkansas. As he was a Protestant, he was forced, after the revocation of the edict of Nantes in 1685, to renounce the land-grant that he had obtained in upper Mississippi and for the settlement of which he was preparing an expedition, and eventually he left France and took refuge in London, where he obtained employment in the office of the secretary of foreign relations. He wrote "Description des côtes de la Louisiane, avec un voyage fait le long du cours du fleuve Mississippi" (2 vols., London, 1708), and "Notice historique sur la Compagnie du Mississippi et sur les établissements fondés par les Français en Louisiane" (2 vols., 1714), which was translated into English (1715).

VEYTIA, Mariano (vay-ee'-te-ah), Mexican historian, b. in Puebla in 1718; d. there in 1779. He was a precocious child, and at the age of fifteen years took his first degree in philosophy. Three years afterward he was graduated in civil law, and in 1737, notwithstanding his youth, he was admitted as lawyer of the audiencia by a special permission of the viceroy. In May, 1737, he sailed for Spain, and at that time he began to write a detailed narrative of his travels. In two years he visited Spain, France, and Holland, and afterward he went to Italy, Portugal, England, and Palestine. In 1742 he became a member of the military order of Santiago in Madrid, and he entered the convent of San Agustin in Puebla in 1768. About that time he devoted himself to the study of the ancient history of Mexico, but at the time of his death he had finished only three volumes of his work, embracing the period from the earliest occupation of Anahuac till the middle of the 15th century, which are noteworthy for the fidelity of his researches. Clavigero, who by this time had finished his "Storia Antica del Messico," wrote to Veytia to obtain notes on the period anterior to the beginning of his history. Veytia's work was published under the title of "Historia Antigua de México" (Mexico, 1836), by Jose Ortega. Veytia left also a manuscript entitled "Historia eclesiástica," which has not yet been published, and translated the "Cartas provinciales de Pascal."

VEZIN, Hermann, actor, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 29 March, 1829. He was intended for the bar by his father, a German-American merchant of Philadelphia, and was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1847. Desiring to follow the stage, he went to England, and, after some preparation, obtained, through the recommendation of Charles Kean, an engagement at a theatre in York. He appeared in London under Kean's management in 1852, and two years later played principal parts in a tour through Great Britain. He visited the United States in 1857-8; but his style of acting was not popular. Returning to England in 1859, he played Hamlet, Macbeth, Othello, King John, Louis XI., and Shylock in 1859. After his marriage to Mrs. Charles Young in 1863, he travelled with his wife, and in the following year they produced Westland Marston's comedy of "Donna Diana" at the Princess's theatre, London. He was successful in "The Man o' Airlie," "The Rightful Heir," "Life for Life," and various comedies, new and old, and in 1875 added greatly to his reputation by his rendering of Jacques in "As You Like It." On 4 Feb., 1876, he played Macbeth at Drury Lane theatre for the benefit of the Philadelphia centennial exhibition, and subsequently he played Dan'l Druce in William S. Gilbert's drama of that name, created the part De Taldé in "The Danicheffs" and Schelm in "Russia" in 1877, and was successful in the characters of Sir Giles Overreach, the Duke of Alva in "Fatherland," and Iago in a revival of "Othello" in March, 1878. In 1885 he played the Shepherd in an open-air representation of John Fletcher's "Faithful Shepherdess."

VIALE, Agostinho (ve-ah'-lay), Brazilian explorer, b. in São Paulo about 1620; d. in the Aymores country in 1667. In 1664 he was named by Afonso VI. administrator-general of the mines in Brazil, with power to pardon all offenders that had sought a refuge in the forests. The general belief, since justified, was that rich mines existed in the interior of Brazil, and the government, intending to make use of the geographical knowledge that had been obtained by the outlaws during their wandering through the forests, had decided to win their services by the offer of a complete pardon. Viale left São Paulo at the head of 50 soldiers and 150 Indians, and entered the vast forests of the province of Matto Grosso, but, after journeying with great difficulties for thirteen months through the territory of the warlike Aymores, he wrote to São Paulo in 1666 for re-enforcements, announcing that he soon hoped to reach the much-talked-of emerald mines. He was joined by a few more soldiers, and, resuming the march, entered marshes where the greater part of his host died from malarial fever, and Viale fell a victim to the disease just in sight of the Serra das Esmeraldas. His lieutenant, Barbalho Bezerra, brought back the remnants of the expedition to São Paulo. Viale's journey afforded some knowledge of the vast countries of the interior.

VIANA, Francisco de (ve-ah'-nah), Spanish missionary, b. in the province of Alava about 1530; d. in Coban, Guatemala, in 1609. He entered the Dominican order at Salamanca, and about 1560 went to New Spain, where he was attached to the missions of the province of Chiapa. For more than forty years he labored among the natives of the surrounding district, whose language he acquired, and became superior of the convent of Coban, rebuilding that and the one at Zacapula. He left some valuable manuscripts, which were preserved in the library of the order at Chiapa. The principal are "Arte de la Lengua de Vera Paz," "Vocabulario de la Lengua de Vera Paz," numerous religious works, sermons, and a catechism in that language, and a "Tratado de los deberes de la Justicia, para gobierno de Alcaldes mayores de Indias," all of which were translated into Quiche by Friar Dionisio Zuñiga, of the province of Guatemala.

VIANA, Miguel Pereira (ve-ah'-nah), Viscount da, Brazilian author, b. in Evora, Portugal, in 1779; d. in Bahia in 1838. He received his education in the college for nobles at Lisbon, and afterward obtained a place in the office of the secretary of state, whom he accompanied to Brazil with the royal family in 1806. There he was appointed secretary of the commission to mark the frontier between the Portuguese and the Spanish possessions, became councillor of state, sided in 1822 with the party of Dom Pedro, who made him a viscount, and was appointed in 1828 civil judge at Bahia. He wrote "Romanceiro historico do rio Amazonas" (Bahia, 1825); "Ensaio historico e descriptivo do rio Amazonas" (1829); and "Descrição geral da provincia da Bahia" (1832).

VICENTE Y BENNAZAR, Andres (ve-then'-tay), Spanish geographer, lived in the second half of the 15th century. He published at Antwerp in 1476 four charts, representing the four continents of the world. Unlike Columbus, he did not imagine America to be part of Asia, but represented it as a distinct continent and, what is more remarkable, as a continent divided into two parts by an isthmus. This publication, at so early a date, and before Columbus's discovery, has caused much discussion. Some authorities think that Vicente y Bennazar had arrived at the conclusion that America existed as a distinct continent; others, that such an opinion was general among scientific circles in the 15th century; and still others, that he only intended to reproduce the lost Atlantis spoken of by Plato and the ancients.

VICK, James, horticulturist, b. in Portsmouth, England, 23 Nov., 1818; d. in Rochester, N. Y., 16 May, 1882. He received a common-school education, came early to the United States, gained a practical knowledge of gardening and floriculture, wrote on these subjects, and in 1850 became publisher of the "Genesee Farmer" in Rochester, and in 1853 also of the "Horticulturist," issued in Albany. He severed his connection with these periodicals in 1855 in order to embark in the novel enterprise of retailing seeds through the medium of the U. S. mails. This business grew to large proportions and found many imitators. In connection with it he published "Vick's Monthly Magazine" in 1878-'82, the "Flower and Vegetable Garden," and an annual "Floral Guide." He developed new varieties of plants by cultivation or cross-fertilization, notably double phlox, white gladiolus, and fringed petunia. Mr. Vick was a corresponding member of the English royal horticultural society, and for several years secretary of the American pomological convention.

VICKERS, George, senator, b. in Chestertown, Kent co., Md., 19 Nov., 1801; d. there, 8 Oct., 1879. He acquired a classical education, was employed in the county clerk's office for several years, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1832, and practised in Chestertown. He was a delegate to the Whig national convention of 1852. When the civil war began he was appointed major-general of the state militia. He was a presidential elector on the McClellan ticket in 1864, and one of the vice-presidents of the Union convention of 1866. In 1866-'7 he was a member of the state senate. In 1868 he was elected U. S. senator for the term that ended on 3 March, 1873, in the place of Philip F. Thomas, who had been denied the seat. He took a conspicuous part in the debate on the 15th amendment to the Federal constitution.

VICO, Domingo de (ve'-co), Spanish missionary, b. in Ubeda, Andalusia, in 1485; d. in 1555. He became a Dominican in his native city, studied in Salamanca, and in 1516 came to this country with Bartolome de las Casas. He first labored among the Indians in Cuba, but later passed to New Spain, and accompanied Las Casas in his journeys through Nicaragua, Guatemala, and Peru. When the latter was appointed bishop of Chiapa in 1544, Vico became his vicar-general and seconded him in his zeal for the welfare of the Indians. Later he was prior of the convents of Guatemala, Chiapa, and Coban, founded the city of San Andres, and became in 1552 the first bishop of Vera Paz. He was killed, during a journey through his diocese, by Lacandon Indians. His works include several treatises on theology in the Vera Paz, Cakchiquel, Quiche, and Lacandon dialects, and "Historia de los Indios, sus fábulas, supersticiones, costumbres, etc.," which the historian Antonio Remesal says is remarkable for its pictures of Indian life, but the manuscript of which was not found when the libraries of the convents came into the possession of the state.

VICTOR, Orville James, author, b. in Sandusky, Ohio, 23 Oct., 1827. He was graduated at the seminary and theological institute in Norwalk, Ohio, in 1847. After contributing to "Graham's Magazine" and other publications for several years, he adopted journalism as a profession in 1851, becoming associate editor of the Sandusky "Daily Register," which he left in 1856 to edit the "Cosmopolitan Art Journal." Removing to New York in 1858, he assumed charge also of the "United States Journal," conducting both periodicals till 1860. He next edited the "Dime Biographical Library," to which he contributed lives of John Paul Jones, Anthony Wayne, Ethan Allen, Israel Putnam, Winfield Scott, Abraham Lincoln, and Giuseppe Garibaldi, and wrote for newspapers and periodicals in New York city. In 1863-'4 he visited England, and there published a pamphlet entitled "The American Rebellion; its Causes and Objects: Facts for the English People." He edited in 1866-'7 "Beadle's Magazine of To-Day," in 1870-'1 the weekly "Western World," and in 1872-'80 the "New York Saturday Journal." He published during the civil war, in annual volumes, a "History of the Southern Rebellion" (4 vols., New York, 1862-'5), which for several years he has been engaged in revising for republication in two volumes. His other works are "Incidents and Anecdotes of the War" (1863), and a "History of American Conspiracies" (1864). —His wife, Metta Victoria, author, b. near Erie, Pa., 2 March, 1831; d. in Hohokus, N. J., 26 June, 1886, was educated in the female seminary at Wooster, Ohio. When thirteen years old she published a story called "The Silver Lute," and from that time till her eighteenth year was a contributor to the "Home Journal" under the pen-name of "Singing Sibyl" or in connection with her elder sister, Frances A. Fuller, the two being known as "The Sisters of the West." In 1856 she married Mr. Victor, and in 1859-'61 she edited the "Home Monthly Magazine." A volume of poetry by the two sisters was published under the title of "Poems of Sentiment and Imagination, with Dramatic and Descriptive Pieces" (New York, 1851). She published individually "Fresh Leaves from Western Woods" (Buffalo, 1853); "The Senator's Son: a Plea for the Maine Law" (Cleveland, 1853), which had a large circulation in England as well as in the United States; and "Two Mormon Wives: a Life-Story" (New York, 1856; London, 1858). She was the author of "The Gold-Hunters," "Maum Guinea," and others of Beadle and Co.'s "Dime Novels." Among her numerous contributions to the periodical press were series of humorous sketches under the signature of "Mrs. Mark Peabody," entitled, "Miss Slimmens' Window" and "Miss Slimmens' Boarding-House," which were issued in book-form (New York, 1859). The story of "Too True" was reprinted from "Putnam's Magazine" (1868). Her novels "Dead-Letter" and "Figure Eight" were issued under the pen-name of "Seeley Register" (1868). Her last novel was "Passing the Portal" (1877). She subsequently wrote humorous books entitled "The Bad Boy's Diary" (1880), "The Rasher Family" (1884), "The Naughty Girl's Diary" (1884), and "Blunders of a Bashful Man" (1885), which were issued anonymously. — Her sister, Frances Aurette, author, b. in Rome, N. Y., 23 May, 1826, was educated at the seminary in Wooster, Ohio, and spent some time in the eastern states in preparation for a literary life, but after her return to the west and her marriage in 1853 to Jackson Barrett, of Michigan, she rarely wrote for publication. In 1862 she married for her second husband Henry C. Victor, a 1st assistant engineer in the U. S. navy and a brother of Orville J. Victor, and in the following year emigrated to the Pacific coast, where novel scenes impelled her to resume literary work. She contributed to the newspapers of San Francisco and Sacramento, and to the "Overland Monthly" from its first publication. After removing to Oregon in 1865, she published "The River of the West: Life and Adventures in the Rocky Mountains and Oregon" (Hartford, 1870), which was followed by "All Over Oregon and Washington" (San Francisco, 1870). She has also published "The New Penelope, and other Stories" (1877), and furnished to Hubert H. Bancroft's "Pacific Coast Histories" chapters on Oregon and other states and territories of the northwest, besides parts of the "History of California."

VICTORIA, Guadalupe, Mexican president, b. in Tamazula, Durango, in 1789; d. in Perote, 21 March, 1843. His real name was MANUEL FELIX FERNANDEZ, but after the death of Father Hidalgo in 1811 the young man abandoned the College of San Ildefonso, where he was studying, and joined the patriotic ranks, adopting as a symbol of victory and in honor of the Virgin of Guadalupe the name by which he is known in history. He first took part under Morelos in the siege of Oaxaca in 1812, and in 1814 was appointed by the congress of Chilpancingo to organize the revolution in the province of Vera Cruz, where he soon became feared by the Spaniards, as his guerillas captured nearly every supply-train that left the port for Jalapa and the interior. In 1817, when the insurrection was nearly everywhere subdued, and only Gen. Guerrero held out in the southwest, Victoria, unable to reach the latter chief, hid for nearly four years in the mountains of Vera Cruz, till the proclamation of the plan de Iguala in 1821. Then he joined Iturbide, but, as an ardent lover of liberty, was coldly received by the latter, who was already maturing his plan of monarchy, and after its establishment Victoria was imprisoned. In December, 1822, when Santa-Anna proclaimed the republic in Vera-Cruz, Victoria, who had escaped, joined him and was appointed commander of the city. After Iturbide's fall, Victoria was elected on 1 April, 1823, to the executive council, but, being occupied in the siege of San Juan de Ulua, he did not take his seat till July, 1824. Shortly afterward he was elected the first constitutional president of Mexico, taking possession on 10 Oct. His government was specially notable for the recognition of the republic by England, the abolition of slavery, which took place on 16 Sept., 1825, the surrender of the Spanish garrison of the castle of San Juan de Ulua, 18 Nov., 1825, and the first arrival of American settlers, under Stephen Austin, in Texas in the beginning of 1828. The last year of his administration was disturbed by several revolutions that were caused by the rivalry between the Scotch and York lodges, and the weakness of Victoria gave them free play. On 1 April, 1829, he delivered the executive to his successor, and retired from public life without appearing again in politics. He was a well-meaning and honest man, but of feeble character and easily controlled by his political followers.

VICTORIA, Pedro de, b. in Seville, Spain, in the latter part of the 16th century. He entered the Jesuit order, and was sent when young to America. The perils to which he was exposed in a shipwreck on the coast of Peru, and his subsequent adventures among the natives, form the subject of his work "Naufragio y peregrinación en la costa del Perú" (1610). A Latin translation was published in 1647 under the title of "Argonauticum Americanorum Historia."

VICTORIA, Tomás, Spanish missionary, b. in Victoria, Alava, early in the 16th century; d. in Guatemala in 1600. He entered the Dominican order and came to New Spain, where he learned the Tarasco language, and was employed in the missions of the Pacific coast. Soon he acquired the Zapotec language and went to the province of Oaxaca, and later to that of Guatemala, where he obtained such success that he was called the Elias of Guatemala. He left "Arte y Sermones doctrinales en lengua de Zacatula," and several religious tracts in manuscript in that dialect and the Quiche language.

VICUÑA, Manuel (ve-coon'-yah), Chilean archbishop, b. in Santiago, Chili, in 1778; d. in Valparaíso in 1843. After acquiring his primary education, he entered the College of San Carlos, and in a short time was graduated in theology. Soon afterward he entered the church, and, being ordained priest, travelled through the country as a missionary with other young ecclesiastics. After the battle of Maypu he visited the hospitals and personally assisted the wounded and dying. Having inherited a fortune, he employed a part of it in the construction of a house of retirement. In 1825 the bishop of Santiago, Jose Santiago Rodriguez, was exiled, and in 1830 Pope Leo XII. promoted Vicuña to the bishopric, in which office he labored for the re-establishment of the theological seminary. When Santiago was declared a metropolitan see, the government presented Vicuña as the first archbishop, and in June, 1840, Pope Gregory XVI. confirmed him. Afterward he was elected to congress and was a member of the council of state.

VICUÑA, Pedro Felix, Chilean journalist, b. in Santiago in 1806; d. there in 1874. He received an excellent education, in early life began to write for the newspapers, and at the age of twenty-one years was one of the founders and the first editor-in-chief of "El Mercurio," of Valparaíso. Afterward he successively belonged to the editorial staff of "El Telégrafo" (1827); "El Censor" and "La Ley y la Justicia" (1828); "La Paz Perpétua" (1834); "El Elector" and "El Verdadero Liberal" (1841); "El Republicano" (1845); and "La Reforma" (1847). He was elected to the senate of the nation in 1865, and in that body was the author of the law that abolished imprisonment for debt in 1870. He published "Único asilo de las Repúblicas Hispano-Americanas" (Santiago, 1837); "El Porvenir del Hombre" (1858); and "La Hacienda Pública" (1864).—His son, Benjamin Vicuña-Mackenna, Chilean historian, b. in Santiago in 1831; d. in Santa Rosa del Colmo, 25 Jan., 1886, attended the Lyceum of Santiago and the National institute, and studied law in the University of Chili, but in 1849 he was expelled for his refusal to sign a congratulatory address to the secretary of justice. There was such indignation at this arbitrary act that the rector reinstated him against the desire of the government. When a revolution began in Santiago, 20 April, 1851, he took an active part in it, and, in an attempt on the armory of the Chacabuco regiment on 28 April, he was made a prisoner and condemned to death, but escaped and fled to the north in July. He participated in the outbreak in Serena on 7 Sept., and was appointed revolutionary governor of Illapel. The revolution was subdued in November, and, after hiding for a year and being again condemned to death, he sailed in 1852 for California. He travelled through the United States and Mexico, visited Canada, and in July, 1853, went to Europe, where he remained a year at the Agricultural college of Cirencester, studying natural science. In 1855 he travelled through Europe, and in the next year returned to Chili, where in 1856 he was admitted to the bar and began practice. In 1858 he founded "La Asamblea Constituyente," in which he attacked the arbitrary measures of the government, and in December he was arrested in a public meeting and imprisoned for about six months in the penitentiary, where he wrote his unpublished work "Diego de Almagro." In June, 1859, he was exiled by the government with three others, who had taken an active part in the opposition. He visited France and Spain, searching the libraries for historical manuscripts, and in 1861 went to Lima, but returned soon afterward to Chili. In 1863 he was appointed chief editor of the "Mercurio," of Valparaiso, and in 1864 he was elected deputy to the National congress for Valdivia. In 1865, after the declaration of war by Spain against the republic, Vicuña-Mackenna was sent to Peru and the United States on a confidential mission, founding in New York the paper "La Voz de América," in defence of the South American republics. Returning to his own country in 1867, he was again elected to congress for Talca, and became secretary to the chamber of deputies. In 1870 he again went to Europe, where he acted during the Franco-German war as correspondent of the "Mercurio" in Berlin and Paris. Afterward, in the archives of the Indies in Seville, he copied documents on colonial history, acquiring in Valencia the manuscript of Father Rosales's "Historia de Chile." On his return in 1872 he was appointed intendant of the province of Santiago. At the opening of the war with Peru he became editor of "El Nuevo Ferrocarril," and, as president of "La Sociedad Protectora," became the friend of the soldiers and their widows and orphans. After the conclusion of the strife his descriptions of it became well known for their impartiality. He wrote "El Sitio de Chillan en 1813" (Santiago, 1849); "La Agricultura Europea aplicada á Chile" (London, 1854); "Le Chili" (Paris, 1855); "Tres años de Viajes" (Santiago, 1856); "Ostracismo de los Carreras" (1857); "Revolución del Perú" (Lima, 1861); "Ostracismo de O'Higgins" (Santiago, 1862); "Historia de la Administración de Montt" (5 vols., 1862-'3); "Vida de Diego Portales" (2 vols., 1862-'3); "Historia de Santiago" (2 vols., 1868); "Historia de Valparaiso" (2 vols., 1868); "Francisco Moyén, ó lo que fué la Inquisición en América" (1868; English translation, London, 1869); "La Guerra á Muerte" (1869); "Historia de la Jornada del 20 de Abril 1851" (1878); "Historia de las Campañas de Arica y Tacna" (1881); "Historia de Tarapacá" (1881); "Mr. Blaine" (1881); "La Guerra con España" (1883); several books on the mineral riches of Chili (1883); "Album de la Gloria de Chile" (1883); "Dolores" (1883); "Seis años en el Senado de Chile" (1884); "Las Islas de Juan Fernandez" (1884); "Viaje á través de la Inmortalidad" (1885); and "Al Galope" (1885).

He was manager of the Sarnia branch of the Bank of Upper Canada in 1852-'66, and held a similar post in the service of the Bank of Montreal from 1866 till 1875, when he resigned. VIDAURRE, Manuel Lorenzo de (ve-dah-oor'-ray), Peruvian statesman, b. in Lima in 1773; d. there, 9 March, 1841. He was graduated in law at the University of San Marcos, and became auditor of the Royal audiencia of Cuzco in 1810, but was transferred in 1820 to the audiencia of Puerto Principe in Cuba, and soon afterward sent to Spain, as he began to write in favor of South American independence. Being persecuted for his liberal ideas, he escaped to the United States in 1822, and on his return to Peru was appointed by Simon Bolivar, in April, 1824, first president of the superior court of Trujillo, and in 1825 promoted president of the supreme court of justice of the republic. He was appointed minister plenipotentiary of Peru for the general American assembly of Panama in 1825, and several times was minister of foreign relations. In 1838 he was appointed by President Orbegozo minister to Ecuador to negotiate her neutrality in the struggle of the Peru-Bolivian federation against Chili and the plots of Agustin Gamarra, and on the accession of the latter, in 1839, was deprived of his post in the supreme court. He was the author of the Peruvian civil and penal codes and of "Plan de Perú, dedicado al Libertador Simon Bolivar" (Paris, 1822); "Cartas Americanas, políticas y morales, que contienen muchas reflexiones sobre la guerra civil de las Américas" (2 vols., Philadelphia, 1823); and "Efectos de las facciones en los Gobiernos" (Lima, 1828).
